side track. Negligence is charged against all the defendants in that they allowed the cut to remain open and unprotected, and failed to keep a light burning at the cut, or to give any notice or warning of its danger, although it was in the corporate limits of the town, within 200 yards of the public square, and crossed one of the main thoroughfares; the defendants, well knowing the danger of leaving it thus unprotected, their attention having been called to it, several persons having fallen into it, and at least one having been killed by the fall.

It is further alleged "that at least twenty years before the building of the said Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railroad there was a well-beaten path—a regular traveled place—over which the public had acquired a prescriptive right to travel, and used by the public at their will and pleasure, along the space now between the track of the said Columbia & Greenville Railroad and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railroad, both above and below the said cut, which path or traveled way the public have continued to use up to the present time." Negligence is charged against the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company in not building a bridge across the cut it had made, thus leaving it open and exposed, and in a dangerous condition. After the cut was made, the path was deflected from its original course, about six feet from the cut, across the main track of the Southern Railway, and then led over the cut on the bridge built by the Southern Railway between its side track and main line. It is alleged the defendants all well knew the public were using the path as a passageway or sidewalk for pedestrians, with a right to do so; but none of them gave any notice or warning to the public not to so use it, but, on the contrary, such use was "with the knowledge, acquiescence, and consent of them all." The complaint then gives the following account of the accident: "That on the night of March 13, 1899, John E. Partlow, who was a citizen of Greenwood county, but not a resident of the town of Greenwood, and not acquainted with the cut and its surroundings, left the home of his daughter, Mrs. Bessie P. Andrews, in said town, to go down to the public square of said town on some matter of business or pleasure, walked along the said path, and on account of said cut being open and unprotected, his ignorance of its presence, and his being unable to see it in the darkness of the night, fell into the same, without fault or negligence on his part, and was so bruised and hurt by the said fall that he died from his injuries on the 2d day of April, A. D. 1899."

Responsibility is thus charged on the defendants, as a conclusion from the allegation above set forth: "That the direct and proximate cause of the death of the said John E. Partlow was the gross and concurring negligence of the said defendants in constructing said cut, and in allowing it to remain open and unprotected in the manner aforesaid, although they each and all well knew the danger of allowing it so to remain, and although it was the duty of each and all of them to cover or guard the same."

Since the accident, the town of Greenwood has bridged over the cut with strong and heavy timbers, and erected a fence at each end of the bridge; and the Southern Railway Company has erected a fence as a guard on the outside of the upper or northern granite wall, between its main track and the track of the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Company, where the town had previously had a fence, which had fallen into decay.

In the foregoing synopsis of the complaint no reference is made to allegations concerning the duty and neglect of the town of Greenwood, for when its demurrer was sustained without appeal its alleged liability was eliminated from consideration.

The first question made by the demurrers is whether the plaintiff's intestate was using a way over which the public had by prescription a right to travel. There are some authorities which hold a railroad company may release or convey a portion of its right of way, and hence that individuals may acquire a private right of way, or the public a highway, over the company's right of way by continuous, open, and adverse use for 20 years. Gay v. R. R. Co. (Mass.) 6 N. E. 236; Turner v. Ry. Co. (Mass.) 14 N. E. 627; Blumenthal v. State (Ind. App.) 51 N. E. 496; Ry. Co. v. Crownpoint (Ind. Sup.) 50 N. E. 741; People v. Ry. Co. (Cal.) 33 Pac. 728; 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law, 1220; Elliott on Railroads, § 425. The subject is referred to in Boggero v. Ry. Co., 64 S. C. 104, 41 S. E. 819; Jones v. Ry. Co., 61 S. C. 560, 39 S. E. 758; Haltwanger v. R. R. Co., 64 S. C. 7, 41 S. E. 810; Hankinson v. R. R. Co., 41 S. C. 1, 19 S. E. 206; and Ringstaff v. Ry. Co., 64 S. C. 546, 43 S. E. 22; but the question here made was not decided or involved in any of these cases. The doctrine above stated, under our statutes and the general principles of law, should be received, we think, with an important limitation. Railroad companies are allowed to acquire rights of way by condemnation because of the interest the public has in the construction and operation of their roads as highways, and hence a right of way so acquired is burdened with duties to the public. Therefore it may be stated as a general proposition, while the railroad company may deal with the right of way so acquired as its own in the conduct of its business as a carrier, it cannot dispose of it or use it so as to destroy or impair its ability to serve the public. 5 Thompson on Corporations, §§ 5878, 6137; Thomas v. R. R. Co., 101 U. S. 87, 25 L. Ed. 950; Ry. Co. v. Hyatt (Cal.) 64 Pac. 272, 54 L. R. A. 522; Collett v. Com'rs (Ind. Sup.) 21 N. E. 329, 4 L. R. A. 321; R. R. Co. v. Spokane, 64 Fed. 506, 12 C. C. A. 248. Our statute under which the right of way is acquired provides that nothing therein contained "shall be construed to confer upon such person or corporation any right in or power over the lands so condemned, other than such as may be within the particular purpose for which such lands were condemned." Civ. Code 1902, § 2194. Nevertheless, it is absolutely necessary that there should be many crossings for the use of those passing from one side of railroads to the other for business and social purposes, and it is sometimes essential that a public road or another railroad should run parallel with a railroad already constructed within the limits of its right of way. In recognition of this public necessity the law allows condemnation of a way for such purpose over lands already acquired for a railroad right of way, "provided, that in the construction of such other highway there be no hindrance to the use and enjoyment of the highway for which such lands or right of way were previously procured." Civ. Code 1902, § 2195.

When conditions arise that would justify the condemnation of a way over a railroad right of way, the railroad company no doubt could, without violating its duty to the public, waive condemnation, and allow the easement over its own right of way, subject to the condition indicated by the statute that the new highway should be so constructed as not to interfere with its own use to such an extent as to impair its ability to perform its public duties. Prescription can only arise from presumption of a grant or dedication. Under our own statute the railroad company has no power over a right of way acquired by condemnation except to use it for railroad purposes, and it therefore cannot grant it to another for other uses. The statute further forbids any portion of the right of way being taken under the state's right of eminent domain for another public highway, except with the provision that such other highway shall be so constructed as not to interfere with the first public purpose for which the land was set apart. The public may no doubt acquire a right to use a particular way over lands set apart for a railroad right of way by use clearly shown to be adverse for 20 years, in the sense that after that lapse of time the railroad authorities cannot arbitrarily forbid the use of such way for any reason not connected with the operation of the railroad; but, since the company cannot grant its right of way so as to defeat the purpose for which it was acquired, and it cannot be condemned for another highway so as to hinder these uses, it cannot be presumed that there ever was any grant or dedication to a public use inconsistent with the purpose for which the property was acquired by state authority. The use made of the right of way by others, with or without the consent or acquiescence of the company, must be regarded subject to the right to use the property for the conduct of the railroad's business as a carrier for the public.

Besides, the width of the strip of land necessary for railroad purposes is fixed under the authority of the state, and this fact creates a strong presumption that the whole of it should be preserved as necessary for the purpose for which it is set apart, except when burdened with condemnation for another highway; and the mere use for purposes of travel of a portion of the right of way, however long and notorious, should be regarded not adverse, but subject to yield to the end the state has in view in exercising its power of eminent domain in setting it apart and fixing its limits. The case under consideration affords a striking example not only of the reasonableness, but of the necessity, of this rule. Two of the great railroad systems have acquired rights of way and are running their main lines through the town of Greenwood 10 or 12 feet apart. If the people of that vicinity are held by the use here alleged to have acquired a right, not subject to railroad purposes, to the space not actually occupied by the railroad tracks, it would inevitably interfere with the construction of side tracks or double tracks, which the development of the country may render essential to the public convenience and welfare, but also with the present operation of trains. The rule founded on legal principles and demanded by public necessity is thus stated in Jones on Easements, § 281: "A prescriptive right to a passageway along the track or right of way of a railroad cannot be acquired by the public or by individuals while the railroad company has constantly used a single track over such right of way. The construction and operation of one track upon its location is an assertion of right to the entire width of its right of way. The presence of a track constantly in use is a defiant badge of ownership, and the only practical assertion of title that can be made. If the public has used paths by the side of the railroad track for any length of time, the use must be considered as permissive, and not adverse. An injunction will be issued in behalf of the railroad company to restrain any interference with the laying of a second track over such part of its way as has been used by the public as a footway for more than twenty-one years." R. R. Co. v. Freeport (Pa.) 20 Atl. 940.

The complaint alleges this narrow strip had been used by the public for more than 20 years before the accident occurred, but it does not allege it was not used by the railroads for the purposes for which a right of way is acquired, or that it was not necessary for those purposes, or that the foot travel over it was inconsistent with railroad uses, or in any way hostile or adverse. The bald statement that "the public had acquired a prescriptive right to travel" on this strip is a mere legal conclusion, which, so far from being supported by the allegation of fact, is negatived by the statement that the public use was "with the knowledge, acquiescence, and consent" of the defendants. Bailey v. Gray, 53 S. C. 514, 81 S. E. 354. Under the allegations of the complaint, we conclude there was no public right of passage acquired by prescription between the tracks of the Southern Railway and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway.

It should be observed, the conclusion that the public cannot acquire a way on a railroad right of way by prescription which is founded on the presumption of a deed does not imply that title to portions of the right of way may not be acquired by adverse possession which is founded on possession hostile to the true owner. Neither adverse possession nor the doctrine of equitable estoppel, referred to in Crocker v. Collins, 37 S. C. 333, 15 S. E. 951, 84 Am. St. Rep. 752, is involved in this case. While a railroad company cannot lose its right of way by alienation or prescription, because of the public's interest in its holding it for public purposes, it may impose upon itself as a private corporation duties and obligations to the public or to individuals by inviting the use of the right of way, or indicating its willingness that it should be used by the public or particular individuals. In such circumstances the duty devolves on the railroad company to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury to those so using the right of way. This rule is not peculiar to railroads, but is of general application. The invitation need not be expressed in words, but may be implied in a number of ways; such, for instance, as the actual construction or repairing by the railroad company of a road or a bridge along the right of way, which would not be suggestive of any other use except travel on foot or in the ordinary vehicles of the country. The allegation here is that the defendants acquiesced and consented for many years to the use by the public of a "well-beaten path, a regular traveled place," along the right of way of the Southern and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railroads, and at right angles to the track of the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railroad. "Acquiescence and consent" convey the meaning, not only of knowledge and recognition on the part of the defendants of the alleged use of the right of way, but actual concurrence in such use. The complaint does not allege that the acquiescence and consent on which plaintiff's intestate would have been authorized by law to rely in undertaking to travel the path was evidenced only by the fact that there was "a well-beaten path, a regular traveled place," but, assuming this to be plaintiff's position, the complaint still states a cause of action. It is true that a railroad track is itself a danger signal to pedestrians. All persons in possession of reason must be held to know that, so far from a railroad company being able to construct its road with regard to the safety of those who walk on it, it must have numerous dangerous cattle guards, cuts, and trestles, and that no adequate speed of trains could be maintained if those in charge of them had to have concern for persons who take the risk, unbidden, of walking on the track or right of way. Hence, ordinarily, those who walk along or across railroads, however general the practice may be, are trespassers, taking upon themselves all the risks; and the railroad company owes them no duty except not to harm them willfully or wantonly. Jones v. Ry. Co., 61 S. C. 560, 39 S. E. 758; Smalley v. Ry. Co., 57 S. C. 243, 35 S. E. 489. But where a railroad company allows the public to use its right of way for a long time at a particular place in a large town so continuously and frequently that it becomes a well-beaten or clearly defined path, plain and open, a reasonable man may well infer that he will not encounter unguarded cuts and the other dangers of the ordinary path along the track. In such a case the owner of the property knows and acquiesces in the use, and by his acquiescence those wishing to go in that direction are lured into a sense of safety in following the course obviously taken by those who have preceded them. If the owners, or those in control of the property, fail to observe ordinary care in avoiding injury to persons who travel the path, relying on the safety suggested by the implied invitation, they must be held responsible.

A contrary view is taken in some cases of very high authority. Redigan v. R. R. Co., 155 Mass. 44, 28 N. E. 1133, 14 L. R. A. 276, 31 Am. St. Rep. 520; R. R. Co. v. Arnola (Miss.) 29 South. 768, 84 Am. St. Rep. 645; Devoe v. R. R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 43 Atl. 899; Griswold v. R. R. Co. (Mass.) 67 N. E. 354; Ry. Co. v. Martin, 14 Neb. 295, 15 N. W. 696; Ry. Co. v. Griffin (Ind. Sup.) 50 Am. Rep. 783; Lingenfelter v. R. Co. (Ind. Sup.) 55 N. E. 1021; 3 Elliott on Railroads, § 1154. The general rule, in which all the courts agree, however, is that the owner of property is held to ordinary care to avoid injury to one who enters his premises by invitation, express or implied; but the variance is as to what facts imply an invitation. In the cases above mentioned it is held that acquiescence in the use of the right of way for a long time, indicated by a plain, well-defined road or path at a particular point, manifestly differing from the ordinary path along the track, does not imply invitation or suggestion to the public to use the path, except where the path is used as an approach to the company's place of business by those having occasion to transact business with the company.

The rule as we have stated it, which is contrary to the doctrine laid down in the above cases, seems to require nothing more than ordinary good conduct on the part of the owner in the use of his property, to the end that injury to his neighbor may be avoided; and we think it is supported by the current of judicial opinion. Jones v. Ry. Co., 61 S. C. 560, 39 S. E. 758; Hansen v. So.

A. 686, 48 Am. St. Rep. 547; note, 26 L. R. A. 688; 23 A. & E. Ency. Law, 732. The English cases are to the same effect. It is, of course, always a question for the jury to determine whether the way was so plain and so constantly used, with the acquiescence and consent of the owner, as to imply an invitation to the public to enter.

It is noteworthy that while in the case of Redigan v. R. R. Co., supra, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts seemed to take very advanced ground against the doctrine that invitation may be implied from such conditions as are above stated, yet in the case of Chenery v. R. R. Co., 35 N. E. 554, 22 L. R. A. 575, it holds, while long use by the public of a well-defined path across a railroad track does not, as a matter of law, import a license, still it presents a question of fact for the jury as to whether a license is to be implied, which would subject the railroad to liability for negligence.

The New York Court of Appeals and the courts of some other states hold that, where injury results from mere passive omission of the railroad company to guard or give notice of a dangerous place on its right of way, where the public has been accustomed to use it in the manner indicated above, no liability will be incurred for resulting accident, but that the company will be liable for injury resulting from its active negligence at such place; as, for instance, in running its trains without looking out for the safety of travelers, or digging a pit, or placing explosives, without adequate notice, at a place where it has acquiesced in the general and frequent use by the public of its railroad track. Barry v. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 44 Am. Rep. 377; Byrne v. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) 10 N. E. 539, 58 Am. Rep. 512; Felton v. Aubrey, 74 Fed. 350, 20 C. C. A. 436. This distinction may fairly be supported on the ground that the people at large may well be held to have notice of the dangers already existing along the path they are accustomed to travel, and the owner may properly assume that they enter the premises in full contemplation of the danger, and of their own volition assume the risk; but they do not assume the risk of dangers brought upon them unexpectedly by the owner of the property. The distinction should not apply to that portion of the public who are not familiar with the dangers of the way, but enter it with sufficient reason to infer it has been used by the public with safety. Applying this view to the allegations of the complaint in this case will, we think, make its reasonableness obvious. Those who walked in the path here described entered not a public highway, but the property of the railroad companies as licensees; and, even if they did so in pursuance of an invitation, express or implied, but knew of the existence of the cut and its dangerous condition, they accepted the invitation in full view of the danger, and for their own convenience voluntarily assumed it. In such case, it seems clear the railroad companies would not be responsible for resulting injuries. But, if the jury should find the path is of the kind to invite entrance and suggest safety, one who enters, relying upon this invitation, in ignorance of danger, and falls into a deep, unguarded cut, at right angles to the path, may hold the railroad companies responsible, in the absence of contributory negligence, if they had reason to expect such persons to enter. The allegation here is that the plaintiff's intestate did not know of the cut or surroundings, and could not see it on account of darkness. We venture to suggest that if this distinction between those who know the danger and those who do not is borne in mind it will reconcile in some measure the apparent conflict of authority on this subject.

Before leaving this branch of the case, it may be well to observe there is an obvious difference between a case like this, where there are allegations of such apparent use by the public as to suggest safety and invite entrance, and the turn-table and other cases of that nature, such as Bridger v. R. R. Co., 25 S. C. 24; Ry. Co. v. Beavers (Ga.) 39 S. E. 82, 54 L. R. A. 314, and Ryan v. Towar (Mich.) 87 N. W. 644, 55 L. R. A. 310, 92 Am. St. Rep. 481, where there is no indication of invitation, or even willingness, that the person injured should enter, the entry being merely a trespass to gratify curiosity, or to attain some other end peculiar to the particular individual.

The appellants insist, however, that the attempt of plaintiff's intestate to use a path between two railroad tracks, with which he was unacquainted, in the darkness of night, was itself such carelessness on his part as to warrant the court in dismissing the complaint on the ground of contributory negligence. Whether there was contributory negligence by Partlow in this respect, which was the proximate cause of his death, depends on the character of the path, and possibly on many other circumstances, which are for the consideration of the jury. The case of Jarrell v. R. R. Co., 58 S. C. 491, 36 S. E. 910, therefore does not apply, for the reason that we cannot say, as a matter of law, that no other conclusion could be drawn than that plaintiff's intestate was guilty of contributory negligence, which was the proximate cause of his death. No detailed discussion of this point is attempted, because the case is to be heard by a jury.

Having reached the conclusion that the complaint states a cause of action, the remaining question is whether the defendants can be held jointly liable. It will be observed there is no allegation that any one of the three companies had improperly constructed its road. The charge is not that the cut which made the danger and into which Partlow fell was improperly constructed and located, but that, owing to the kind of path that led to it over the right of way of the Southern Railway and the Charleston & Western Carolina Railway, these defendants, after the cut was made, owed the duty to Partlow, entering it as one of the public, either to properly notify the public not to use the path, or to guard or warn by obstructions or lights. The wrong, if any, was in inviting Partlow into a place of danger, known to them, but not to him, without warning or safeguard; and it was of no consequence that the danger was not created by these companies, but by the rightful action of another railroad in making the cut. If, under such circumstances, he was injured without fault on his part, they should be held liable. On the other hand, the lessees of the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway cannot avoid liability on the ground that it had no part in allowing the use of the path, and had never in any way consented to such an approach to its cut. It is alleged the Georgia, Carolina & Northern Railway Company knew of the existence and nature of the path when it made the cut, which was dangerous to pedestrians because of its being across the path at right angles. It will hardly be disputed that one who rightfully makes a ditch or cut, dangerous to travelers, across a well-defined way, with knowledge that it has for a long time been used as a public way, and gives no warning and places no safeguard, will be liable to those who, without fault of their own, are injured thereby. If there was any duty to safeguard the cut, it seems clear that it was a duty which devolved upon each of the defendants. From this conclusion it results that the defendants were properly sued jointly. "If two or more persons owe to another the same duty, and by their common neglect of that duty he is injured, doubtless the tort is joint, and upon well-settled principles each, any, or all of the tortfeasors may be held. But when each of two or more persons owe to another a separate duty, which each wrongfully neglects to perform, then, although the duties were diverse and disconnected, and the neglect of each was without concert, if such several neglects concurred and united together in causing injury, the tort is equally joint, and the tortfeasors are subject to a like liability." Matthews v. R. R. Co. (N. J. Sup.) 27 Atl. 919, 22 L. R. A. 262. See, also, Peoria v. Simpson (Ill.) 51 Am. Rep. 683. The allegations of this complaint would bring the case even within the Pennsylvania rule, which is much stricter as to joint liability than that above stated. Klauder v. McGrath (Pa.) 78 Am. Dec. 329. The cases of Langhorne v. Ry. Co. (Va.) 22 S. E. 159, and Howard v. Union Traction Co., 195 Pa. 391, 45 Atl. 1076, on which appellants rely, may be readily distinguished from this case.

It is quite obvious the allegations of this complaint are very different from those which were held insufficient in Dorn v. Ry. Co., 58 S. C. 364, 38 S. E. 654.

The exceptions are overruled, and the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

GARY, A. J., concurs in the result.

SOUTH BOUND R. R. v. BURTON. SAME v. TAYLOR. SAME v. HIGBEE. SAME v. DAY. SAME v. PIERCE. SAME v. FINLEY. SAME v. GREER. SAME v. HOLMES.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 28, 1903.)

RAILROADS—USE OF CITY STREET—RIGHT OF ABUTTING OWNERS—ELEMENTS OF DAMAGE—ESTOPPEL.

1. Under the act of 1786 (4 St. at Large, p. 751) under which the city of Columbia was founded, the state owns the fee of the streets. In 1871 the Legislature empowered the council to lay out new streets and to widen or otherwise alter those then in use, subject to the constitutional provision against taking private property without compensation, and the statutory provision as to the method of acquiring property for street purposes. Held that, if the city council authorized the operation of a railroad in a street, an abutting owner was entitled to damages for the substantial depreciation of the value of his lot.

2. The measure of damages for the use of a street by a railroad company is the decline in the value of the property because of the noise, smoke, loss of light and air, increased risk of fire, and material interference with ingress and egress, so far as they depreciated the value of the lots.

3. Possession by a railway company of a portion of a street, without interference on the part of the public, may afford ground to estop the public from questioning the title of such company.

WOODS, J. The South Bound Railway Company brought these separate actions against the several defendants to enjoin them from prosecuting statutory proceedings instituted to obtain compensation for depreciation of their property in the city of Columbia, resulting from the construction and operation of the plaintiff's railroad through Lincoln street. All of the lots abut on Lincoln street, except lot No. 2 of the defendants, Eliza Burton and her co-tenants, which is contiguous to their lot No. 1 on that street. The circuit judge, upon trial of the case, dissolved the temporary injunctions, holding that all the defendants were entitled to have their damages assessed under the condemnation statute. The act of 1786 (4 St. at Large, p. 751), under which the city of Columbia was founded, provided that the land acquired by the commissioners for that purpose should be held by them "for the use of this state," but it directs them to lay off lots and streets of prescribed dimensions. In 1871 the Legislature empowered the city council to "lay out new streets, close up, widen or otherwise alter those now in use," subject to the constitutional prohibition against taking private property without compensation, and the statutory provisions as to the method of acquiring property for street purposes and assessing damages. Under this authority the city council, on September 28, 1899, authorized the South Bound Railroad Company to build its road through Lincoln street.

The appellant takes the position that the state, under the act of 1786, remains the absolute owner of all streets of the city, that abutting owners can acquire no rights therein against it, and, since it enjoins the city council to close up or alter the streets, the authorization by the council to use Lincoln street was equivalent to direct authority to the railroad from the state. We incline to think the appellant's view is correct, that the rights acquired by the state in the lands upon which the city of Columbia was laid off are similar to those of the United States in the lands upon which the national capital is built. In both instances the streets were laid off under public authority, and commissioners directed to sell lots with reference to those streets; and under such circumstances the public faith is pledged not to destroy or materially interfere with the street privilege, which it created as an inducement to purchasers. This principle was not involved in Van Ness v. Mayor, 4 Pet. 232, 7 L. Ed. 842, or Potomac Steamboat Co. v. Upper Potomac Steamboat Co., 109 U. S. 672, 3 Sup. Ct. 445, 27 L. Ed. 1070, relied on by appellant. Conveyance to the purchaser of lots abutting on a street carries with it the property rights to the reasonable use of the street, of which he cannot be deprived for even a public purpose without compensation. Hot Springs R.

R. Co. v. Williamson, 34 L. Ed. 355, note; Railroad Co. v. Applegate (Ky.) 83 Am. Dec. 497; Haynes v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 48; Lewis on Eminent Domain, § 114. But whatever may be the rights of the state in this regard, it is clear that the Legislature did not by the act of 1871 intend to confer on the city council the absolute power over the streets which appellant attributes to the state. Fair interpretation of the act leads to the conclusion that it only gives such control of streets as is usually exercised by such officers, which is subject to the constitutional burden of making compensation for the taking of private property. It may be true that, where the state by charter authorizes the construction of a railroad on a definite line, the right is implied to enter and cross the land of the state on that line; but this implication does not extend to the destruction or impairment of private property rights which others have acquired with respect to such land in consequence of an antecedent contract with the state. It is manifest, therefore, the respondents having acquired property rights in Lincoln street by reason of the state's sale of the abutting lots to their grantors, with an implied contract that the purchasers should have the usual benefits and privileges of abutting owners, the state could not, though the owner of the street, authorize the taking away of such benefits and privileges without compensation.

The vital question, therefore, is whether the construction of a railroad through Lincoln street is such curtailment of the usual street privileges as entitles an owner of abutting lots to compensation for the depreciation in value of his property arising from the railroad use. It is insisted such depreciation does not amount to taking property, but only damaging it, and hence cannot form the basis of a proceeding under our Constitution and statute, which only provide compensation for "taking." It is not to be doubted, as said in Transportation Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. Ed. 336, "The state, and the city council as its agents, had full power over the highways of the city to improve them for the uses for which they were made highways." Those who purchase city lots, in the absence of statutory protection, take them subject to the exercise of the discretion of the city authorities to improve the streets for the uses for which they were made highways. It is true, in Garraux v. Greenville, 53 S. C. 577, 31 S. E. 597, the court said: "The great weight of authority is to the effect that a change in the grade of a street which diminishes the value of the adjacent property is not a taking of property, within the constitutional provision above quoted." Similar expressions are used in Water Co. v. Greenville, 53 S. C. 89, 30 S. E. 699. These are correct statements of the law applicable to those cases, both of which involved claims for damages arising from a change of grade made in improving a street; for the claimants there held their property subject to the right of the city council to improve the street by changing the grade, and hence such alteration could not involve the taking of a property right, for none existed as against the discretion of the council to change and improve the street. 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 990. The depreciation of value produced by building an ordinary railroad through a street presents a very different question. The operation of a railroad running to distant points is not a street purpose. It is not ordinarily used to transport either freight or passengers from one part of a city to another, and has no direct connection with a city's internal traffic or travel, which are the distinctive uses of its streets. Hence the building and operation of a railroad through a street cannot be regarded such a street use as to require the abutting landowner to submit to the total or partial obstruction of the value of his property without compensation. Causing such depreciation is clearly destroying or taking property. Property is not only ownership of particular lands or chattels, but it embraces the value they have by reason of their legal relations to all other things. All rights in a street which the residents of a city have in common are administered, under legislative authority, by the city council as trustees for all its citizens, and hence the council's consent to the use of the street by the railroad company is binding on the city at large (Cherry v. Rock Hill, 48 S. C. 560, 26 S. E. 798); but an abutting landowner has a special property in the benefits derived from the street on which his land is situated, by reason of its relation to the street, which differs in kind and degree from the interest of the municipal public, and the destruction or any impairment of these benefits for other than street purposes, which materially lessen its value, is taking private property. This view seems clearly correct in principle, and we think it is supported by the great weight of authority even in those states where, as in this state, the constitutional and statute law do not provide for compensation for damage to property when taken for a public purpose. Wilkins v. Gaffney, 54 S. C. 199, 32 S. E. 299; Abendroth v. Railroad Co. (N. Y.) 25 N. E. 496, 11 L. R. A. 634, 19 Am. St. Rep. 461; Story v. Railroad Co., 90 N. Y. 122, 43 Am. Rep. 146; White v. Railroad (N. C.) 18 S. E. 330, 22 L. R. A. 627, 37 Am. St. Rep. 639; Railroad Co. v. Steiner, 44 Ga. 546; Elliott on Roads & Streets, 528; 1 Lewis on Eminent Domain, 240. As was intimated in Ross v. Ry. Co., 83 S. C. 483, 12 S. E. 101, and Leitzey v. Water Power Co., 47 S. C. 464, 25 S. E. 744, 34 L. R. A. 215, it would be a very narrow and technical construction not to hold that the term "lands," used in the condemnation statute, embraces "all rights and easements growing thereout." The case of McLauchlin v. Ry. Co., 5 Rich. Law, 596, was decided under constitutional and statute law essentially different from those now in force; but even if this was not the case, we should be forced to overrule it on this point on principle as well as under the authorities above cited.

The great majority of the older authorities sustain appellant's view that the doctrine above stated applies only where the owner of the abutting property also owns the fee in the street, but not where he has only an easement, the fee being in the state or the city. A careful collation of the cases supporting this position is found in 2 Dillon on Mun. Corp. § 702, note. But this doctrine is now completely overturned. 2 Dillon on Mun. Corp. §§ 704, 723c; Story v. Railroad Co., supra; Lahr v. Railroad Co., 104 N. Y. 268, 10 N. E. 528; White v. Railroad, supra; Theobald v. Railway Co. (Miss.) 6 South. 230, 4 L. R. A. 735, 14 Am. St. Rep. 504; McQuaid v. Railway Co. (Or.) 22 Pac. 899; Kaufman v. Railroad Co. (Wash.) 40 Pac. 137; Adams v. Railroad Co. (Minn.) 39 N. W. 629, 1 L. R. A. 493, 12 Am. St. Rep. 644. It is difficult to imagine a right more empty and theoretical than private ownership of the fee in the street of an established city. The possibility of regaining possession of the property by abandonment of the street is so remote that it may ordinarily be regarded a negligible factor. The adjacent owner has no present beneficial use differing in the slightest degree from that which is acquired by a purchaser, for himself and his assigns, who buys a lot abutting on a street laid out by the state or the city on its own land. In the one case in his dedication he retains, and in the other, by the state's or the city's dedication, he acquires, certain street privileges which constitute property.

But it is not the mere laying of a railroad track and the operation of a railroad in a street that would entitle abutting landowners to compensation, when, as in these cases, they have not the fee in the street, and have, therefore, not even a technical interest in it beyond the right to use it for street purposes. Hence it is only the substantial depreciation of the value of the abutting lots that can be assessed in their favor, and the measure of the assessment is the decline in the value of the property consequent upon the use of the street by the railroad. The difference in value should be substantial, and not fanciful or conjectural, for the advance of society imports increased friction among its members; and, if the law sanctioned the holding up for compensation of public and private enterprises on account of mere inconvenience or annoyance, it would impede rather than promote the public welfare. We shall not attempt to add anything to the very clear statement of the law on this subject made by Mr. Justice Jones in Allen v. Union Oil Co., 59 S. C. 578, 38 S. E. 274. It is there held that there must be some substantial physical injury to the real estate, not merely discomfort, inconvenience, or bodily injury to the person of the owner. The jarring of the building, noise, smoke, vapors, loss of light and air, increased risk of fire from sparks, material interference with ingress and egress, set forth in each of the answers, are all items which may enter into the estimate, but only so far as they depreciate the value of the lots. Bowen v. Railroad Co., 17 S. C. 579; Board of Trade v. Darst, 85 Am. St. Rep. 306, note; Egerer v. Railroad Co. (N. Y.) 14 L. R. A. 381, note; Case v. Minot (Mass.) 22 L. R. A. 543, note. The loss of light and air cannot be excluded from consideration, as appellant contends, under the authority of Bailey v. Grey, 53 S. C. 515, 31 S. E. 354, and Napier v. Bullwinkle, 5 Rich. 301, for these cases only hold that the right to light and air cannot be acquired by prescription, and do not touch this question. The case of Manson v. Railroad Co., 64 S. C. 121, 41 S. E. 832, does not apply, because in that case the court held those claiming damages had no legal interest in Sydney Park, near which their lands were situated, differing in kind from that of other residents of the city of Columbia.

We proceed to the consideration of the several cases, in view of the legal conclusion above stated. The jury determines the amount of the assessment; the court can only fix the principles on which it should be made. If the foregoing statement of the law is correct, it will not be denied that the injunction in the case of Martha Holmes must be dissolved. Maria L. Taylor, Eliza Burton and her co-tenants, Mary E. Higbee, John N. Finley, and Aaron Greer have corner lots, and hence have access from another street. This fact may lessen the depreciation, but it does not destroy their right to have the loss of value assessed.

It is alleged that Emma L. Pierce, Margaret Day, John N. Finley, Mary E. Higbee, and Eliza Burton and her co-tenants have encroached on Lincoln street, and it is contended that, in so far as the injury to the lots of these parties arises from, or is increased by, such encroachment, they can make no claim against the railroad company. The appellant has attacked with great force the conclusion reached by the court in Crocker v. Collins, 37 S. C. 334, 15 S. E. 953, 34 Am. Rep. 752: "We think, therefore, that mere adverse possession, for the statutory period, of a street or alley in a town, which is a public highway, cannot confer a title. But where such possession is accompanied with other circumstances which would render it inequitable that the public should assert its rights to regain possession, then, upon the principle of estoppel, a party may be protected against the assertion of right by the public, in order to prevent manifest wrong and injustice. For example, when a party, under an honest conviction of right, has taken possession of a portion of one of the streets or alleys of a town, and expended his money in erecting buildings thereon, without interference on the part of the public, these, or perhaps other circumstances connected with adverse possession for the statutory period, may afford good ground for estoppel." This doctrine has been repudiated by courts of high authority, but it has much to commend it. Certainly the argument against it is not sufficiently strong to warrant the court in overruling the case. We think there is sufficient evidence to sustain the conclusion of the circuit judge that these cases fell within the rule stated in that case. Lot No. 2, of Eliza Burton and her co-tenants, does not abut on Lincoln street, and they have not, by virtue of such ownership, any property rights in its street privileges differing from those of the general public. For this reason, the injunction in their case must be made permanent as to this lot. Cherry v. Rock Hill, supra; Manson v. Railroad Co., supra; Aldrich v. Railroad Co. (Ill.) 63 N. E. 155, 57 L. R. A. 237.

With the modification indicated above, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

DICKSON v. BURCKMYER et al. (two cases).

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 28, 1903.)

COUNTY TAXES—LEVY—SCHOOL TAX—POWER OF COUNTY BOARD—COMPUTATION—HARMLESS ERROR—SALE—TITLE DEED—SEIZURE BY SHERIFF—EXCESSIVE LEVY—ASSIGNMENT OF BID—RIGHTS OF LANDOWNER.

1. A levy of county tax by the Legislature without levy by county authorities is valid.

2. Under 23 St. at Large, p. 157, § 18, providing that county commissioners shall levy a tax in their respective counties for the support of public schools, the county board has no power to do anything other than see that the school tax is entered for collection, and entry of the tax without action by the county commissioners does not affect its validity.

3. Const. art. 11, § 6, providing that county boards shall levy an annual tax on all the property in their respective counties, to be collected at the same time and by the same officers as other taxes, confers only administrative power on the board of county commissioners as to the school tax.

4. Under Code 1902, § 355, where the sum resulting from the computation of the tax on any particular parcel of property requires for its exact expression any fraction less than a half mill, such fraction should be dropped.

5. An error in taxes collected by execution of $1 is too small to render the sale invalid where it is not shown to have interfered with payment by the owner, or causes a sale of a larger piece of property than otherwise would have been sold.

6. Code 1902, § 421, requires the auditor to issue tax executions to the sheriff in duplicate, and prescribes the form in which the execution shall run; and the sheriff is directed, on sale, to attach the duplicate to the title deed. Held, that the fact that the sheriff attached the original, instead of the duplicate, to the deed, is immaterial.

7. Under Code 1902, § 423, a sheriff, under a tax execution, must "seize and take exclusive possession of so much of the defaulting taxpayer's estate" as is necessary to raise the amount of the tax.

8. Whether a sheriff made an excessive levy of tax is an issue for the jury, and the fact that the land sold for 10 times as much as the amount of the taxes is not conclusive.

9. A bid at tax sale may be assigned by the purchaser.

10. An objection that the tax execution did not specify the amount of taxes to each fund is not well founded.

11. A sale of real estate for taxes not made for cash is invalid.

12. Failure of owner of land to have the tax sale thereof suspended, under 20 St. at Large, p. 52, § 3, is not a bar to an action against the purchaser at tax sale for possession of the land within two years.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Beaufort County; Klugh, Judge.

Actions by Eliza O. Dickson, by J. M. Dickson, guardian ad litem, against Cornelius Burckmyer and others, and by Marion Rush Dickson, by J. M. Dickson, guardian ad litem, against same defendants. From an order overruling demurrer, both parties appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiffs allege that the tax deed in question was invalid for the following reasons:

"(1) The fiscal authorities of the county of Beaufort failed and neglected to levy a tax for county purposes for the county of Beaufort for the fiscal year beginning January 1, 1899, upon all the taxable property in said county, or upon any part thereof, as required by article 10, § 13, of the Constitution.

"(2) The county board of commissioners of the county of Beaufort failed and neglected to levy a tax of three mills on the dollar upon all the taxable property in said county, or upon any part of it, for the public schools for the county of Beaufort for the fiscal year beginning January 1, 1899, as required by article 11, § 6, of the Constitution.

"(3) There has been no valid levy for county or school taxes for the county of Beaufort for the fiscal year beginning January 1, 1899, as required by law, and the execution issued to enforce the payment of such taxes is void.

"(4) The auditor of the county of Beaufort entered upon the tax duplicate for the fiscal year beginning January 1, 1899, the sum to be levied upon the real estate of W. F. Proctor for county and school purposes, without having received from the officers or authorities legally empowered to determine the rate or amount of taxes to be levied for school and county purposes statements of the rates and sums to be levied for the current year, as required by section 287, Rev. St. S. C. 1893.

"(5) The real estate listed in the name of William F. Proctor (975 acres) consisted of two separate tracts, to wit, the Cotton Hall Farm, containing 600 acres, and the Winterdale Place, containing 875 acres; and the said auditor failed and neglected to enter either upon his own duplicate, or upon the duplicate for the county treasurer, for said fiscal year, the taxes upon each of said parcels of land, as required by sections 287 and 289, Rev. St. 1893.

"(6) The said county auditor for said fiscal year assessed against the said property, listed in the name of W. F. Proctor, for all purposes added together, a rate of taxation (14¼ mills) resulting in a fraction less than one-half mill, and failed to drop said fraction of one-fourth of one mill, as required by section 288, Rev. St. 1893.

"(7) The said county auditor for said fiscal year entered upon his own duplicate, and upon the duplicate for the county treasurer, against the said property listed in the name of W. F. Proctor, taxes for all purposes amounting to $34.49. Said property assessed at $2,350 would have been chargeable at the rate of 14¼ mills for all purposes, with taxes (if otherwise legal) to the amount of $33.4875. Said auditor has therefore overtaxed said property to the amount of one dollar and one-fourth of one cent, for which excessive and illegal amount the tax execution also called.

"(8) That the county auditor of Beaufort county, upon the expiration of the time allowed by law for the payment of the taxes for said fiscal year, failed, as required by section 347, Rev. St. 1893, to issue a warrant or execution in duplicate against William F. Proctor, the alleged defaulting taxpayer, but, on the contrary, partially filled out an original and duplicate tax execution, and delivered the original to the said sheriff, retaining the duplicate in his office, attached to the stub of his tax execution book. That the duplicate so retained as aforesaid by the treasurer is illegal and fatally defective, in that the portion of the same beginning with the words, 'These are, therefore' (as shown in the form set out in the above section of the Revised Statutes), is blank, with nothing thereafter except the signature of the treasurer and the name of the county; and the original, wrongfully attached to the deed delivered to defendants by the said sheriff, is similarly and in other respects defective and illegal.

"(9) That the said sheriff annexed to the deed executed by him to the defendants as aforesaid the original tax execution, and not the duplicate, as required by section 349, Rev. St. 1893.

"(10) That the said sheriff has not levied, seized, or taken exclusive possession of the whole or of any part of the real estate hereinbefore referred to. That upon receipt of the tax execution hereinbefore referred to from the county treasurer, the said sheriff sent the same, with a large batch of other executions, to Roger Pinckney, a magistrate of Beaufort county, for collection. That said Roger Pinckney intrusted the same to his constable for collection, who reported to him that he could not collect it. That said Roger Pinckney so reported to the sheriff, and returned the execution. That the said sheriff took no further legal steps in the matter, except to advertise and sell the land. That he never went upon the premises either in person or by deputy.

only $34.49; the penalty of 15 per cent. amounted to $5.17; making a total of $39.66. On March 15, 1900, James M. Dickson, father of this plaintiff, sent, for the purpose of paying the taxes upon the said 975 acres, to the county treasurer, a check for $34.49, which the treasurer had in his hands at the time the said execution was issued, leaving a balance of the penalty only $5.17. That said sheriff was informed of said payment, but, notwithstanding, attempted to levy and sell the entire real estate of 975 acres for the payment of the amount alleged to be due, $39.66, and costs of levy, advertisement, and sale. That said attempted levy and sale were in direct violation of section 349, Rev. St. 1893, which directs the sheriff to seize and take exclusive possession of only 'so much of the defaulting taxpayer's estate, real or personal, as may be necessary to raise the sum of money named therein.' That the said check was not returned by the treasurer to said J. M. Dickson until June 18, 1900, after the alleged sale on June 5, 1900.

"(12) That on June 7, 1900, the said sheriff notified the said J. M. Dickson that upon payment by him of $13.45, the balance claimed to be due, he (the sheriff) would withdraw the sale, and forward receipt. That thereupon the said J. M. Dickson forwarded to the sheriff the said amount, which, however, was returned by the sheriff, with the statement that the land had been sold, and that the purchasers demanded a deed for the same.

"(13) That said attempted levy and sale were excessive, contrary to the spirit and letter of the law, and null and void.

"(14) That at said alleged sale the said real estate was bid off by one C. L. Paul, Jr., at the price of $435. That he did not comply with the terms of sale.

"(15) That the deed from the sheriff to the defendants Cornelius Burckmyer and H. G. Burckmyer is witnessed by C. L. Paul, Jr., who has an interest in said real estate. Said deed is therefore void.

"(16) That the alleged execution fails to state the amount of taxes to each fund, as required by section 347, Rev. St. 1893, and directs the sheriff to collect more, by $1.0025, than the entire property was liable for, as shown in 7, supra.

"(17) That the sale of said real estate was not advertised according to law, and was not made for cash.

"(18) That the title to said real estate was in the plaintiff at the time the taxes were or ought to have been levied, and at the time the alleged execution was issued."

T. P. Cothran, for plaintiffs. Wm. Elliott, Jr., for defendants.

WOODS, J. The plaintiffs in these two cases sue separately to recover different parcels of land, but the actions, in other respects being based on the same allegations of fact, and involving the same legal questions, were heard together by consent in the circuit court and in this court. The defendants demurred to each of the complaints on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. In overruling the demurrers, the circuit judge decided a number of interesting questions, and both sides have appealed.

It appears from the complaints that one Wm. F. Proctor was the owner of two tracts of land in Beaufort county, known as "Cotton Hall Farm" and "Winterdale Place," containing, respectively, 600 acres and 375 acres, and that on November 15, 1898, he conveyed Cotton Hall Farm to the plaintiff Marlon Rush Dickson, and Winterdale Place to the plaintiff Eliza De C. Dickson. Under his conveyances they seek to recover in these actions the lands from the defendants, Cornelius Burckmyer and H. G. Burckmyer, who, as the complaints allege, claim title by virtue of a purchase of both tracts together as one tract at a sale made by the sheriff of Beaufort county under a tax execution against W. F. Proctor, issued for taxes claimed to be due for the fiscal year beginning January 1, 1899; the sheriff's deed therefor having been executed on or about June 18, 1900.

The plaintiffs, under 18 different heads, allege facts concerning the levy and assessment of the taxes and the sale by the sheriff which they insist make the sale illegal and void. The demurrers raise the question whether, assuming these allegations to be true, the defendants' title would be defeated by any or all of them. The grounds upon which the tax title is assailed, as stated by the plaintiffs, will be printed in the report of the cases, and we proceed to their consideration without quoting the complaint or the exceptions. In considering these grounds, it should be borne in mind that the right to tax property, so essential to the very existence of government, under the laws of this state, can be enforced only by subjecting property to sale for nonpayment of taxes assessed against it. To hold tax sales invalid for slight and technical irregularities would therefore be to unreasonably embarrass the state in the collection of its revenue. The sound view is that all requirements of the law leading up to tax sales which are intended for the protection of the taxpayer against surprise or the sacrifice of his property are to be regarded mandatory, and are to be strictly enforced. On the other hand, those provisions of the statute designed merely for the guidance of the officer, in order to secure the due and orderly conduct of the public business, concern the state only, and, as to the individual taxpayer, are to be regarded directory; and the courts will not, in his behalf, declare a tax sale void for failure by the officer to follow the strict letter of such provisions of law. Cooley on Taxation, 471; French v. Edwards, 80 U. S. 510, 20 L. Ed. 702. The questions here involved should be considered in view of this general principle.

The plaintiffs' first position is that, although the tax levy for county purposes for the year 1899 was fixed by the General Assembly, the tax sale was of no effect, because the fiscal authorities of Beaufort county failed to levy this tax, as provided by article 10, § 13, of the Constitution of the state. We agree with the circuit judge, that the case of Railway Co. v. Kay, 62 S. C. 28, 39 S. E. 785, is directly opposed to the plaintiffs' view.

The next question is whether there was a valid levy of the three-mills school tax provided by article 11, § 6, of the Constitution, in these words: "The existing county boards of commissioners of the several counties, or such officer or officers as may hereafter be vested with the same or similar powers and duties, shall levy an annual tax of three mills on the dollar upon all taxable property in their respective counties, which tax shall be collected at the same time and by the same officers as the other taxes for the same year."

* * * Section 13 of "An act to raise supplies," etc., for the fiscal year commencing January 1, 1899 (23 St. at Large, p. 157), is as follows: "That the county board of commissioners in each of the several counties of this state shall levy a tax of three (3) mills on the dollar upon all taxable property of their respective counties, for the support of public schools in their respective counties, which shall be collected at the same time and by the same officer as the other taxes for this year, and shall be held in the county treasuries of the respective counties and paid out exclusively for the support of public schools, as provided by law." This school tax was charged against the land in dispute by the county auditor, but the complaint alleges no levy was made by the county board of commissioners.

Whether this was a legal tax, depends upon the meaning to be given to the word "levy," as used in the sections of the Constitution and of the statute above quoted. Does it import that some distinct official action by the county board of commissioners was necessary before the tax could be entered for collection? It will be observed that the Constitution is mandatory in requiring the levy to be made by the county board of commissioners, and leaves no discretion of any kind to that board. After much consideration, the constitutional convention of 1895 rejected a proposition to require the General Assembly at each regular session "to empower and authorize" the county board of commissioners to levy an annual tax "not exceeding three mills." In the most explicit language, the Constitution has thus made the three-mill school tax a permanent charge on all property, not to be lessened by any official action short of constitutional amendment. Fixing the rate of taxation, and ordering that it shall be levied, is the creation of the tax. This excludes from the act of levying, which is required of the county board of commissioners, any signification of creation. The duty to levy imposed on the board is therefore purely ministerial, and only imports that it should take such action as would result in the tax being placed on the auditor's books. This could be done by serving on the auditor a resolution directing him to enter the tax, or in any other appropriate method. In other words, the ministerial action required of the board is to aid in the collection of the tax by taking steps to have the tax entered on the books containing the tax levy. The county boards of commissioners have no power to do anything more or less than require that the tax be entered, and, if it is entered without the formality of the requirement, it seems quite manifest that their formal mandate becomes unnecessary, and its absence does not affect the legality of the entry.

This conception of the meaning of the word "levy," as here used, is supported by the following very clear statement of the distinction by Associate Justice Gary in the case of Railway Co. v. Kay, supra: "The word 'levy,' as hereinbefore shown, is frequently used in more than one sense, and its meaning in a particular instance is to be determined by resort to the context. It is sometimes used for the purpose of conferring all the powers incident to the creation and collection of a tax, as when 'corporate authorities are vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes,' while again it is only intended to confer administrative powers in the collection of the tax, without reference to its creation, and this is the sense in which it is used in the thirteenth section. By this construction alone can force and effect be given to all the foregoing provisions of the Constitution. It will be observed that the thirteenth section makes no reference to the creation of the tax, which only could be done by the General Assembly, or by the county after the General Assembly had 'vested it with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes.' The intention was that the taxes for the subdivisions of the state should be collected by the respective fiscal authorities thereof, whether imposed by the General Assembly or the corporate authorities of counties, etc., when vested by the General Assembly with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes." See, also, Coolley on Taxation, 325, note.

For these reasons, we think the first, second, third, and fourth grounds assigned by the plaintiffs for alleging the tax title invalid are unsound.

The plaintiffs' fifth position is that the land which was sold as the property of Wm. F. Proctor consisted of two tracts, and the county auditor entered them for taxation as one tract, and not separately. The complaint fails to allege that they were returned for taxation as separate tracts, or that they were not contiguous, or that they were separate from each other in any respect except in the names by which they were called. There is no sufficient allegation that the auditor entered two distinct parcels of real property as one, in violation of section 289 of the Revised Statutes of 1893 (Code 1902, § 356).

The sixth allegation against the tax title is that the aggregate per cent. of taxation was $14\frac{1}{4}$ mills, and the auditor, under section 288 (Code 1902, § 355) of the Revised Statutes of 1893, should have disregarded the fraction of one-fourth of a mill in his computation. This construction of the statute is obviously erroneous. The meaning of the law is that, where the sum resulting from the computation of the tax on any particular parcel of property requires for its exact expression any fraction less than a half mill, such fraction shall be dropped.

The plaintiffs, in their seventh objection, allege the assessment of the property to have been \$2,350, upon which the tax should have been computed at $14\frac{1}{4}$ mills, making \$33.4875, whereas the sum of \$34.49 was charged, and execution issued therefor. There is no allegation that Proctor, the owner, was exempt from poll tax, and the \$1 excess may be referred to this liability. Cooley on Taxation, 498, note. The case of Wilson v. Cantrell, 40 S. C. 181, 18 S. E. 517, holds the poll tax is properly included in the execution against property. Taxes cannot, however, be held to constitute a lien on property without statutory authority. Barker v. Smith, 10 S. C. 228. The statute does not expressly or by implication make the poll tax a lien on the property of the taxpayer. The land in this case had been conveyed away before any attempt to levy under the execution was made, and it would have been illegal to levy on and sell the land to enforce the collection of the execution if it had been based on the grantor's poll tax alone. If, on the other hand, the alleged excess arose from an error in calculation, we are not prepared to say an excess of \$1 in an aggregate tax of \$33.49 is sufficient to invalidate the sale. It is true, the sheriff is required to levy on as much property as may be sufficient to satisfy the taxes, and, if the taxes are increased by illegal additions, the taxpayer suffers injury by reason of the greater quantity of property it becomes necessary to seize and sell in order to satisfy the execution. State v. Hodges, 14 Rich. Law, 256; Cooley on Taxation, 429; 25 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (1st Ed.) 387. But the error here was too small for the court to suppose it would have interfered with payment by the owner and recovery of the excess, under section 349 of Revised Statutes of 1893, or that it led to the sale of any more property than would have been sold if the execution had been issued for the true amount.

The allegations of the plaintiffs in the seventh ground of their attack, if established, would not defeat the tax title.

Section 347, Rev. St. 1893 (Code 1902, § 421), requires the auditor to issue tax executions to the sheriff in duplicate, and provides that the executions shall "run substantially" in the form therein prescribed. In case of sale, the sheriff is directed to attach the duplicate to the title. It is alleged here that only the original was given to the sheriff, and he attached this, instead of the duplicate to the deed. This was a mere irregularity, which could not possibly be prejudicial to the taxpayer. The law in this regard was intended to provide proper evidence of the sale, in the interest of the state and of the purchaser. In no case could it be of consequence to the taxpayer whether the original or the duplicate was attached to the deed.

It is also alleged the original and duplicate forms of execution were only partially filled out, the name of the defaulting taxpayer and the amount of the tax not being inserted in the printed form of the mandate. It is true that an execution without a mandate is usually regarded void. Freeman on Executions, 38. In this case the execution stated the tax, and the name of the person who had made default. We do not think the mere omission to repeat the amount and the name, in commanding the sheriff to levy, would invalidate the execution. In Kingman v. Glover, 3 Rich. Law, 27, 45 Am. Dec. 756, the court says: "If the process which the tax collectors are authorized to issue does, in substance and effect, comply with the provisions of law, and afford to the owner of property the notice which may be necessary for its protection, formal and technical exceptions may, without inconvenience or danger, be disregarded."

We think, therefore, the execution was valid, notwithstanding these alleged irregularities, and the eighth and ninth objections to the tax title are not well founded.

The next allegation is that the sheriff failed to "seize and take exclusive possession" of the land. The general rule is that actual seizure of possession by the officer is not necessary to a levy where the debt which is the basis of the execution is a lien on the property. Freeman on Executions, § 280. In this state the entry of the levy on an execution issued on a judgment has been held sufficient on the ground that no statute requires actual entry and possession of the land. Martin v. Bowie, 37 S. C. 115, 15 S. E. 736. A tax execution stands upon an entirely different footing, because the statute explicitly requires the sheriff to "seize and take exclusive possession" under such an execution. "Under and by virtue of said warrant or execution, the sheriff shall seize and take exclusive possession of so much of the defaulting taxpayer's estate, real or personal, or both, as may be necessary to raise the sum of money named therein and said charges thereon, and, after due advertisement, sell the same," etc. Rev. St. 1893, § 349 (Code 1902, § 423). The requirement is one which greatly concerns the defaulting owner of the land, for the seizure and taking possession by the sheriff is a notorious act, which tends to give the defaulter and the community notice of the intended sale, and thus prevent a sacrifice of the property. We think the tenth objection to the title is well founded.

The eleventh, twelfth, fifteenth, and eighteenth objections were not sustained by the circuit judge, and the plaintiffs very properly acquiesced in his conclusion as to them.

The thirteenth position taken is that the levy for a tax of $33.4875 on 975 acres of land, which sold for $435, was an excessive levy. The sheriff cannot be expected to know in advance exactly how much land it will be necessary to sell to collect the amount due on process in his hands. It does not follow, as a matter of law, that the levy was excessive because the land sold for even 10 times the amount of the debt, for land sometimes sells for much more than even the best judges expect. The sheriff is required to seize sufficient property, and it is a question of fact whether he has exercised a reasonable discretion. The title of a purchaser who has bought in good faith at a tax sale should not be disturbed because the sheriff levied on more property than was necessary, unless the levy was so excessive as to indicate oppression, arising from design or inexcusable ignorance. Freeman on Executions, 253. The plaintiffs are entitled to have this issue submitted to the jury.

As we understand, the plaintiffs take the position in their fourteenth objection to the tax title, that C. L. Paul, Jr., who bid off the land, could not make a legal assignment of his bid to the defendants to whom the sheriff made title. There are authorities sustaining this position, where the assignment of the bid was made before the time for redemption by the owner had elapsed, on the ground that, until the owner had lost his right of redemption, the purchaser had only a contingent right to the title, which in law is not assignable. In this state there is no right of redemption after sale, and the purchaser has a right to demand the title as soon as his bid is entered and complied with. There is therefore no reason why he may not assign his bid as in other sales. Blackwell on Tax Titles, 374.

The sixteenth ground of attack, that the tax execution did not specify the "amount of taxes to each fund," as required by the statute, must be held not well founded, on the authority of Association v. Waters, 50 S. C. 466, 27 S. E. 948.

The plaintiffs' seventeenth objection is thus stated: "That the sale of said real estate was not advertised according to law, and was not made for cash." The allegation as to the advertisement is a mere conclusion of law, without a statement of the facts upon which it is founded; but the direct allegation that the sale was not made for cash, if established, would be fatal to the validity of the sale, and is not demurrable.

The position taken by the defendants, that the failure of the plaintiffs to have the sale suspended under section 3 of the act of 1889 (20 St. at Large, p. 52) is a bar to these actions to recover possession of the lands, is disposed of by the case of Bull v. Kirk, 37 S. C. 400, 16 S. E. 151.

For the reasons above stated, all the plaintiffs' exceptions, and the defendants' 8th, 12th, and 15th exceptions, are overruled; and the defendants' 1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th exceptions are sustained. The defendants' 9th and 10th exceptions are disposed of in the discussion of the plaintiffs' 5th and 13th objections to the tax title. As to the 13th exception of the defendants, it is sufficient to say that the presiding judge did not hold that the sheriff's deed was not prima facie evidence of good title in the holder; but, inasmuch as specific irregularities were pointed out in the complaint, it became necessary for him to consider their effect on the title. Defendants' 14th exception and the several subdivisions of their 11th exception are substantially covered by their other exceptions, and are embraced in the foregoing discussion and adjudication. The result is that the judgment of the circuit court overruling the demurrers is affirmed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court for trial.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 16, 1903.)

BILL OF REVIEW—LIMITATIONS—COMPUTATION OF TIME—APPEAL.

1. The time of the pendency of an appeal from a decree is not to be excluded in computing the period of limitation to a bill of review based on newly discovered evidence.

2. In excluding the time of the pendency of an appeal in computing time limiting a bill of review for error of law, does the exclusion begin at the allowance of the appeal, or the date of the bond required to perfect it?

Appeal from Circuit Court, Doddridge County; Warren Miller, Judge.

Suit by B. J. Ruley, surviving partner, etc., against B. W. Foley and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

ty, for himself and other lien creditors, against F. J. Ruley & Bro., to enforce his own and other liens against lands of Ruley & Bro.; and on 6th September, 1894, a decree was made fixing liens on the lands, and directing a sale for their payment. An appeal to this court was allowed 25th October, 1894, and the decree was by this court affirmed 28th April, 1897, as appears in 43 W. Va. 513, 27 S. E. 268. On 26th April, 1900, the circuit court allowed a bill of review to be filed, seeking to reverse said decree on newly discovered evidence. Later the court allowed an amended bill of review to be filed. On 17th July, 1902, Ruley & Bro. asked leave to file an amended and supplemental bill of review, making a new party, but upon objection the court refused to allow it to be filed; and, from the decree rejecting it, Ruley & Bro. appeal.

The decree of the circuit court was an appealable final decree, from which a bill of review for either error of law or new evidence would lie. Lehman v. Hinton, 44 W. Va. 1, 29 S. E. 984; Core v. Strickler, 24 W. Va. 689; Hogg's Eq. Procedure, § 568a. The limitation for a bill of review is three years from the decree. Dunfee v. Childs, 45 W. Va. 155, 30 S. E. 102. The appellants seek to save their bill of review by excluding the time, not merely from the allowance of the appeal, but from the decree to the decision by the Supreme Court. Plainly, the way was open for a bill of review at once upon the decree, and the limitation started at its date. Even if we exclude time from the allowance to the decision of the appeal, the right to file a bill of review was barred when the original bill of review was filed. But can we exclude any time? If there be an appeal, and it ends without decision, and then a bill of review is filed for error of law, the time of the pendency of the appeal is excluded, because there can be no bill of review for error of law pending an appeal, since the appeal carries the case to the higher court, and while there the lower court can make no change in it for any matter of law involved in the record. Ensminger v. Powers, 108 U. S. 292, 2 Sup. Ct. 643, 27 L. Ed. 732; Beach, Mod. Eq. Prac. § 863; Dunbar v. Dunbar, 5 W. Va. 567; 2 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 327; 2 Cyc. 967. But though an appeal is pending, it does not prevent a bill of review in the lower court on new evidence, because it rests on matter not in the record hitherto, and thus does not involve the same matter involved in the appeal. On this principle, we hold that an appeal may go on in the Supreme Court, and a bill of review on new evidence in the circuit court, at the same time. Gillespie v. Allen, 37 W. Va. 675, 17 S. E. 184. Otherwise if the bill of review is for error of law. Maxwell v. Martin, 35 W. Va. 384, 14 S. E. 7. In Wethered v. Elliott, 45 W. Va. 437, 32 S. E. 209, it was held that when a bill of review is predicated on new evidence, and during its pendency more than two years elapse, its pendency does not save an appeal from being barred. They involve different things. These cases show that there is no reason why time during an appeal should be excluded in computing time against a bill of review on new evidence, for, if there can be an appeal pending bill of review on new evidence, so there can be a bill of review on new evidence pending an appeal. Counsel cites Ensminger v. Powers, 108 U. S. 292, 2 Sup. Ct. 643, 27 L. Ed. 732, and Beach, Mod. Eq. Prac. § 865, to sustain his point that the time while the appeal pended must be counted out; but these authorities apply only where the bill of review is for error of law. As the bill of review was barred, we see no error in refusing to allow the amended bill of review. Whether, when time is to be excluded during the pendency of appeal, we begin at the allowance of the appeal, or from the bond which consummates it, under section 14, c. 135, Code 1899, it is not necessary to say. In Ensminger v. Powers, 108 U. S. 302, 2 Sup. Ct. 643, 27 L. Ed. 732, it is said to begin with the bond. Dunbar v. Dunbar, supra; 2 Cyc. 965. Aspen Co. v. Billings, 150 U. S. 31, 14 Sup. Ct. 4, 37 L. Ed. 986, leads to this conclusion.

Decree affirmed.

DEEDS—COVENANTS—GENERAL WARRANTY—DEFICIENCY IN QUANTITY—REMEDY AT LAW
—LIMITATIONS—EQUITY.

1. A covenant of general warranty in a deed for land relates to title, not quantity, and does not warrant quantity. Burbridge v. Sadler, 32 S. E. 1028, 46 W. Va. 39 (Syl., point 6).

2. A claim for compensation for deficiency in quantity of land conveyed by deed, where the purchase money has been paid, is a mere personal demand, not cognizable only in equity, but in law, and is subject to the statute of limitations. *Burbridge v. 3. In a chancery cause for the enforcement of a legal claim, where a court of law and a court of equity have concurrent jurisdiction, the statute of limitations will be given effect upon demurrer when it plainly appears on the face of the bill that the statute applies in the case.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by W. B. Maxwell against Allen L. Wilson and others. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant Allen L. Wilson appeals. Reversed.

Harding & Harding, for appellant. Strader & Strader and E. D. Talbott, for appellee.

McWHORTER, P. By deed dated the 22d day of May, 1889, Allen L. Wilson and Emma J., his wife, "in consideration of eight dollars per acre for the land hereinafter described amounting to the sum of \$1,952, paid and to be paid as follows:" One-third cash, and the residue in two equal payments at one and two years, with interest from date, secured by vendor's lien—conveyed to W. B. Maxwell a tract of land lying in Randolph county, described by metes and bounds, and as containing 244 acres, with covenants of general warranty. The deferred payments of purchase money were paid by the vendee as they fell due; the last payment being made about the 22d of May, 1891. On the 13th day of October, 1898, W. B. Maxwell sued out of the clerk's office of the circuit court of Randolph county his subpoena in chancery, and at the November rules, 1898, filed his bill in equity against Allen L. Wilson, W. A. Wilson, and the United States Coal, Iron & Manufacturing Company, alleging the purchase by plaintiff from the defendant Allen L. Wilson of the said tract of 244 acres of land at the price of \$8 per acre, exhibiting a copy of the deed with his bill; that after the purchase plaintiff took possession of the land, and had had possession of it ever since; that plaintiff relied with absolute confidence upon the representations of Wilson as to the quantity of land in said tract, and did not incur the expense of having the same surveyed; that, at the time of purchasing, the land had a large prospective value on account of the coal, building stone, ballast stone, and timber thereon, if a railroad should be built upon or near the same, and plaintiff had confidence that such road would be built soon thereafter, and that such had been built through the land, realizing what the plaintiff believed was its prospective value, and it had become fairly of the value of \$30 per acre; that about the 22d of January, 1898, plaintiff sold the timber on said land at the price of \$1,000, but the purchaser of the timber discovered a large deficiency in the acreage of said tract, and refused to pay the whole of the purchase money for the timber, and plaintiff, by the advice of counsel, gave to the purchaser a large abatement upon the price of the contract to be paid, and incurred a large amount of costs and expenses in vindicating his title, in which ways he suffered in the aggregate a loss of about \$200, all of which was incurred by reason of the false and fraudulent misrepresentations of said Wilson as to the quantity of said land; that afterward, at a large expense, plaintiff caused Charles M. Marsteller, the surveyor of Randolph county, to go upon the land and make an accurate survey thereof, when it was found to contain but 177½ acres, being a shortage of 66½ acres, making an aggregate of \$532, exclusive of interest, overpaid for the land by plaintiff; that, before plaintiff knew there was a shortage in the land, he had sold a large amount of building rock therefrom, and all the timber and a right of way for a railroad through the land, so that he was in no position to insist upon or consent to a rescission of his contract; that he had discovered some time about the — day of —, 1897, that there was probably a shortage in the acreage of said land, and did not even have an intimation before that time that there was a shortage; that, as soon as he ascertained it, he called the attention of Wilson to the fact, but he failed and refused to reimburse him for his loss; that Wilson was the owner of another tract of 185 acres, in the same district in Randolph county, and on the 9th of February, 1898, said Wilson, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors, and especially the plaintiff, pretended to sell and convey the 185 acres to the defendant W. A. Wilson, for the purpose of pretended consideration of \$6,500 in cash; that W. A. Wilson was a very young man, and never had any such amount of money, or means of any considerable amount; that he was the nephew of said Allen L. Wilson, and had full notice and knowledge of the fraudulent intent and purpose of said Allen L. Wilson when he accepted such deed, and did not pay any fair consideration for said land, and participated with his grantor in his fraudulent design and purpose; that Allen L. Wilson was not the owner of any other real estate, and had practically no personal property, so that plaintiff was remediless to recover the amount justly due him upon the breach of warranty of said Allen L. Wilson, except out of the proceeds of the sale of the said 185-acre tract; that while Archibald Wilson was the owner of said 185 acres, on or about the 19th of November, 1872, he leased and sold the coal thereon, and the right to remove it, at a royalty of 10 cents per ton, to one Isaac Carpenter; that by successive alienations thereof the said lease passed into the hands of the defendant United States Coal, Iron & Manufacturing Company, which was the owner of the same, but had not mined and removed any of the coal, and was entitled to do so; that the said 185 acres would not rent for enough in five years to satisfy plaintiff's claim, and that no part of the claim had ever been paid; and prayed that the amount legally and justly due him from said Allen L. Wilson be ascertained, and that the said deed to W. A. Wilson be set aside and canceled as having been executed for the purpose of delaying, hindering, and defrauding plaintiff, and the 185 acres be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment and satisfaction of the amount due plaintiff, and for general and special relief. The bill also exhibits, as a part thereof, the deed for the 185 acres to W. A. Wilson, and the contract of lease or sale of the coal therein. The defendant Allen L. Wilson filed his demurrer to plaintiff's bill, and says that the bill shows upon its face no grounds for equitable relief; that the bill is multifarious; that the bill and exhibits filed therewith show that the plaintiff has been guilty of such laches as will defeat his claims of relief; and, "because the plaintiff's demand is purely legal, and was barred by the statute of limitations at the time of the bringing of this suit; and said defendant now here gives the plaintiff notice that he will rely on said statute to defeat his demand as fully as though he had especially pleaded it in this cause." The said Allen L. Wilson and W. A. Wilson filed their several and separate answers to the bill, to which plaintiff replied generally. The answers denied all fraud or intention to defraud. Allen L. Wilson also denied all material allegations of the bill. Depositions were taken and filed by both plaintiff and defendants. The cause came on to be heard on the 17th of October, 1902, and the court held that the deed of conveyance made the 9th of February, 1898, from Allen L. Wilson to defendant W. A. Wilson for the 185 acres was made for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the plaintiff in the enforcement of his claim, and set aside, annulled, and canceled said deed, and held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover from the defendant Allen L. Wilson the value of the deficiency, 65 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres, at \$8 per acre, or such deficiency with interest thereon from the time it was paid for, and the costs and expenses plaintiff was compelled to pay in vindicating his title to the land, if he paid such costs or incurred any such expenses, and referred the cause to one of the commissioners of the court to ascertain and report the amount plaintiff was entitled to recover, and also to ascertain and report the liens upon the 185 acres of land, and amounts and priorities thereof, and the state and condition of the title to said 185 acres. On the 20th of October the court made an order setting forth that on a former day of the same term the court had entered the demurrer of Allen L. Wilson to plaintiff's bill, and had overruled the same. The commissioner filed his report, ascertaining the amount to be due from defendant Allen L. Wilson to the plaintiff, \$1,064.96, and that the same was a lien upon the 185 acres of land, and reported that no other liens had been presented to him. The defendant Allen L. Wilson excepted to the report because "it reports that there is due from him to the plaintiff on account of a deficiency in the acreage of the land, and proceedings thereabout, the sum of \$1,064.96, or any part thereof, or any other sum, because he owes said plaintiff nothing by reason of the premises." And defendant W. A. Wilson excepted because it reported said sum as a lien upon his land. The cause was finally heard on the 6th day of May, 1903, when the court overruled the exceptions to the commissioner's report, and confirmed the report, and decreed the sale by commissioners of said 185 acres of land to pay said claim. Defendant Allen L. Wilson appealed from said decrees of October 17, 1902, and May 6, 1903.

The first and second assignments of error are that the court erred in not sustaining defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's bill, and also in not dismissing said bill upon the pleadings, proofs, and the hearing thereof. I deem it unnecessary to take any account of the remaining assignments of error that the court erred in decreeing to plaintiff the sum decreed on account of the supposed deficiency in the said land, and in not sustaining defendants' exceptions to the commissioner's report—as, in my view of the case, the cause is disposed of upon the demurrer. It is well settled that the statute of limitations will be given effect upon demurrer when it plainly appears upon the face of the bill that the statute may be applied in the case. The deed from Wilson to plaintiff dates May 22, 1889. The last payment of purchase money was made two years thereafter, May, 1891. This suit was brought to recover for the alleged deficiency October 13, 1898, more than seven years after the date of the deed. In Burbridge v. Sadler, 46 W. Va. 39, 32 S. E. 1028 (Syl. point 6), it is held: "A covenant of general warranty in a deed for land relates to title, not quantity, and does not warrant quantity." "It has been conclusively settled that covenants for title do not extend to the quantity of land conveyed unless such clearly appears to be the intention." Rawle on Cov. 289. And in section 297: "And where land is conveyed by a particular description, and with an enumeration of the quantity of acres, the latter is held to be matter of description, merely, and cannot be deemed an implied covenant for quantity. As, therefore, the descriptive boundaries curtail the quantity, it has been repeatedly held that the covenants for title apply to the premises contained within those boundaries, and not to any enumeration of acres. Perkins v. Webster, 2 N. H. 287; Large v. Penn, 6 Serg. & R. 488; Snow v. Chapman, 1 Root, 528, and many other cases there cited. It is further said in the same last-mentioned section: "Of course, however, this rule will not apply where on the face of the instrument it appears that the covenants were directly intended to assure a particular quantity to the purchaser." As in a late case decided by this court (Sibley v. Stacey, 44 S. E. 420), where the deed conveyed certain trees, describing them as to kind, number, size, etc., "marked thus, 'K,' now sound and growing upon the lands of the grantor," etc., it was held to import a covenant or warranty that such trees existed, of the kind and character named, as the language used was not a mere descriptive recital, but was the essence of the conveyance, and that on such covenant or warranty a suit might be maintained for a deficiency in the number of trees conveyed within ten years from the date of the conveyance. Here the definite number of each and every kind of tree, by actual count, was given—nothing contingent on calculation, but the trees counted and designated by a peculiar mark for identification; and the deed contained a further covenant that the vendor would "protect and take care of said timber as long as it may remain upon said premises," and, as stated in the opinion, "thus virtually retaining dominion over the property until possession thereof is taken by the grantee." This was properly held to be a warranty, by implication, of the number of trees, as well as the title thereto. In Rickets v. Diakens (N. C.) 4 Am. Dec. 555, it is held that "the words of a deed describing the length of lines and boundaries, etc., and concluding with the words 'containing so many acres,' do not import a warranty of quantity." In section 1044, 2 Dev. on Deeds, it is said: "In the description of land it is usual, after the description by metes and bounds or subdivisions, to add a clause stating that the land described contains so many acres. But unless there is an express covenant that there is the quantity of land mentioned, the clause as to quantity is considered simply as a part of the description, and will be rejected if it is inconsistent with the actual area, when the same is capable of being ascertained by monuments and boundaries. The mention of the quantity of land conveyed may aid in defining the premises, but it cannot control the rest of the description." In Pecare v. Chouteau's Adm'r, 13 Mo. 528, it is said in the opinion: "The cases in which quantity has been held were matter of description are cases where the specific tract conveyed was fixed by metes and bounds or by numbers, or in some other way so determined as to place beyond doubt what tract was conveyed." In Crislip v. Cain, 19 W. Va. 438 (Syl., point 18), it is held: "The specification [in a written contract to convey or in a deed conveying] of the quantity exactly, without the addition of the words 'more or less,' or any other qualifying words, renders the deed or contract ambiguous as to whether the parties did or did not intend that the vendor, by such positive affirmation of quantity, should be regarded as making a warranty that there was this quantity." In Burbridge v. Sadler, 46 W. Va. 39, 32 S. E. 1029 (Syl., point 4), it is held: "A claim for compensation for deficiency in quantity of land conveyed by deed, where the purchase money has been paid, is a mere personal demand, not cognizable only in equity, but at law, and is subject to the statute of limitations." And in Sibley v. Stacey (W. Va.) 44 S. E. 420 (Syl., point 1), it is held: "A legal demand sued on in equity is subject to the statute of limitations, and not laches." The demurrer to the bill should have been sustained.

The decree is reversed, the demurrer to the bill sustained, and the bill dismissed.

L. instituted his chancery suit in the circuit court of Harrison county (the county in which the alleged cause of action arose) against S.; but the writ commencing the same was directed to the sheriff of, and served on S. in, the county of Jefferson, where he then resided. L. filed his bill, and took depositions. S. appeared and objected to the taking thereof because no issue had been made on the bill by plea or answer thereto by defendant; but S. cross-examined plaintiff's witnesses, reserving his right to object to the jurisdiction of the court in said suit because the writ was directed and served as aforesaid. The court afterwards refused the motion of S. to quash said writ and dismiss the bill. S. afterwards took and filed depositions, and also filed his answer to the bill, whereupon the court heard the cause upon the bill and exhibits, answer of defendant, and replication thereto, and depositions, and by its decree dismissed said bill at the costs of plaintiff, which decree has not been appealed from, but is in full force and effect. Held, that said decree is not void, but may be relied upon by S. as a bar to a subsequent suit brought by L. against him upon the same cause of action.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County; E. Boyd Faulkner, Judge.

Suit by Dabney C. Lee against Cruger W. Smith. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. B. Lucas and D. C. Lee, for appellant.
John Bassel, for appellee.

MILLER, J. On the 9th day of February, 1886, appellant borrowed from appellee $2,200, for which he executed to appellee his obligation under seal, bearing the date aforesaid, payable three years after its date, with interest from the 20th day of August, 1887; interest having been paid thereon to that date. To secure the payment of this debt, with its interest, as aforesaid, Lee, on the day first named, executed and delivered to Smith a deed of trust, whereby he conveyed to Thomas W. Harrison, trustee, certain property situate in Harrison county, described as a certain lot of ground, and the buildings and appurtenances thereto belonging, in the town of Clarksburg, and the interest of said Lee in a tract of 400 acres of land lying on New creek, of which George H. Lee, his father, had died seised, and which had not then been partitioned among the heirs and others entitled thereto; appellant being one of the heirs. It was and is provided in the deed of trust that, if the party of the first part should desire to dispose of his interest in said New Creek lands before said single bill should fall due, then, upon his payment of $300 as a credit on the said single bill, the trust deed should be released by said Smith as to the New Creek lands. The trust further provides for a sale by the trustee of the property therein conveyed upon default of payment of the single bill. The debt not being paid at maturity, Lee, by his deed bearing date on the 11th day of March, 1899, but acknowledged and delivered by him on the 30th day of March, 1899, in consideration of the sum of $2,404.96, granted unto appellee, Smith, in fee simple, without reservation of any kind, and with covenant of general warranty, the said property theretofore conveyed by him to said trustee as aforesaid. The said consideration, $2,404.96, was and is the amount of money then due on said trust debt. On the day last named, Smith gave to Lee an option, in writing, authorizing him to sell the property at any time prior to January 1, 1890, for any amount not less than the $2,404.96, with interest from the 11th day of March, 1889, and also agreed therein to sell the property to said Lee on the same terms, and further agreed to make a proper deed or deeds of conveyance for said property, if sold or purchased by Lee according to the terms of the option, the time of which was afterwards extended by Smith until July 1, 1890. No part of the property was either sold or purchased by appellant under the option. A chancery suit was afterwards instituted in the circuit court of Harrison county by some of the heirs of said George H. Lee, or their assigns, for partition of the said New Creek lands. Appellee was a defendant therein. Partition was made, and 71½ acres of the lands, by metes and bounds, were allotted to appellee in fee and in severalty. On the 18th day of December, 1891, appellee and wife, by their deed, conveyed the said house and lot in Clarksburg to Grace D. Lee, a sister of appellant, for the consideration of $2,000, and on the 2d day of September, 1891, by their deed, conveyed all the coal underlying the said 71½ acres (described in their deed as 76 acres) to Benjamin Wilson for $760. On the 8th day of February, 1892, appellee and wife, by their deed, conveyed the surface of their said parcel of land to Mary A. Smith for the consideration of $760; but in the last-mentioned deed the coal, oil, and other minerals under said land were expressly reserved by the grantors. By their agreement in writing, bearing date on the 10th day of June, 1899, appellee and wife leased said land to the South Penn Oil Company for oil and gas purposes.

Appellant afterwards commenced his suit in chancery in the said circuit court of Harrison county, and at the January rules, 1895, filed his bill against appellee; but the summons to the defendant was directed to the sheriff of Jefferson county, where the defendant then resided, and was there served upon him. In his bill appellant alleges, in substance, that he obtained the loan from appellee as above stated; that he made his single bill for the same, and executed the said deed of trust, conveying the property hereinbefore described, to secure the payment of the debt at maturity; that, when the debt became due, wishing to avoid a public sale under the deed of trust, he, by his deed of March 11, 1889, granted to said Cruger W. Smith, in fee simple, for the consideration of the amount of the debt due, the property conveyed in trust to secure said debt; that said Smith delivered to him an option authorizing him to sell the property; and that the time of the option was extended by Smith at appellant's request. Appellant sets out in his bill the sales by appellee to Grace D. Lee, Benjamin Wilson, and Mary A. Smith, and charges that those transactions were fraudulent on the part of appellee. Appellant further charges that appellee had committed a fraud upon him in the purchase of the New Creek property, by representing to appellant that said property was of small value and not easily marketable; that said Smith had peculiar technical knowledge to know, and did know, that said land was especially valuable, and underlain with rich veins of coal; and that appellee, by reason of his superior knowledge, obtained an unconscionable bargain from appellant, and, by said deed and transaction, acquired from appellant valuable property for a grossly inadequate consideration. The bill further alleges that said three purchasers, Lee, Wilson, and Smith, were and are innocent purchasers for value, without notice of any fraud on the part of appellee. The bill then prays that said Cruger W. Smith be adjudged and required to pay appellant the sum of $2,000, with interest thereon from April 1, 1889, or $2,700 as of the date of the institution of the suit, being the excess of the value of the property at time of its conveyance to Smith as aforesaid over the amount due him from appellant on the debt. The bill is verified by the affidavit of the plaintiff.

Appellee filed his answer, denying therein all the material allegations of the bill. Depositions were taken and filed by both appellant and appellee. At the September term, 1896, the cause was heard by the circuit court of Harrison county upon the bill, answer, general replication thereto, exhibits, and depositions; and thereupon the bill was dismissed, and the costs were decreed against the appellant. From this decree no appeal was ever allowed. It stands unreversed, and in full force and effect. More than two years having elapsed since its rendition, it is now final and conclusive.

At the March rules, 1900, appellant filed another bill in the circuit court of Jefferson county against appellee, in which he sets out substantially as he did in his first bill the said loan to him by Smith; the making of said single bill; the execution of the deed of trust; the making and delivery of said deed conveying to said Smith the said property in fee simple; the execution by Smith of said option to him, and the extension of the time thereof; the partition of the New Creek lands, and the allotment to Smith of the portion conveyed to him by appellant as aforesaid; the sales to Grace D. Lee, Wilson and Mary A. Smith, and the lease to the South Penn Oil Company; that the oil company has extracted large quantities of oil from the New Creek lands, and that said Smith has been offered a large sum for his royalty reserved in the lease. The charges against Smith of fraud and unfair dealing are substantially reiterated. Appellant further alleges "that the understanding between himself and the said Smith at the time of the said transaction was that the said conveyance to said Smith was to be regarded by them, and was in fact, an equitable mortgage to more fully secure the payment of the debt, with its accrued interest, at a later period." The bill prays that the said Cruger W. Smith be required to transfer and convey to appellant the oil or petroleum, gas, and other valuable minerals under the New Creek lands reserved by appellee, or pay to appellant the value of the same. To this bill appellee tendered and filed his plea of former adjudication, verified by his affidavit, accompanied by a certified transcript of the record of the first-mentioned chancery cause.

Appellant then presented in court, and asked leave to file, an amended and supplemental bill in the cause, alleging, among other things, that said Smith, instead of having the trustee to execute said trust, undertook its execution himself, by taking said deed to himself, thus leaving the legal title to said property outstanding in the trustee, where it still is; that, at the date of the deed to Smith, plaintiff had nothing but the equity of redemption, and could convey no more than he had, and that said Smith, having himself undertaken to execute the trust, should have sold only so much of said property as was sufficient to pay the debt, which Smith at once proceeded to do, and did do, to the amount of $3,520, leaving outstanding in the hands of the trustee a valuable deposit of oil, the existence of which was not known to plaintiff, but known and relied upon by Smith, though not disclosed by him to the plaintiff; and that the sale of said oil and gas was never intended or contemplated by any of the parties. This amended bill then prayed that said Cruger W. Smith and Flora McD. Smith, his wife, the South Penn Oil Company, the Eureka Pipe Line Company, and Thomas W. Harrison, trustee, be made parties defendant thereto, and be required to answer the same; that the whole transaction be considered as a mortgage; that an account be taken, and a receiver appointed; and that Smith and wife be compelled to convey to plaintiff the gas and oil underlying said 71½ acres of land.

To the filing of said amended bill, the defendant objected, and moved the court to reject the same, which was done. Appellant then replied to the said plea nul tiel record, and the cause came on to be heard upon the bill, exhibits therewith, said plea, the transcript of the record, and upon the general replication to said plea, as well as the replication of nul tiel record; and the court being of opinion that the matters averred in said plea were true, and constituted a defense to the matters alleged in plaintiff's bill, it was decreed that the said bill be dismissed, and that plaintiff should pay to the defendant his costs in said suit by him expended. From this decree the appellant obtained an appeal, and complains that the circuit court erred in rejecting his said amended bill, and in sustaining said plea of former adjudication. He contends that the circuit court of Harrison county had no jurisdiction to make its decree dismissing his first bill; that said decree was and is therefore a nullity; that the said deed of March 11, 1899, was and is a mortgage, and should be so treated; and that the court erred in rejecting said amended and supplemental bill.

The process commencing the first suit was issued from the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Harrison county, the county wherein the cause of action, if any, arose; but it was directed to the sheriff of, and served on Smith, the defendant, in Jefferson county, where he then resided. Section 2 of chapter 124 of the Code of 1899 provides: "Process from any court, whether original, mesne or final, may be directed to the sheriff of any county, except that process against a defendant (unless a railroad, canal, turnpike, telegraph, or insurance company be defendant) to answer in any action brought under the second section of chapter one hundred and twenty-three of this Code, shall not be directed to any officer of any other county than that wherein the action is brought." The process under consideration does not come within any of the exceptions contained in the section cited. The statute is mandatory where applicable. In Warren v. Saunders, 27 Grat. 259 (an action of assumpsit), it was held that process issued in a county where the cause of action arose, but directed to another, was void. And in Coda v. Thompson, 39 W. Va. 69, 19 S. E. 548 (also an action of assumpsit), this court says that "such seems to be law as generally held." 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 190. But we do not pass upon that question in the case before us.

But on the 10th day of April, 1895, at the time and place where depositions were being taken in the first-mentioned cause on behalf of the plaintiff, defendant, Smith, by his counsel, John Bassel, Esq., excepted to the taking of any depositions in the cause in advance of appearance by demurrer, plea, or answer to the bill by defendant, and also reserved the right to thereafter file a plea to the jurisdiction of the court in said cause. Appellee, by counsel, on that and subsequent days, attended the taking of plaintiff's depositions, and cross-examined the witnesses. He afterwards filed exceptions to the depositions taken by plaintiff, because, as he alleged, the court had no jurisdiction of the suit, and because no answer had been filed, and no issue had been in any way made between plaintiff and defendant in the cause. Appellee also filed his affidavit showing that the writ commencing said suit against him was issued from the office of the clerk of the circuit court of Harrison county, but directed to the sheriff of Jefferson, in which county the defendant then resided, and there served upon him. On the 30th day of May, 1895, the court made the following order: "This day came the defendant, Cruger W. Smith, and moved the court to quash the writ of summons herein, and abate or dismiss this cause, upon the ground that at the time of the institution of this suit he was a resident of the county of Jefferson, in this state, and still is a resident of that county, and that the writ of summons in this cause was directed to the sheriff of said county, and was served upon the defendant in said county, and in support of said motion filed his affidavit herein, and thereupon the plaintiff, in opposition to said motion, together with the notice to take the same, and return therein the caption and certificate thereto attached, offered to read the depositions taken by him in this cause, to the reading of which defendant objected, but the court permitted said depositions, notice, return, caption, and certificate to be read as affidavits, merely; and thereupon the defendant excepted to said depositions, and moved to suppress the same, upon the grounds, first, because the court has no jurisdiction in this cause; and, second, because the depositions were improperly taken, no answer having been filed by the defendants herein, and no issue having in any way been made up herein—which exceptions to said depositions, and motion to suppress the same, were denied, and the court overruled defendant's motion to quash the writ of summons in this cause and dismiss the suit, upon the ground that said defendant had personally appeared in pursuance of said notice, and had cross-examined divers witnesses adduced by the plaintiff." Afterwards, on the 14th day of September, 1895, the defendant, Smith, filed his answer to the plaintiff's bill, to which the plaintiff replied generally, whereupon the final decree was made as aforesaid.

Whether the court erred to the prejudice of appellee in refusing to quash the writ and abate said cause is not now a question before us. Appellee does not complain of that or any other decree or order of the court. Certainly appellant cannot be heard to complain for him. In Brightwell v. Bare et al., 52 W. Va. 380, 44 S. E. 162, the court says: "At all events, it is a well-established principle that an appellant must show by the record not only that there is error in the judgment of the circuit court, but that he himself has been thereby injured." Appellant had invoked the jurisdiction of the court. He had caused the writ to be issued, directed to the sheriff of Jefferson county, where the defendant then resided, and served upon him. He is a lawyer of ability, learning, and research, as is shown by his preparation of his case. He should not now be heard to complain because the court took and retained jurisdiction of his suit. Whenever a party seeks the aid of a court of justice to enforce his rights, and submits his case to the decision of the court, and invites it to decide upon them, and makes no objection to the jurisdiction until after the court has heard and adjudicated, he is estopped from subsequently objecting to its decision, and the proceedings taken thereon. Herman on Est. & Res. Ad. § 389; 15 L. R. A. 273, note.

We must determine from the record whether or not the decree of September 18, 1896, is void. Works on Courts & Their Jurisdiction, pp. 103, 104, says: "As a rule, the failure to object to the jurisdiction of the person at the proper time, where the party appears, is a submission to the jurisdiction of the court, and waives the right to contest such jurisdiction at any subsequent time. Therefore, if a defendant believes that the court has not, for any reason, obtained jurisdiction of his person, he should, if he appears at all, enter his appearance for the special purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction, and at once enter such objection. But if he is satisfied that the court has not jurisdiction of his person, and that jurisdiction will not be presumed, he need not appear at all; and any judgment rendered against him without jurisdiction is void, the same as if the court were without jurisdiction of the subject-matter. The effect of a general appearance, after having appeared specially and made objection, which has been overruled, is the same as if no objection had been made. By appearing afterward and contesting the case on the merits, a defendant loses his right to contest the ruling of the court below on his objection to the jurisdiction on appeal. If a party wishes to insist upon the objection that he is not in court, he must keep out for all purposes except to make that objection." In this case the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Works, on page 36, further says: "As has been shown, jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be conferred upon a court by the consent of the parties. It is otherwise as to the jurisdiction of the person. If a court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter, a party may voluntarily submit himself to such jurisdiction, or may, by failure to object thereto at the proper time, waive his right to contest such jurisdiction." The defendant did object to the jurisdiction of the court over him for the reason stated in the decree hereinbefore set out, but, upon consideration of all the facts, the court declined to abate the suit. The defendant then, without further objection, filed his answer to the bill, and took and filed the depositions of himself and other witnesses in his own behalf; and upon the whole case, as made by both plaintiff and defendant, the cause was decided, and plaintiff's bill was dismissed. It was the province of the court to pass upon the question of its jurisdiction, and, having done so, the decree is not void for any error which the court may have committed. "Where the court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter in the particular case, its judgment, unless reversed or annulled in some proper proceeding, is not open to attack or impeachment by parties or privies in any collateral action or proceeding whatever." Black on Judg. § 245. Therefore the said decree of the circuit court of Harrison county made and entered on the 18th day of September, 1896, is not void.

Appellant also contends that he is prejudiced by the rejection of his amended and supplemental bill. It is in irreconcilable conflict with the original bills in both causes. Plaintiff alleges in each original bill that he conveyed said property to appellee in fee simple. If he did so, the title to the oil and gas thereunder passed to appellee by the deed. In Wilson v. Youst et al., 43 W. Va. 826, 28 S. E. 781, 39 L. R. A. 292, it is held that "petroleum oil, as it is found in the cavities of the rock, is part of the realty, and embraced in the comprehensive idea which the law attaches to the word 'land.'" The amended and supplemental bill was properly rejected. Hogg's Equity Procedure, § 171, and cases there cited; also Hanby's Adm'r v. Henritze's Adm'r, 85 Va. 177, 7 S. E. 204.

The contention of appellant that his deed to Smith, of the 11th day of March, 1899, was and is in fact an equitable mortgage to more fully secure the payment of the said debt, with its accrued interest, at a later period, is unreasonable and untenable, and is not sustained by the record.

The appellee is also a lawyer, and is presumed to have known his rights in the premises, as well as the legal consequences of the transaction. It appears that he drafted the deeds and other papers connected with the loan. Having a valid lien on the property by reason of his deed of trust, which he could enforce at any time after the debt became due, by notice and sale, it is not probable that he took the last deed, absolute on its face, with the understanding that it should be in fact a mortgage, requiring for its enforcement a suit in equity.

The case at bar is very similar in all respects to Matheney v. Sandford, 26 W. Va. 386, 401. In that case the court says: "If it is claimed that a deed conveying a tract of land in consideration of a debt due from the grantor to the grantee was, though absolute in its form, a mortgage on this tract of land to secure this debt, the circumstance that this debt was already secured by a deed of trust executed by the grantor to a trustee conveying this identical tract of land to secure this debt, and nothing else, is a circumstance so strongly indicating that the transaction was what it purported to be—a sale of the land, and an absolute conveyance of it, and not a mortgage to secure this debt—that it would take very strong parol evidence and strong circumstances to justify a court in regarding it as a mortgage; and in such a case as this the circumstance that the grantor was hard pressed for money, and the grantee was a known money lender, or that this debt [the price paid for the land] was considerably less than the value of the tract of land, and that the possession of the land remained with the grantor for several months after without any rent paid therefor, or any even professedly reserved, would be entitled to but little weight to show that this deed absolute on its face was a mortgage, as against the circumstance that the parties could not have thought of the transaction as the giving of a lien of mortgage on this tract of land for this debt, as a lien on this land to secure this debt already existed."

The disposition of this case does not necessarily require a decision upon the question last above discussed. It is, however, plain that said conveyance of March 11, 1899, is a deed absolute, and not a mortgage. There is, in substance, very little difference, if any, between the claims set up by appellant against appellee in the first and second suits. In the first bill the plaintiff prays that the defendant be decreed to pay him $2,700, as a just restitution on a part of the value of the property inequitably obtained by Smith from him in excess of the amount due on the debt. In the second suit, plaintiff claims that there is a valuable deposit of oil and gas underlying the New Creek lands, the sale of which to the defendant was never intended or contemplated by any of the parties; and he prays in his second bill that the said Smith be required to transfer and convey to him the oil, gas, and other valuable minerals under said tract of land. In the first suit, plaintiff demands a part of the value of the property; in the second, he asks a part of the land. Wilson v. Youst, supra. In Southern Pacific R. Co. v. United States, 168 U. S. 1, 18 Sup. Ct. 18, 42 L. Ed. 355, Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court, says: "The general principle announced in numerous cases is that a right, question, or fact distinctly put in issue and directly determined by a court of competent jurisdiction as a ground of recovery cannot be disputed in a subsequent suit between the same parties or their privies; and, even if the second suit is for a different cause of action, the right, question, or fact once determined must, as between the same parties or their privies, be taken as conclusively established, so long as the judgment in the first suit remains unmodified. This general rule is demanded by the very object for which civil courts have been established, which is, of course, the peace and repose of society by the settlement of matters capable of judicial determination. Its enforcement is essential to the maintenance of social order, for the aid of judicial tribunals would not be invoked for the vindication of rights of person and property if, as between parties and their privies, conclusiveness did not attend the judgments of such tribunals in respect of all matters properly put in issue and actually determined by them." In Rogers v. Rogers, 37 W. Va. 407, 16 S. E. 633, the court thus states the rule: "An adjudication by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties is final and conclusive, not only as to the matters actually determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated as incident thereto, and coming within the legitimate purview of the subject-matter of the action. It is not essential that the matter should have been formally put in issue in a former suit, but it is sufficient that the status of the suit was such that the parties might have had the matter disposed of on its merits. An erroneous ruling of the court will not prevent the matter from being res adjudicata." Corrothers v. Sargent, 20 W. Va. 351; Tracey v. Shumate, 22 W. Va. 475; Sayre's Adm'r v. Harpold, 33 W. Va. 553, 11 S. E. 16.

Applying the law thus annunciated to the case before us, we conclude that all material matters in controversy therein were adjudicated and determined in the former suit between the same parties, and are therefore now res judicata.

For the foregoing reasons, there is no error in the decree complained of. It must be affirmed.

WHEELING CREEK GAS, COAL & COKE CO. v. ELDER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Dec. 5, 1903.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—CONTRACT—MUTUAL COVENANTS—WAIVER OF PERFORMANCE—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. Though in a contract for the sale of land a provision for payment on a day be made of the essence of the contract, yet, if the vendor is not then able to pass good title, equity will relieve against a failure to pay on the day, and enforce performance at the instance of the vendee.

2. Where a contract for the sale of land makes payment on a day of the essence of the contract, but also requires the vendor to make a deed simultaneously with payment, the covenant for payment and that to make a deed are mutual and dependent; and if the vendor do not make, or offer to make, a deed on the day, equity will disregard the failure to pay on the day, and enforce the contract at the instance of the vendee.

3. Though a contract for sale of land make payment on a day of its essence, yet the vendor may waive compliance with it, or, after failure to pay on the day, continued recognition by him of the contract as still binding is a waiver of strict compliance.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marshall County; Thayer Melvin, Judge.

Bill by the Wheeling Creek Gas, Coal & Coke Company against Thomas B. Elder and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Melghen & Oldham, for appellant. Riley & Ritz, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. The Wheeling Creek Gas, Coal & Coke Company brought suit in the circuit court of Marshall county against Thomas B. Elder, the bill in which states that Elder agreed with H. C. Staggars to sell to Staggars the coal in two tracts of land by two written agreements. These agreements contained this language:

"This agreement witnesseth, that T. B. Elder and Rosana, his wife, parties of the first part, hereby agree to sell and convey to H. C. Staggars, party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, all the coal of the Pittsburgh or river vein, in and under that certain tract of land, * * * for which the party of the second part, heirs or assigns, shall pay six dollars per acre, for each and every acre, as follows: One-third when deed is signed, sealed and delivered, the remainder in two equal annual installments thereafter, with interest at 5 per cent. on deferred payments. Second party reserves the right to pay the whole amount when deed is delivered.

"A general warranty deed, clear of all encumbrances, to be made to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, when the first payment is made (party of the first part to furnish complete abstract of title), and others are secured by deed of trust on the said property hereby sold.

"It is expressly understood and agreed that if the first payment aforesaid is not made on the 30th day of November, A. D. 1899, or as soon thereafter as the title shall be examined and accepted by the party of the second part, or his heirs or assigns, this agreement shall be considered as rescinded, and neither party shall be bound thereby.

"Witness my hand and seal this 17th day of August, A. D. 1899. T. B. Elder. [Seal.]"

The bill states that Staggars, by writing, 24th October, 1899, assigned his right under said contract to D. H. and S. H. Pearsall. The bill states that, at the time of the assignment by Staggars to the Pearsalls of said contracts, the Pearsalls had been commissioned by certain named persons to purchase a coal field, and such assignments were taken for the benefit of themselves and associates; that said Pearsalls and those associates on 7th November met and ratified such assignments, and organized themselves into a company or association by the name of the Wheeling Creek Gas, Coal & Coke Company, agreeing to become incorporated under that name, and in the meantime to act under that name with relation to such coal purchase; that Samuel H. Pearsall was at such meeting elected president, and Daniel H. Pearsall treasurer; that said company was incorporated under the laws of West Virginia 21st December, 1900; and that on 25th April, 1901, the Pearsalls assigned to the corporation said agreements. The bill states that on 22d November, 1899, the Pearsalls signified in writing to Elder that the association, by said corporate name, had become owner of said agreement with Staggars, and agreed to perform his covenants, and take and pay for the coal according to the agreement with Staggars, and the treasurer of said association did pay Elder $20 as part of the purchase money under the sale, and that Elder, in writing, did accept notice of the ownership of said company under said agreement, and did agree to the substitution of the assoclation, acting under the name of the Wheeling Creek Gas, Coal & Coke Company, in place of Stagers in said agreements, and thus Elder contracted and agreed with said company, and accepted from it $20 under said contracts for the sale of the coal. The written notice of acceptance is signed by D. H. Pearsall as treasurer of said association, and its acceptance is made "subject to examination and approval of the titles, with complete abstracts of title." The bill further states that a number of tracts of coal land had been purchased by said association—among them, the Elder tracts—and that Elder and the association agreed that Elder would join with other parties who had sold coal lands in the block purchased for the association, and employ an attorney to make abstracts of their titles and prepare deeds, and that the certificate of such attorney would be acceptable to the association, and title would be taken upon his certificate, and would be paid for as soon as he should prepare proper papers, and that under this agreement Elder forthwith employed Meighen & Oldham as attorneys to prepare abstracts and deeds, and that it was understood and agreed between Elder and the association that no more of the purchase money should be due or payable by the terms of said contracts until such abstracts of title should be completed and the titles approved by said attorney, and that in the meantime said contract should remain in full force, and that Elder gave his title papers to said attorneys, and they undertook to make the abstracts, and were from time to time assisted therein by Elder; that the contract made with the attorneys was that they should complete abstracts for all the lands in said block, and, as soon as completed, said company was to settle for the same, paying one-third of the purchase money down, as per the contract. The bill further states that said attorneys found that the title of Elder was not good and marketable, as the title to 87 acres of it was held by a deed to Elder so defectively executed that the title was bad, and that at Elder's instance the attorneys wrote a new deed, and had it executed by the proper persons, and thus perfected Elder's title, and that said attorneys so certified to the association, and it at once undertook to pay Elder for the coal and get his deed. The bill also states that until late in the autumn of 1900 Elder made no objection to complying with his contract as soon as he could perfect his title, never denying his liability to do so, or alleging any default or cause for rescinding on the part of the association, but that late in that autumn he conceived that he could sell the coal for greater price, and fraudulently refused to meet the representatives of said association, and that the attorneys prepared a deed to be executed by Elder, dated 24th October, 1900, to the Pearsalls and other parties who were members of said association. Elder refused to execute it, and it was returned to Pearsall with the declaration that Elder had no contract with him and his associates. The bill then says that the association at once urged Elder to make the deed and receive the purchase money, and in December, 1900, Pearsall and Patton tendered him the money and requested him to execute the deed, and, he refusing, they deposited $700 in bank on the 7th of December, 1900, and notified Elder that he could get it by calling on B. F. Meighen for a check payable to Elder, and left in Meighen's hands, to be delivered upon delivery of the deed. The bill avers the continued readiness of the plaintiff to perform the contract, and brings said purchase money into court. Upon demurrer to the bill, the court dismissed it, and the gas company appeals.

In a brief it is claimed that, if the agreements are to be regarded as options, they are of no force, because the acceptance of them was subject to examination and approval of title, with complete abstract, whereas acceptance of an option must be unconditional. Weaver v. Burr, 31 W. Va. 736, 8 S. E. 743, 3 L. R. A. 94; Watson v. Coast, 35 W. Va. 463, 14 S. E. 249. But the condition in the acceptance was nothing more than the condition contained in the option, if an option, and surely an acceptance may insert a condition consistent with the option itself. If this condition had been left out of the acceptance, the condition would have been spoken by the option. The acceptance only repeated unnecessarily what the option contained. But I regard the papers, not as options, but as actual sale; and the presence of a subsequent condition of defeasance does not make them options, or any the less contracts of sale. Monongah v. Fleming, 42 W. Va. 538, 26 S. E. 201. Viewed as such, no acceptance was necessary. True, as the papers say that Elder "agrees to sell" and make no binding obligations on either party till payment, we might regard them as options. But that is immaterial, for, if options, acceptance made them ordinary contracts, governed by their terms. Watson v. Coast, 35 W. Va. 463, 14 S. E. 249. The papers provide that deed shall be made at payment—both at same moment. So payment was not the act of acceptance.

Treating the papers as such contracts, the defense says that failure to make the first payment on the day fixed caused the contracts to end—worked their rescission—because time is made by them the essence of the contract. The general rule is that time of payment is not of the essence of the contract, as the purchase money is a simple debt, and interest is compensation for delay of payment. Ballard v. Ballard, 25 W. Va. 470. But the parties may lawfully make it so, and that such is the intent in this case is manifest from the papers. But the contracts demand good title, and impose upon Elder duty to exhibit abstract of good title and delivery of deed simultaneously with the first payment, and give Staggars right to examine title in the very forfeiting clause. The words requiring payment on a given day alone do make time the essence; but do the provisions that Elder is to show abstracts of title, make a deed, and allow time for examination of title, modify this? Staggars is required to pay on a day, but on that same day, at the time of payment, Elder must show abstract of title and have a deed in his hand. These are dependent covenants. Staggars was bound to offer payment, but Elder was bound to do the things required of him, and Staggars was not bound to deliver the money until Elder was ready to do those things resting on him. Watson v. Coast, 35 W. Va. 463, 14 S. E. 249; Barrett v. McAllister, 33 W. Va. 738, 11 S. E. 220. Which had to perform, or offer to perform, his duty first—Elder or Staggars? Must Staggars seek Elder and offer to pay, and demand title abstract and deed? Or must Elder seek Staggars, and offer abstract and deed, and ask payment? Here we cannot say that the duty is first on either. We cannot draw so nice a distinction when duty rests on both. Waterman, Specif. Perform. § 444. The general rule is that a vendor must have and show good title, and these contracts require Elder to show title and make a deed at the time of first payment. As the contracts required him to have in his hand these papers, we may fairly say that it was his duty to tender them. He did not do this, and we can as fairly ascribe fault in him in this, as in Staggars—perhaps more so. And by the contracts, if Staggars had offered payment, had declared readiness on the day, Staggars was to have time to examine title.

Was payment a condition precedent, so that without it no right in equity to the land vested in Staggars by the contracts, or did the contracts vest an estate subject to be defeated by noncompliance with the subsequent condition of payment? "When a contract depends on a condition precedent, or, in other words, where the intention of the parties is that no right shall vest until certain prescribed acts are done or omitted, or unless certain prescribed acts are done or omitted before a specified time, then equity will not relieve against a breach of such precedent condition, for no court has power to make a new contract for the parties which shall confer rights where no rights originally existed. But if a contract contains a condition subsequent, or, in other words, if the intention of the parties is that the rights under the agreement shall vest at once upon its conclusion, subject to be defeated or ended upon the nonperformance of the provision which constitutes the subsequent condition, or its nonperformance at or before a specified day, then equity, by virtue of its jurisdiction over penalties and forfeitures, has power to relieve the defaulting party from the loss or forfeiture caused by his breach of this subsequent condition. This power of relief would even more certainly exist when the breach was a failure, not to do the thing at all, but merely to do it at or within a specified time. It is therefore held in a great number of cases that the forfeiture provided for by such a clause as the one described above, on failure of the party to fulfill at the proper time, unless such failure is intentional, or causes an injury to the other party which cannot be compensated, will be disregarded and set aside in equity; and the defaulting party, performing, or being ready and willing to perform, at a subsequent time, will be allowed to enforce the contract notwithstanding delay. In short, the general doctrine is applied in the face of such express provision declaring the contract ended in case of nonfulfillment of its terms at the appointed day, unless the agreement is so worded that a compliance with these terms at the prescribed time is made a condition precedent to the vesting of any rights." "Where the clause provides for a forfeiture upon the nonpayment of the purchase price at the time stipulated, and is therefore intended to secure punctuality in payment, it has been regarded as almost a matter of course for equity to disregard it and permit a subsequent payment, since interest is treated as a sufficient compensation for delay. But even here the delay must not be willful, nor the delay unreasonable." Pomeroy, Specif. Perform. §§ 379, 380; Waterman, Specif. Perform. § 437.

I hold that this provision for a payment is not a condition precedent, but subsequent, and that an estate vested subject to be defeated, under circumstances, by nonpayment. Under these principles, equity has power to disregard this forfeiture. Especially under the circumstances of this case, as stated in the bill, which circumstances are that Elder did not furnish abstract of title or a deed, or offer to do so, and his title at the date fixed for payment was bad, to a material part of the land. "If the defendant's delay or default has caused the plaintiff's failure to perform in time, he cannot object to such failure as a defense, however plain and explicit may be the provision of the contract requiring punctuality. A vendor who cannot make a clear title in time cannot set up the purchaser's default in prompt payment of price." Pomeroy, Specif. Perform. § 381. "But if a party who insists upon exact time has himself been the cause of delay, a court will notwithstanding decree specific performance. The vendor is not entitled to forfeit the contract, as against the vendee, when he is himself in no condition to perform, even though by the terms of a contract he has right to declare it forfeited, and retain what has been paid, if the vendee makes the default." Waterman, Specif. Perform. § 436. Suppose Staggars had gone with his money to pay Elder on the day; he would have found title defective, and equity will not require him to do a useless thing, and forfeit his right. "A tender of performance need not be made when it would be wholly nugatory, as where the vendor is unable to carry out the contract by reason of liens." Waterman, Specif. Perform. § 446.

Here is another reason for equity to relieve against the letter of the contract. According to the bill, Elder, after the day for payment, joined with others who had sold coal in employing lawyers to investigate title, and dispensed with payment until abstracts should be made, and agreed that the contracts remain in force. "Though time have been expressly made of the essence of the contract, yet the benefit of such an agreement may be waived, either at law or in equity." 2 Lomax, Dig. 72. "Specific performance may be decreed in favor of a party who has failed to perform his part of the agreement, if he can show acquiescence in the delay by the other party, or acceptance of a substitute for literal performance." Waterman, Specif. Perform. § 478. "A party may waive a condition, or treat the contract after default as continuing in force, in which case he cannot insist on a forfeiture." Waterman, Specif. Perform. §§ 449, 480.

It is said that, waiving strict compliance, yet the 11 months between the day of payment and day of tender is too great a delay. The answer is that the chosen attorneys of Elder were in the work of examining the titles to various tracts—Elder's among them—and he agreed to await their report. It may be that it was a long time to examine title; but the bill represents that Elder aided in the work, employed the attorneys, and did not insist on haste, but consented to such delay, recognizing right to complete the sale when report on title should come.

It is objected that the gas company has no right to sue on these contracts, because there was no contract by Elder with it, and because the corporation was not in being at its date. By the contracts Staggers acquired an estate. He assigned to Pearsalls, and they purchased in trust for the contemplated corporation, or its component organizers. Pearsalls, by deed, conveyed their estate under the contracts to the corporation. Now, it does seem that the right is vested in the corporation, if these facts are true. The bill charges that Elder recognized the coming corporation as owner of the contracts. The Pearsalls held as trustees for it, and they executed the trust by their accepted deed. Whatever rights were under the contracts, they came to it. We held in Bank v. Lumber Company, 32 W. Va. 357, 9 S. E. 243, that a deed made and delivered in escrow for a corporation not yet incorporated, named as grantee, and delivered to it when incorporated, was valid. Here the estate was held by individuals as trustees, and passed to the corporation when it came into being. It is not necessary to say that Elder treated with the corporation, as he contracted with a natural person an estate which finally went to the corporation, and this makes a privity between it and Elder. "As a corporation may, in most states, ratify or adopt a contract made in its behalf by promoters before incorporation, and thus become liable thereon, it may thus also acquire the right to enforce the same. By such ratification or adoption it makes such contract its own, and may sue thereon in its name. When a contract by the promoters of a corporation with the owner of land, under which the latter agrees to sell the land to the corporation when organized, is adopted by the corporation, it may sue for specific performance." 1 Cook on Corp. § 102. We are not in a court of law, but in equity, which looks at substance, and will not allow a lawful contract to be worthless on purely technical ground. The corporation accepted the deed from Pearsalls.

It seems to me that Staggers, the Pearsalls, and their associates, should be made parties. This was not assigned as ground of demurrer. It may be thought that this is ground of sustaining the decree of dismissal, but I do not think so, as the court should have required them to be made parties, under section 58, c. 125, Code 1899.

Our conclusion is to reverse the decree, overrule the demurrer to the second amended bill, direct the plaintiff to amend by making the persons indicated parties, and remand the cause, with direction that a rule be given the defendants to answer, and for further proceedings.

CLIFTON v. TOWN OF WESTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Nov. 28, 1903.)

AFFIRMATIVE ALLEGATION—BURDEN OF PROOF—LIMITATIONS—MANDATORY INJUNCTION—OBSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAY.

1. A bill alleges that certain deeds of plaintiff cover a certain strip of ground claimed by the defendant as part of a public street, which is denied by the answer. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to establish such allegation.

2. The bill alleges title by adverse possession, which is denied by the answer. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that such possession for the period of 10 years has been continuous, actual, hostile, notorious, and exclusive.

3. The syllabus in the case of Ralston v. Weston, 33 S. E. 326, 46 W. Va. 554, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834, approved.

4. In a case plainly calling for it, a mandatory injunction will be awarded to compel a nuisance to remove obstructions from a public highway.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lewis County; C. C. Higginbotham, Special Judge.

Bill by Ella Clifton against the town of Weston. From a decree dissolving an injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Brannon and H. M. Russell, for appellant. Edward A. Brannon, for appellee.

DENT, J. Ella Clifton complains of a decree of the circuit court of Lewis county dissolving an injunction obtained by her against the town of Weston. Deducting from the bill and answer the numerous, cumbrous, and unnecessary allegations contained therein, this controversy narrows itself to the right of the public to an easement for public uses in a small strip of ground situated within or adjacent to Mulberry street in the town of Weston. Plaintiff claims this strip, first, by virtue of her title papers for certain lots abutting on Mulberry street; second, by virtue of long continuous adverse possession thereto under claim or color of title. The defendant positively denies both of these claims. This casts on the plaintiff the burden of making good such claims by her proof. As to the first, she introduces no evidence to establish it; hence we may justly regard it as abandoned. As to the second, plaintiff fails to show such hostile, actual, notorious, exclusive, continuous possession under claim of title as would destroy the public easement. The title to the land is not involved. Her deeds for her lots confer on plaintiff the title to the land to the middle of Mulberry street, subject only to the public easement, and she has the right to the possession and use of the same so long as she does not interfere with such public easement. Spencer v. Point Pleasant R. R. Co., 23 W. Va. 406; Ralston v. Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. 326, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834. Her possession and inclosure thereof is not hostile to the public so long as the easement is not needed for public use. It will be presumed that such possession is in subordination to the rights of the public until there is a plain and positive disclaimer of the public rights, the assertion of adverse title, and notice to the proper legal authorities. Flynn v. Lee, 81 W. Va. 487, 7 S. E. 430; Hudson v. Putney, 14 W. Va. 561; Clarke v. McClure, 10 Grat. 805; Jarvis v. Grafton, 44 W. Va. 453, 30 S. E. 178; Taylor v. Philippi, 35 W. Va. 554, 14 S. E. 130. Nor will her possession and obstruction thereof by fences and buildings be deemed a public nuisance, but rather a permissible use, until she has notice to remove such obstructions. So that her holding could not be deemed adverse until she refused to remove such obstructions and brought home notice to the proper authorities that she was claiming possession not in subordination to, but in opposition to, the public easement. While she holds the title to the land, the public easement therein is common property, in which she enjoys the right of user along with the public generally, and there is no good reason why she should not use the whole thereof, and the public easement remain in abeyance, until such time as the public necessities might require the same. The law never presumes that a citizen, whose duty is to preserve, is engaged in destroying, public rights, until the undutiful intent of such citizen is established by her own evidence. If it was her original purpose to defraud the public in taking possession of the street, she should now be able to establish such intention, with notice to the proper legal authorities. Failing to do so, the presumption must be in favor of the integrity of her citizenship and the legality of her actions. Foley v. County Court (decided at this term) 46 S. E. 246; Commonwealth v. Moorehead, 118 Pa. 344, 12 Atl. 424, 4 Am. St. Rep. 599. Even allowing the statute of limitations applicable to cases of this character, under the decision of Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 36, plaintiff has failed to establish her right to the benefit thereof. This court, however, has emphatically and advisedly disapproved of the doctrine sought to be established in the case of Wheeling v. Campbell, and since unwittingly followed in some subsequent cases, and has finally determined that such doctrine is not now, and never was, the law of this state. Ralston v. Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. 326, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834. The plaintiff insists that, if the law is adhered to, many persons in Weston will suffer the loss of valuable property they have acquired by fencing in the public highways of the town. If such be true, they ought to suffer. Persons who are so indifferent to the Golden Rule and their public obligations as to make the destruction of public easements the source of private gain deserve no commiseration at the hands of violated law. The more there are of such persons, the greater the need of those sovereign principles that prevent private aggression of public rights. The mistaken departure from these principles in the case of Wheeling v. Campbell has caused endless fictitious claims to portions of the public highways to spring up all over the state, to be bolstered up by false swearing and manufactured evidence, to the great detriment of public interests and private morality. The law as vindicated will put a stop to all such claims, restore respect for public rights, and promote the welfare and peace of all communities alike. No man can or should be permitted to acquire in any manner whatsoever the sovereign rights of the people contrary to their sovereign will. Opposition to this doctrine tends to anarchy pure and simple.

The court has already said so much on the subject of public easements heretofore that a continuance thereof has become nothing more than a vain repetition and a waste of words. Foley v. County Court, and Ralston v. Weston, cited; McClellan v. Weston, 49 W. Va. 669, 39 S. E. 670, 55 L. R. A. 898; Weston v. Ralston, 48 W. Va. 170, 36 S. E. 446. The circuit court dismissed the plaintiff's bill, and wholly ignored the defendant's prayer for affirmative relief. The dismissal of the bill thus carried the answer with it, and was equivalent to a refusal of the relief prayed. By the dismissal of the bill the matter in controversy was determined against the plaintiff, and became res adjudicata, and, having the parties before it, the court should have gone on, and given the defendant complete re-hief, so as to end the litigation between the parties over the subject-matter of the suit. The dismissal of the bill carries with it the general replication, and leaves the answer, in so far as it seeks affirmative relief, without replication. Under section 35, c. 125, Code 1899, its affirmative allegation on which is founded its prayer for affirmative relief must be taken to be true. The only real question of controversy presented by both bill and answer was as to whether the survey and plat made by Peter Flesher of Mulberry street were correct. The plaintiff alleged they were not, but failed to sustain such allegation by proof, and her bill was dismissed. This was an adjudication of the issue in favor of the defendant. From the proof and the pleadings it is apparent that the plaintiff abandoned claim to the controverted strip of ground under her title papers, and relied wholly on her possession under the statute of limitations to destroy the public easement. This being determined against her, she was without a case, and presented no defense to the affirmative allegations and prayer of the answer. Such being the state of the pleadings, the court should have entered a decree forever settling the controversy between the parties in accordance with the prayer of the answer, and thus put an end to further litigation.

The decree is amended so as to award a mandatory injunction requiring the plaintiff to remove all obstructions placed by her on Mulberry street as shown by the survey and plat of Peter Flesher, and, as so amended, is affirmed, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court, with directions to enforce the performance of such mandatory injunction.

On Petition for Rehearing.

Plaintiff insists that the affirmative of the issue in this case was on the defendant. The only issue presented by the bill and answer and general replication was as to whether the plaintiff's deeds covered the strip of land in controversy. Plaintiff alleged that they did, and further alleged that the survey made by Peter Flesher was incorrect, in that it showed that plaintiff's deeds did not cover the strip of land in controversy. If plaintiff's deeds did cover the strip of land in controversy, then the Peter Flesher survey would be incorrect, but, if the plaintiff's deeds did not cover the strip of land in controversy, then the Peter Flesher survey is correct. The whole issue, therefore, depended on whether the plaintiff's deeds covered the strip of land in controversy. Plaintiff, to sustain her equity, alleged that they did. This defendant denied. Hence the issue. Without such affirmative allegation, the plaintiff's bill was without equity. When such allegation is denied, the equity is denied, unless sustained by proof. Not only had plaintiff the affirmative of the issue, but it entirely depended on plaintiff's title papers, for the defendant had none. Not only had plaintiff the affirmative of the issue, but, if true, the proofs thereof were entirely in her possession and under her control. The case that plaintiff relies upon as sustaining the proposition that the burden of proof is on the defendant is the case of Mason City S. & M. Co. v. Town of Mason, 23 W. Va. 211. A careful comparison between the cases will show that they materially differ with each other in every respect. In the former case the dedication of the streets sought to be opened was denied, and it was admitted in the pleadings that plaintiff's title papers covered the same. On page 218, Judge Woods says: "The answer, in general terms, denies that plaintiff is seised in fee simple of the lands claimed by it, but does not deny that the plaintiff claims title through the several conveyances filed with the bill, or that they do not include the land claimed by plaintiff, or that the deeds do not pass the title to said lands, or that the several grantors did not in fact execute and deliver said conveyances to said several grantees, or pretend to show that said deeds convey or reserve to the defendant said 'Wide' alley and Alley D."

In the present case the dedication of Mulberry street is admitted by plaintiff's title papers, and it is positively denied that such title papers cover the strip of ground in controversy, but that, to the contrary, they recognize the same as a part of Mulberry street. In the former case the statute of limitations was involved, but by the settled decisions of this court that question has been entirely eliminated from this case. Hence such former case is no authority for shifting the affirmative of the issue from the plaintiff to the defendant. There is another reason which I suggest, and in which the court does not unite, that must have some force in the future determination of similar cases, as bearing on the burden of proof; and this is that, since the determination of the case before referred to, the Legislature has seen fit to recognize town councils as inferior judicial tribunals in the determination of questions involving the rights of individuals and property, and has made their decision subject to review by the higher judicial tribunals of the state. Section 2, c. 110, Code 1899. It has thereby rendered unnecessary the appeal to equity in such cases unless irreparable injury is threatened, or it is necessary to preserve the property in statu quo until the right thereto can be properly determined. In the present case the only reason for an appeal to equity is because the defendant has notified the plaintiff to move her fence back off the street. She had a perfect right without coming into equity to present her case to the town council, and, on a finding adverse to her, to have the matter reviewed by the higher judicial tribunals of the state. If the survey of Peter Flesher was incorrect, she had the right to bring the matter to the attention of the town council, and, on their failure to correct it, to have such correction made by the circuit court. Hence, so far as the case shows, she had a perfectly adequate remedy at law, as there is no proof that she had applied to the town council and they had refused her relief, or that it was in any way preventing her from obtaining a hearing of her grievances, or was going to seize her property. The town council is a local tribunal authorized to hear and determine all questions of nuisance between its citizens and the public, and its final orders and judgments are subject to control and review by the higher judicial tribunals of the state; and there is no good reason why it should not be appealed to in the first instance, unless irreparable damage is about to be done by the taking of property contrary to law, which it is powerless to or refuses to prevent, and, if the plaintiff disregards such an available remedy, he should assume the burden of proving his equity.

It is the duty of this court to give to, and insist that proper respect should be given to, the determinations of all inferior tribunals, and throw around them the presumption that they will afford all applicants speedy redress of their grievances in accordance with law, especially when the law affords a prompt and legal mode for reviewing their final decisions by higher tribunals, and in no case should a resort to equity be entertained when such mode of review exists and furnishes adequate relief. Board of Education v. Holt, Judge, 51 W. Va. 435, 41 S. E. 337.

The town council of Weston is authorized by law to superintend the public highways within its jurisdiction, and keep them free from nuisances. As incidental thereto, it has the right to determine when a nuisance exists, and, if it makes such determination wrongfully, its action may be reviewed and reversed by writ of certiorari. The council in the present case made a preliminary survey of its streets according to plaintiff's title papers, and found that plaintiff's fence encroached upon the street. It thereupon notified her to remove the same. She, without applying to the council for relief as to the survey, immediately obtained an injunction, claiming that her title papers covered the strip of ground claimed to be a part of Mulberry street. The council had already determined this question to the contrary—ex parte, it is true—but she had the right to apply to it for a review of such ex parte determination, and she had no right to the aid of a court of equity unless she could allege and prove that she was threatened with irreparable injury, or at least that the council was about to take her land without condemnation. In short, to sustain her injunction, she must both allege and prove that it was her land the council was about to take from her by illegal methods. The town not only denied that it was her land, but demanded that she be required to abate the nuisance maintained thereon by her. She having failed to maintain her case, the court could not do otherwise than require her to abate the nuisance, that the litigation between the parties might be finally ended. She alleges in her bill that she will be greatly injured by the loss of this strip of ground. This is denied in the answer, and there is no proof of such injury. She still insists that she is greatly injured by the retroactive effect of the decision in the case of Ralston v. Town of Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. 326, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834, because it takes from her a strip of ground to which she has shown no title, except that she has occupied and used it for more than 10 years. In short, because the public has magnanimously permitted her to occupy and use a portion of the public highway for more than 10 years, that the public easement therein has been thereby destroyed, and cannot be reclaimed by the public except by condemnation and payment of compensation therefor. She occupies and uses the public land without rental, and, when the public would reclaim it, she demands payment for restoring it, and claims that otherwise she will be greatly injured. She gets all. The public gets nothing, but must pay her for its own. She failed to show that her title papers covered the land in controversy; hence she has failed to show that she had a claim of title thereto, as her claim of title was asserted under such title papers, and mere occupancy without claim of title will not vest title in her. Her claim of title did not cover the land. In addition, all sovereignty resides in the people of this country, all sovereign rights belong to them, and the title to all lands are derived from them. The plaintiff holds title to her lots by authority of the people alone. She cannot acquire any rights in the public highways except by appointment or consent of the people, as the highways appertain to the people's sovereign rights; and the decision of any court, it matters not how long or how often acquiesced in, that attempts to deprive the people of their sovereign rights contrary to their will and appointment, should be regarded as a nullity, and as furnishing no rule on which to found the rights of private property, but subject to disapproval whenever properly brought in question. Such decisions are violative of the fundamental principles of popular government, and it is the duty of every participator in the people's sovereignty, who enjoys rights and protection thereunder, to repudiate the benefits of such decisions, and seek to blot them out at their earliest opportunity. As such decisions are not merely malum prohibita, but malum in se, every citizen must take notice of their vicious character; and if, moved by covetousness, any citizen attempts to take advantage thereof to his private emolument, in total disregard of his sovereign duties, he has no reason to complain when he is deprived of his unlawful gains by the restoration of the people's sovereign rights according to their will and appointment.

The high character and extensive learning of the judges who render a decision subversive of the sovereign rights of the people add to such decision neither strength nor potency, but only tend to show the imperfection of the human intellect, and that wisdom is not confined to the sages, but that they may sometimes be led to their advantage by a "little child."

Upon Application for Rehearing.

BRANNON, J. It was claimed in oral argument that the bill states that Ella Clifton owns the disputed strip of ground, because included in her deed, and that it is not a part of Mulberry street, and that the answer does not deny this, and that the bill ought to be taken for true, and thus establish her right to the ground free of street servitude. This contention cannot be sustained by bill and answer. The bill asserts that the disputed strip is the plaintiff's, not a part of the street. The answer asserts that it is a part of the street, and not within the plaintiff's deed. The whole drift and general intent of the answer is in denial of the facts alleged for relief in the bill. It fairly denies it logically. They both cannot logically coexist in harmony. If the one is true, the other is not. An answer is sufficient if it substantially denies the bill. Mason City Salt & Mining Co. v. Town of Mason, 23 W. Va. 211. Such is the result upon a general construction of bill and answer. But look at the specific allegations. The bill says that plaintiff owns the ground which the town is about to take, and it is not a part of Mulberry street. The answer pointedly says that the street as laid out on the plan of Butcher's Addition was 50 feet in width in front of the Clifton property, and when dedicated and accepted had that width, but that "said street has been encroached upon by the plaintiff during the time of her ownership of the property adjoining until said street is now narrowed to the width of 39 feet at its widest point, and 37 feet at its narrowest point." It charges that the plaintiff has deliberately moved out her fencing upon said Mulberry street to the extent of 22 feet as a part of her property. Respondent charges that no part of said street was ever conveyed or ever purported to be conveyed by any deed to the plaintiff, but that she "deliberately moved out her fence and included said strip within her property." It again asserts that she claims ground beyond her deeds, and adds: "Respondent charges that the plaintiff has inclosed within her lot ground of the width of 22 feet, and that she has thus 100 feet called for in her title papers, exclusive of the strip of Mulberry street inclosed by her." How can it be said that the answer does not deny the allegation of the bill that the plaintiff's deed covers the disputed strip, and that she has not invaded the street or inclosed any of it? In other clauses the answer denies this matter of the bill.

In view of an earnest argument on a petition for rehearing as to the burden of proof,

I deem it proper to discuss that question. Upon whom rests the burden of proof in this case? As just stated, the bill avers that the plaintiff's deed includes the strip in controversy. A plaintiff in ejectment or trespass, or in chancery, suing to recover ground, or damages to it, or rights in it, must lay down his deed upon the ground, to see whether it covers it. He cannot succeed without showing it to be his ground. This is affirmative matter. He cannot call upon the defendant to prove that he is in the right, and the charge against him false. The plaintiff says her deed gives her lots 100 feet in length. She admits that where that 100 feet ends at the west end of her lots is Mulberry street. Is she not called on to prove just how far her 100 feet goes—where her deed goes? Or is she not called upon to show the line of the street—where the 50 feet goes? When she shows one or both, she shows the true location of lot and street, and shows either that she does or does not invade the street. This is affirmative, not negative, matter. It is capable of physical proof. Simply because an answer asserts affirmative facts by way of denial of affirmative facts of a bill does not put the burden on the defendant. An answer may simply deny by negative words the allegation of a bill, or it may deny the bill by asserting facts logically denying it—facts which, if true, render it false. This is not confession and avoidance. It lacks the element of confession. It is traverse. The facts deny the truth of the allegation, by making it impossible for that allegation to be true. "As a general rule, the burden of proof rests with that party who would be defeated if no evidence at all were offered." 11 Amer. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 335. Can it be thought that the plaintiff could succeed without proof? The plaintiff says that the strip in dispute is not a part of the street. She must prove it. It cannot be thought that because this assertion is in negative form, the plaintiff is excused from proving it, and the defendant must prove that it is a part of the street. "It is well settled that whoever asserts a claim or defense which depends upon a negative must, as in other cases, establish the truth of the allegation." 1 Jones on Ev. § 178; giving the instance where a party asserts that another did not build according to specifications, that proper care had not been used, and other instances. "The burden of proving any given claim or defense rests upon the one who asserts it. Whoever desires any court to give judgment as to any legal right or liability dependent on the existence or nonexistence of facts which he asserts or denies to exist must prove that those facts do or do not exist." Id. "The burden is upon him who asserts the affirmative in substance, rather than in mere form." Id. We find in 5 Eng. & Amer. Ency. L. 28, this, after statement that the form of allegation, whether negative or affirmative, is of no consequence: "If, regardless of terms, it is borne in mind that when the issue is joined he has the burden of proof who seeks to move the court to act in his favor, the question of whether the grounds of his claim are alleged affirmatively or negatively is really of no consequence. And if the term 'affirmative' is insisted upon as being inseparable from the 'burden of proof,' it must be remembered that the affirmative of the issue does not depend upon the form of the pleading, but the rule is concerned with the substance of the issue, and that only. Therefore, where the proof of negative matters is essential to the maintenance of a cause of action, this may necessitate a negative averment, and the plaintiff has the burden of proving it, because, looking at the substance of the issue as a whole, he must be regarded as asserting the affirmative thereof." Apply this law in this case. To succeed, the plaintiff must, as she did, assert two facts: First, that her deed covered the ground in dispute; second, that the street did not. And she had to prove one or the other, and thereby prove both. She asserted a tort by the town, and she must prove the elements going to constitute the tort; otherwise she would fail. The plaintiff must prove a tort.

But it is contended that the town failed to prove that Peter Flesher's survey and plat show the true location of the street. To this there are two answers: The first is that "it is incumbent on the plaintiff to show by allegations and proof his right to a decree before he can require the defendant to sustain the affirmative allegations of his answer." Bryant v. Groves, 42 W. Va. 10, 24 S. E. 605. Plaintiff had to prove that her lots, and not the street, covered this ground, before demanding proof that the Flesher plat is correct. It might be incorrect, and yet the claim of the plaintiff wholly or partially incorrect. The second answer is that the plaintiff in her bill first presented Flesher's survey as the claim of the town, and affirmed that its basis was an old line, called the "Banks line," and that that line had not been properly located by Flesher, and his survey was not correct. The answer denied this by asserting that Flesher's survey was correct. The town did not, but the plaintiff did, thus assume the burden of proof as to this survey. Under law above given, she was called upon, not to prove a logical negative, but to show where the Banks line is—where the street is—and thus overthrow Flesher's plat. She must herself show the true physical location of that line, and defeat that plat, and sustain her own assertion. We must not too much rely on the rule that a negative cannot be proven, but look at the substance of the issue, not merely the form of the allegation.

The case of Mason City Salt & Mining Co. v. Mason, 23 W. Va. 211, is cited as pointed authority to sustain the appellant. It cannot rule this case. There the bill asserts title in the plaintiff by deeds, and that they covered the ground which the town proposed to open as a street; also that the plaintiff had possession for a time sufficient to give title—and thus sets up two reasons showing title. The answer denied neither. The court said that the answer did not deny that the plaintiff claimed title by its deeds; did not deny that its deeds covered the disputed ground, or that they did not pass title to it; and did not deny the possession alleged by the bill as giving title. How could the plaintiff be asked to prove those matters, when they were not denied? The answer was held not good to put those matters in issue. Of course, the defendant was held to prove matter not denying the answer—affirmative matter, such as dedication. The syllabus shows, if there had been a proper answer denying that the plaintiff's deeds covered the ground in dispute, and claiming it as a street, and denying possession, it would have called upon the plaintiff to prove those matters. It sustains the position taken in this case, when properly read. Seim v. O'Grady, 42 W. Va. 77, 24 S. E. 994, is a case where a bill was filed to sell a curtesy for a judgment in land bought by the wife, but to whom no deed was made in her lifetime, but was made to her heirs after her death, which deed acknowledged payment of purchase money by her. Defendants set up that she only paid part of it, and they had paid the balance. This was affirmative matter, which rested on the defense to prove. The court said, as the deed acknowledged payment by her, its recital was evidence against the heirs, and made a prima facie case of payment by her, which the defendant must meet. The case is no authority in this case.

As to the contention that the decision in Wheeling v. Campbell, 12 W. Va. 36, that there can be adverse possession to bar the public right in a street vested property, and that the later decisions in Ralston v. Town of Weston, 46 W. Va. 544, 33 S. E. 326, 76 Am. St. Rep. 834, and other later cases take away vested right of property acquired by such possession without due process of law, contrary to the Constitution of the United States (amendment 14), I think the point not well taken. I will simply refer to what is contained in an opinion in Town v. Ralston, 48 W. Va. 170, 187, 36 S. E. 446, and add that Central Land Co. v. Laidley, 159 U. S. 103, 16 Sup. Ct. 80, 40 L. Ed. 91, overrules this contention in the syllabus, reading as follows: "When the parties have been fully heard in the regular course of judicial proceedings, an erroneous decision of a state court does not deprive the unsuccessful party of his property without due process of law, within the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States." Marchant v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 153 U. S. 380, 14 Sup. Ct. 894, 38 L. Ed. 751, holds the same.

Nov. 21, 1903.)SUMMONS — OYER — SUFFICIENCY — ACTION AGAINST CORPORATION — NEGLIGENCE — GAS WELL — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — VENUE — PLEA IN ABATEMENT.

1. The summons in an action of trespass on the case is not a part of the record until made so by oyer.

2. Advantage of a variance between the writ and declaration can be taken by plea in abatement only and after oyer.

3. A summons setting forth the full corporate name of a defendant corporation, without reciting that it is a corporation, is sufficient.

4. The owner of a gas well, situated near a public highway, may lawfully open it for the purpose of allowing the gas to blow the water out of it, although the noise thereby made is clearly such as to frighten the horses of persons riding or driving along the highway; but in doing so he must exercise care not thereby to inflict injury upon such persons or their property.

5. Persons using horses on the highway in close proximity to such well, and seeing an agent of the owner at or near it, have the right to presume that he will not open it without warning, or first looking for travelers on the road, and are not guilty of contributory negligence in failing to turn and fly from it, or in failing to give warning of their presence.

6. When, by the negligent blowing off of such well, a teamster's horses become frightened, and in attempting to control them a line breaks, causing him to fall from his wagon, whereby he is injured, the proximate cause of the injury is the blowing off of the well, although the line is weak and wholly insufficient for such an emergency.

7. In such action, if the declaration shows the jurisdiction of the court, and no plea in abatement has been filed, the judgment will not be reversed for want of proof of the venue as laid. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Wetzel County; M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by Robert Snyder against the Philadelphia Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error Affirmed.

Rucker, Anderson & Hughes, J. W. McIntire, and E. L. Robinson, for plaintiff in error. John A. Howard, for defendant in error.

POFFENBARGER, J. As the defendant in error, Robert Snyder, driving a two-horse wagon loaded with baled hay along a public road in Wetzel county approached a point in the road from which a gas well owned by the Philadelphia Company of West Virginia stood about 50 feet distant, W. W. Little, an agent and employé of said company, opened the valve or gate of the pipe in which the gas was confined under great pressure, and permitted it to escape, thereby causing a hissing and roaring noise, which frightened plaintiff's horses, and caused him to be thrown or to fall from the top of the load of hay to the ground, where the wheels of the wagon passed over his leg, badly fracturing it, and inflicting, as is claimed, permanent injury. In an action against the company he recovered a judgment for the sum of $2,500 as damages for the injury inflicted by the alleged negligence of said company. Of this judgment said company complains.

The first assignment of error is predicated upon the action of the court in overruling the demurrer to the declaration and each count thereof. Upon the demurrer an effort is made to take advantage of the failure of the summons to say or recite that the defendant company is a corporation, it merely naming the defendant as the "Philadelphia Company of West Virginia." An objection of this kind cannot be raised by demurrer. Advantage of it can be taken only by plea in abatement on the ground of a variance of the declaration from the writ. In cases other than misnomer "the defendant on whom the process summoning him to answer appears to have been served shall not take advantage of any defect in the writ or return, or any variance in the writ from the declaration, unless the same be pleaded in abatement." Code 1890, c. 125, § 15; Hoffman v. Bircher, 22 W. Va. 537; Anderson v. Doolittle, 38 W. Va. 629, 18 S. E. 724. The omission does not make the writ void, for it is mere matter of description. The corporate name is fully set out, and the alleged defect is mere failure to describe the defendant as a corporation. This could have been cured by amendment, and said section 15 permits the amendment to be made. If the defect could be treated as a misnomer, the writ is amendable on mere motion accompanied by an affidavit of the right name, under section 14 of chapter 125. Such plea could not have been filed without having first made the writ a part of the record by demanding oyer thereof. 4 Min. Ins. 1266; 5 Rob. Pr. 98; Hogg's Pl. & F. 166, note 8; Stephens v. White, 2 Wash. 212; Watson's Ex'r v. Lynch's Heirs, 4 Munf. 94. To have availed itself of the plea in abatement, oyer of the writ must have been had, and the plea in abatement filed before any other plea was put in. A plea in abatement raises the question of jurisdiction, and after a general appearance the jurisdiction of the court for want of sufficient process cannot ordinarily be raised. 4 Min. Ins. 1266. Objections which do not go to the substance of an action are treated as waived if not made when the occasion of them arises. "It is a well-established rule that by appearing and pleading to the action a defendant waives all defects in the process or the service thereof. The cases go further, and imply such a waiver from the defendant's taking or consenting to a continuance as fully as they do from his pleading to the action. The object of the writ is to apprise the defendant of the nature of the proceeding against him. The fact of his taking or agreeing to a continuance is evidence of his having made himself a party to the record, and of his having recognized the case as in court. It is too late for him afterwards to say that he has not been regularly brought in to court." Harvey v. Skipwith, 16 Grat.

410. By appearance to the action for any other purpose than to take advantage of the defective execution or nonexecution of process, a defendant places himself expressly in the situation in which he would be if process were executed upon him. Mahany v. Kephart, 15 W. Va. 609; Bank v. Bank, 3 W. Va. 386; Lumber Co. v. Lance & Co., 50 W. Va. 636, 41 S. E. 128. Had all these dilatory steps been taken by the defendant, they might have been unavailing even under adverse rulings of the courts, for many decisions hold that it is unnecessary to append the descriptive words "a corporation." See Gillett v. Stove Co., 29 Grat. 565, in which both writ and declaration omitted the words, but were held good; Woolf v. Steamboat Co., 62 E. C. L. 103; Norris v. Statts, Hob. 110; Henriques v. West India Co., 2 Ld. Raym. 1534; Rees v. Bank, 5 Rand. 326, 16 Am. Dec. 755; Douglass v. Railroad Co., 44 W. Va. 267, 28 S. E. 705; State v. Dry Fork R. R. Co., 50 W. Va. 235, 40 S. E. 447; Railroad Co. v. Sherman's Adm'r, 30 Grat. 602. In Woolf v. Steamboat Co. and Norris v. Statts it was said that the name argues a corporation, and that setting it forth impliedly amounts to an allegation that the defendants are a corporate body. The view has been adopted and is still adhered to both in Virginia and this state. Gillett v. Stove Co. and State v. Dry Fork R. R. Co., supra. It is inferred from the absence of anything in the brief in support of this assignment of error that it has been abandoned. At any rate, it is clear that there is nothing in it.

The criticism of the declaration is that it fails to show that the defendant violated any duty which the company owed to the plaintiff. It alleges that the defendant owned, controlled, and operated a gas well near the public highway, and that it was its duty to use due care in managing and operating said gas well, and in blowing the same off, so as not to interfere with the lawful use of said highway by persons riding and driving thereon; but that it neglected to do so. It also avers that the plaintiff, on the 28th day of April, 1897, was, as a teamster, driving his team upon and over said highway, hauling oil-well supplies, merchandise, hay, etc., in a wagon drawn by two horses driven by him, and when he, with his team, came to a point on said highway near to the said gas well said defendant, through its agents, servants, and employes then and there in charge of said gas well, not regarding its duty in the premises, carelessly and negligently managed and operated said gas well, and so carelessly and negligently caused and permitted the gas from said well to be discharged and escape with great force and in large quantities into the air, making a loud, hissing, unusual, and frightful noise, calculated to frighten horses and cause them to run away, and which did then and there frighten said horses so driven by the said plaintiff, and caused said horses to become unmanageable and run away, whereby the said plaintiff was thrown, etc. Although the well was owned by the defendant company, and was purely private property, the use of that property by the defendant is restricted by the law so far that it cannot be, either by negligence or wantonness, so operated or handled as to inflict injury upon persons or their property. The operation of a gas well is in no sense unlawful, and as it is necessary to relieve the well of the accumulation of water by opening the gate and allowing it to blow out, this operation is also lawful, and cannot be regarded as a nuisance per se. But it is well settled that a business or transaction which is in itself lawful may be so used or so conducted as to become a nuisance and make the owner liable for injury resulting therefrom. So a man may make lawful use of his property, but if he is so negligent and careless in the use thereof as to inflict injury upon others he must answer in damages. It is a principle vital and indispensable in organized society that every one must so use his property as not to injure others. Although he has the right to the exclusive dominion and enjoyment of his own property, and may do with it as he pleases, he must respect the lives, limbs, health, and property of others to the extent of exercising at least ordinary care for their safety in the use of his property. Such right of dominion and enjoyment in him is met and limited by the same right existing in other people. He must live and let live. He owes a duty to the other, and he must so use his own property as not to injure him. At least, negligence or willful misconduct on the part of the one in the use of his own property resulting in injury to the other makes him liable. Powell v. Furniture Co., 34 W. Va. 804, 12 S. E. 1085, 12 L. R. A. 53; Wilson v. Powder Co., 40 W. Va. 413, 21 S. E. 1035, 52 Am. St. Rep. 890; McGregor v. Camden, 47 W. Va. 193, 34 S. E. 936. The cases of Dicken v. Salt & Coal Co., 41 W. Va. 511, 23 S. E. 582; Woolwine's Adm'r v. Railway Co., 36 W. Va. 329, 15 S. E. 81, 16 L. R. A. 271, 32 Am. St. Rep. 859, and Poling v. Railway Co., 38 W. Va. 645, 18 S. E. 782, 24 L. R. A. 215, relied upon by the plaintiff in error, do not support its contention. The language quoted from the first, "A party who is using his own property in a lawful way cannot be guilty of a breach of duty to any one," implies that he has not been guilty of negligence or willful misconduct in the use thereof; and in all those cases it was determined by the processes of the law that there had been no negligence.

This principle is very well illustrated in a line of decisions which hold that, although it is lawful for a manufacturing establishment to maintain a steam whistle, that whistle must be used with ordinary care and due regard for the rights of others, and if, by the negligent use thereof, horses are frightened and caused to run away and inflict injury, the owner of the plant is liable for the resultant damages. Between these cases and the one now under consideration there is a very close analogy. The principles upon which they stand are well established by courts of high standing, as well as supported by fundamental principles of law, and their application to the facts of this case as set forth in the declaration makes it clearly good. "The use of a steam whistle in a manufacturing establishment is not a nuisance per se, but it may be used so as to become such. It has been held that the sounding of the steam whistle of a factory fifteen feet from the platform on which a team is being unloaded is gross negligence which will render the factory owner liable, where the person in charge of the team is not first warned by the employes in charge of the whistle, although the whistle is in plain view from such platform, and the owner of the team, while acquainted with its operation, fails to notify his driver thereof. If a horse, frightened by such whistle, pulls at the rope by which he is hitched, and is thereby killed, the proprietor of the establishment using the whistle will not be liable to pay damages, in any event, if it appear that the accident was the combined result of the noise of the whistle and the vicious habit of the horse." 1 Thomp. Neg. § 1261. In Knight v. Mfg. Co., 38 Conn. 438, 9 Am. Rep. 406, Butler, O. J., said: "Their right to use a whistle must be conceded, but like all other rights it must be so exercised as not to endanger and injure others. It is no answer to say that they did not erect or blow the whistle for any such purpose, or that they had no knowledge that it frightened horses, or that they did not suppose it was calculated to frighten them. These facts, if they existed, they were bound to know or anticipate."

The court refused to give an instruction, asked for by the defendant, telling the jury that if the plaintiff, knowing the danger of approaching the gas well, and having reason to anticipate danger, not dependent upon natural causes, but likely to happen by reason of the defendant operating its gas well, and having knowledge of the danger, approached the well, he was guilty of contributory negligence, and could not recover unless defendant's agent let off the gas with intent to frighten the horses. It is insisted that this instruction should have been given. As the plaintiff was proceeding along the public highway where he had the right to be, and the gas well had not yet been opened, he was not bound to assume that it would be opened while he was passing. He admits in his testimony that he saw Little approaching the derrick, and from this fact it might have been inferred that Little intended to open the well; but as plaintiff was already in the occupancy of the highway, the team already in close proximity to the well, where the noise, which the witnesses say was about five or six times as great as that of an ordinary locomotive whistle, was likely to frighten his horses, he was not bound to assume that the defendant's agent would do a negligent and reckless act. He had the right to assume that the agent would perform his duty and obey the law, by waiting until after the team had passed. All the evidence bearing on the question is to the effect that the plaintiff was so near the well when he saw Little going to it as to make his position dangerous if the well should be opened. Can it be said that because he did not turn back and fly from the mere prospect of such danger he was guilty of contributory negligence? The groundlessness of this contention is too apparent to require the citation of any authority.

On the motion to set aside the verdict, which the court overruled, it is argued that there was no proof of the ownership of the well by the defendant company. Throughout the entire trial, with the exception of a single question propounded by counsel for the defendant, the defendant company was never referred to by either counsel or witnesses by its full name. For the most part it was called the Philadelphia Company. The ownership of the well was not controverted, nor was there even a suggestion or intimation throughout the whole trial that the defendant company did not own and operate it. The plausible suggestion that the trial proceeded upon the tacit admission of the defendant's ownership of the well need not be adopted, if it could be. There seems to be enough evidence in the record to warrant the finding of the jury upon that point. In the testimony of a witness for the defendant, the following is found: "Q. Are you acquainted with the oil well on what is called the Barr farm in this county, belonging to the Philadelphia Company of West Virginia, or gas well? A. Yes, sir. Q. Do you remember the time that Robert Snyder was injured by falling off of a wagon near that well? A. I recollect of hearing of it. Q. Do you know anything about the condition of the road, as to bushes along the edge of it at that time, between the road and the well? A. Yes, sir." The witness then proceeds to describe the location. Clearly, he testified to that well as belonging to the defendant company, and identified it as the well near which the plaintiff was hurt. As there is no evidence to the contrary, this is sufficient upon which to rest the verdict as to the ownership of the well, and on that ground the verdict cannot be set aside. Had there been no admission of ownership by the defendant, or proof of it by his own witnesses, and no proof of it by the plaintiff, the verdict would have to stand upon the tacit admission of ownership, or else be set aside, but proof of it by the defendant relieves the court of the duty of saying whether it can stand upon the implied admission.

Further argument on the motion to set aside the verdict is based upon the theory of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, it being contended that, as the plaintiff knew the location of the well, and saw the defendant's agent there, and continued to advance to a point within 82 feet of the well, without warning the agent not to open it, and without doing anything else by way of precaution against danger, he took upon himself the risk and cannot be heard to complain of the result. This proposition has been sufficiently discussed in passing upon the instruction. The testimony further shows that, although the horses became frightened and ran, the wagon was not overturned, nor the load thrown off, and that shortly after it had started one of plaintiff's lines broke, and he fell from the wagon. Upon these facts it is insisted that the injury was due to the breaking of the line, and that as the plaintiff, in his business of hauling, was accustomed to driving through a community in which there were numerous gas wells, many of which were often opened and blown out, it was his duty to provide himself with safe and sufficient lines with which to control his team. This position is untenable, for the reason that the weak condition of the line cannot be regarded as having been the proximate cause of the injury. "Where the alleged intervening cause is in reality only a condition upon or through which the negligent act operated to produce the injuries complained of, the defendant will be held liable." 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 494. The excitement of the horses caused by the blowing off of the gas well must be regarded as the cause of the injury, not the weak condition of the line through which that cause operated, even if it be conceded that the fall was the result of the breaking of the line, and not of the jolting or toppling of the wagon, resulting from the running of the horses. The jury had the right to infer that, but for the negligent act of the defendant, the line, although weak, would not have broken. This principle is illustrated in 1 Thomp. Neg. § 91, as follows: "A. is passing along the street in his chaise, when the dog of B. leaps at the horse. The horse takes fright, and becomes unmanageable. In endeavoring to restrain him, a rein is broken. In consequence of this, the chaise is dashed against a post and broken. The attack of the dog, and not the breaking of the rein, is the proximate cause of the injury. * * * A street car is running at an unlawful rate of speed, in consequence of which it strikes a dray, breaks its shaft, and causes the horse to run away. The driver, while endeavoring to secure the horse, is struck by the broken shaft and hurt. The unlawful act of the street railway company is the proximate cause of his injury. A horse is allowed to run at large on a public street, in violation of a municipal ordinance. A man is driving a mare along the street, and her colt is running along by her side. The horse chases the colt. This frightens the mare so that she runs away, and both the mare and colt are injured. The owner of the mare and colt has a right of action against the owner of the horse for the damage thus produced." The proximate cause is not always that which is nearest in time or place to the injury. The meaning of the maxim, "Causa proxima, non remota, spectatur," is that the true cause of an injury is that which brings it about either by direct operation or by setting in motion other causes as instruments or agents operating under its dominant influence. The proximate cause is the superior or controlling agency, as contradistinguished from those causes which are merely incidental or subsidiary to such controlling or principal cause. Phillips on Insurance, § 1093, says: "If two causes conspire, and one must be chosen, the more scientific inquiry seems to be whether one is not the efficient cause and the other merely instrumental or merely incidental, and not which is nearer in place or time to the consummation of the catastrophe." At section 1132 the same work says: "In case of the concurrence of different causes, to one of which it is necessary to attribute the loss, it is to be attributed to the efficient predominating peril, whether it is or is not in activity at the consummation of the disaster." In Brady v. Insurance Co., 11 Mich. 425, Martin, C. J., said: "That which is the actual cause of the loss, whether operating directly or by putting intervening agencies, the operation of which could not be reasonably avoided, in motion, by which the loss is produced, is the cause to which such loss should be attributed." These principles are approved in Insurance Co. v. Boon, 95 U. S. 117, 24 L. Ed. 395. In Insurance Co. v. Tweed, 7 Wall. 44, 19 L. Ed. 65, the same principle is applied in a case in which the property insured was destroyed by fire which originated from an explosion in a building other than that in which the insured property was. By the policy, loss by fire which might happen by means of an explosion was excepted, and the court held that the insurers were not liable. In the opinion Mr. Justice Miller said: "The explosion undoubtedly produced or set in operation the fire which burned the plaintiff's cotton. The fact that it was carried to the cotton by first burning another building supplies no new force or power which caused the burning." Though these principles are announced in insurance cases, it has already been shown that the courts apply them to negligence cases in seeking the cause of an injury. Whatever the form of action or relation of the parties, may be, those principles remain the same. An additional illustration is a negligence case found in Railway Co. v. Maddy, 57 Ark. 306, 21 S. W. 472, where a person almost blind, having taken a seat in a passenger car which had been put in place to receive passengers, was killed on the platform by another car approaching from the rear, in attempting to escape, while other passengers succeeded in avoiding injury by getting off. The court held that the fact that the intestate was almost blind did not make him chargeable with contributory negligence in attempting to travel without an attendant, even if sight would have enabled him to escape injury. The reason given was that "his blindness was not the juridical cause of his injury, but only a condition that made it possible."

Under the impression that such an objection could be raised by motion to set aside the verdict or to arrest the judgment, it is insisted in the brief that there is no proof that the well is located, or that the injury occurred, in Wetzel county; and, further, that it is not shown in what district or particular locality the cause of action arose. The exact place is not material in any aspect of the case. 1 Chitty, Pl. 394. It need not be either alleged or proved. The county in which it occurred is material, and it is necessary to allege it. In other words, the venue must be laid in the declaration. But it does not follow that the judgment cannot stand because there was no proof that the cause of action arose in the county named in the declaration. In an action of this kind the county is important only as bearing upon the question of jurisdiction, and an objection to the jurisdiction, where the declaration shows jurisdiction on its face, cannot be raised by mere motion. "Where the declaration or bill shows on its face proper matter for the jurisdiction of the court, no exception for the want of such jurisdiction shall be allowed, unless it be taken by plea in abatement." Code 1899, c. 125, § 16. The defendant cannot allow the action to proceed through trial and verdict to judgment, and then complain that the cause of action did not arise in the county in which the venue is laid. If he proposes to contest the jurisdiction of the court on that ground, he must give notice of it by plea in abatement. In Osborne v. Taylor's Adm'r, 12 Grat. 120, the jurisdiction depended upon a question of fact to be decided by the court, namely, whether certain slaves, necessary parties to the bill, had been emancipated. No plea to the jurisdiction had been filed, and the court held that the statute applied and prevented the making of the objection to the jurisdiction for the first time in the appellate court. In Telegraph Co. v. Hobson & Co., 15 Grat. 122, it appeared on the trial that some of the defendants resided out of the state, and it was held, under the statute, that, even if this were good ground for objection to the jurisdiction of the court, it was no excuse for arresting the judgment, as, to be available, it must have been set up by plea in abatement. In Beckley v. Palmer, 11 Grat. 625, and Hudson v. Kline, 9 Grat. 385, where objections to the jurisdiction in equity were sustained at the hearing, the reasoning of the court indicates that they were sustained simply because the bills on their faces showed want of jurisdiction. Had it been otherwise, the statute would have applied. For further illustration of the application of the statute in analogous cases, see Bank v. Gettinger, 3 W. Va. 309; Middleton's Ex'r v. White, 5 W. Va. 572; Quarrier v. Insurance Co., 10 W. Va. 507. But, if this were not true, there is enough evidence to warrant the finding, as will be seen by reference to the testimony quoted concerning ownership of the well.

Upon the whole case, the conclusion is that there was no error, and the judgment should be affirmed.

BRANNON, J. (dissenting). What duty to the plaintiff did defendant break? None. Therefore there can be no recovery by law. The defendant did only a lawful act in its business. The accident falls within the pale of inevitable misfortune. It is a case of damnum absque injuria. No negligence or wrong is shown; no violation of duty. Taking the case as shown by the plaintiff's evidence, there is no law to support the verdict. It is against law. Veith v. Salt Co., 51 W. Va. 96, 41 S. E. 187, 57 L. R. A. 410.

On Rehearing.

POFFENBARGER, J. In disposing of the assignments of error it was deemed unnecessary to review the evidence, which is conflicting. In the petition for rehearing, lack of evidence of negligence is urged, great stress being laid upon the fact that Little, the agent of the company, says he looked for teams and persons passing upon the road before he opened the well, but saw none. But this testimony does not conclude the question whether there was an exercise of due care. The plaintiff testifies that he saw a man in the derrick, and that he was on high ground, and only about 100 feet distant from the well when it was opened. W. C. Edwards, a disinterested party, says Snyder stopped his team on top of a rise in the road a short distance from the well, and that Little could have seen him if he had looked. Being further questioned on this point, he reasserted his positive belief that a man standing in the derrick could have seen Snyder's team at the point at which the team was stopped to allow the witness (Edwards) to pass. W. O. Gallaher, who was with Edwards, testified as a witness for the defendant that Snyder's team stopped at a point 15 or 20 feet from the top of the rise in the road, and that a man on top of the load could see the derrick from that point, and that a man in the derrick could, in his opinion, have seen the team, if he had looked carefully. It further appears from the evidence that on the ground between the well and the point at which the team was there was some growth of weeds or brush, or of both, by reason of which the view may have been slightly obstructed. In this state of the evidence, the questions whether the agent could have seen the team, and whether he performed the duty of looking for passing teams before opening the well, were clearly proper for the jury, and such as the court cannot pass upon without improperly interfering with the functions of the jury in the trial of the case.

BURROUGH v. ELY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 14, 1903.)

LIEN—WORK AND LABOR—PERSONAL PROPERTY—ENFORCEMENT—RIGHT OF POSSESSION.

1. A common-law lien on personal property for work and labor performed is the mere right of detention of such property until satisfaction of debt, and is not the subject of equitable jurisdiction or protection, in the absence of statutory provision or other grounds of equitable interference.

2. Such lien only secures to the lienor the right of possession, and it is not otherwise enforceable. A sale made by him of the property would be wrongful.

3. For the deprivation of such possession the lienor may maintain detinue or trover, or, under execution or attachment properly obtained, he may have sale of the property.

Bill by C. E. Burrough against Ralph H. Ely and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edward A. Brannon and O. C. Higginbotham, for appellant. W. W. Brannon and W. B. McGary, for appellees.

DENT, J. C. E. Burrough appeals from the decision of the circuit court of Lewis county rendered on the 27th day of March, 1902, dismissing a bill in chancery filed by him against Ralph H. Ely and others for the purpose of enforcing a common-law lien claimed by the plaintiff on a certain lot of lumber manufactured by him for the defendant Ely.

The first question that presents itself is as to whether such bill is maintainable. If not, the plaintiff's remedies to determine and sustain his lien must be found in a court of law. The nature of the lien is only the right of possession of certain personal property on which work and labor has been performed. Hence there is no right of sale by reason thereof, either at law or in equity. The right of possession is all that such lien secures, which may be maintained by proper suit at law until the right of sale has been acquired either under execution or attachment. If the lienor is wrongfully deprived of his possession, he can maintain detinue for the goods, or trover and conversion for their value, to the amount of his claim. 2 Tucker's Com. (8d Ed.) 83; 13 Enc. Plead. & Prac. 126. In the absence of statutory provision to that effect, such lien does not authorize a suit in equity to sell the property for the payment of the debt. Retention of possession is the full force of such lien, and nothing more. To this extent alone it is enforceable, and this by suit at law. 19 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 84; 13 Enc. Plead. & Prac. 123, 126.

The decree is affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Preston County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by Chas. C. Craig against Elizabeth C. Craig and Charles M. Bishop. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

V. B. Archer, J. A. Brown, and W. Beard, for appellant. R. W. Monroe, for appellees.

McWHORTER, P. Charles C. Craig on the first Monday in November, 1900, filed his bill in equity in the circuit court of Preston county against his wife, Elizabeth C. Craig, and Charles M. Bishop, wherein he alleged: That about 40 years before the filing of his bill he, in connection with his brother John Craig, purchased a farm from Thomas Brown. That he afterwards bought his brother's interest in said farm, and undertook to pay Brown for the farm. That he worked very hard to pay for it, but Brown finally died; plaintiff having kept the interest paid, which was about all he could do, and clear the farm as fast as he could. He then undertook to pay the children of said Brown for said farm, which he had about accomplished when he became involved in a very expensive litigation about a worthless threshing machine, which he refused to pay for, as unjust and wrong, but was defeated in the suit, and was subjected to very heavy costs, and the judgment against him was very large for a man of his means, and his family was large and expensive. The farm was sold to pay the judgment, and he bought it again, and again undertook to pay for it, and engaged in the lumber business in the hope of making the balance of the money still owing on the farm, when he was overtaken by the hard times of 1895, 1896, and 1897, and became worse embarrassed, and in an evil hour he made an assignment to Nell J. Fortney, trustee, for the benefit of his creditors; having previously given the defendant Charles M. Bishop a trust deed on the farm to secure the amount he owed him. That, as the panic proceeded, things began to grow dark around him and the trustee, and they were eventually forced to surrender and sell and sacrifice plaintiff's property at nominal prices, which was almost wholly lost to plaintiff, except the farm, which, by agreement by the plaintiff and defendant Bishop, was cried off in the name of Bishop, and by agreement between the defendants, Bishop and Elizabeth C. Craig, and plaintiff, the farm was placed in the name of Elizabeth C. Craig, and the notes executed by her to Bishop with the distinct understanding between Elizabeth and the plaintiff that the notes were to be paid by plaintiff. But his wife and plaintiff's children then at home, it was expected, would work with plaintiff, and help him pay for the farm; and he again, for the fourth time in his life, undertook to pay for the farm. And alleged that defendant Elizabeth never owned a cent in the said farm; neither had she ever paid said Bishop anything on it. On the contrary, plaintiff had bought the farm more than once, and spent his life trying to pay for it. That he had always owned the farm since he purchased of his brother. And alleged that he purchased the said farm of Bishop, and had the same placed in the name of his wife by agreement that he made with her and Bishop; that his wife never owned a dollar's worth of property in her life, except in her marital rights, and a cow and a bed, up to the time plaintiff purchased the farm from Bishop, and that she had no means, or facility for acquiring any means, to pay on the farm since plaintiff purchased from Bishop, and that she had never paid anything on the notes signed by her for the purchase of the farm; that plaintiff thought when he purchased from Bishop he certainly would be able to pay for the farm, and still thought so, if his family would be loyal to him, as he expected them to be, but, to his great disappointment, they had deserted him, and were antagonizing him, in not allowing him to manage his business, and would not allow him to operate the farm and use the proceeds to pay for it, which was done by the approval and direction of his wife, the defendant, she and her eldest son having forcibly taken possession of the farm and about everything on it belonging to plaintiff, and much of the property so carried away they had destroyed, to the great prejudice and injury of plaintiff, and in violation of the agreement between Bishop and said Elizabeth C. Craig and plaintiff; that, in pursuance of his purchase for which Elizabeth C. Craig signed the notes by his direction, plaintiff began using and operating the farm, and so continued to do until the spring of 1900, during which time he faithfully applied all the proceeds thereof paying for the farm; that he paid said proceeds of the farm to Bishop on account of his purchase, and that he paid Bishop various other amounts; that plaintiff had made valuable improvements on said farm, and that, by virtue of the positive agreement by the said Bishop and said Elizabeth C. Craig and plaintiff, the said Elizabeth had only been holding the farm in trust for plaintiff since she signed the notes. And praying that the said Elizabeth C. Craig be compelled to convey back the farm to plaintiff whenever requested thereto by plaintiff, which she refused to do, and asked that the deed made by Bishop to the defendant Elizabeth C. Craig be set aside and annulled, and, representing that Bishop had obtained a decree for part of the purchase money coming to him, which plaintiff had been unable to pay on account of his family acting as it had, prayed that the suit in favor of Bishop be heard in connection with this suit, and that, if Bishop should demand that said farm be sold before plaintiff could adjust the amount going to said Bishop, then a restraining order be entered to prevent the paying over to Elizabeth C. Craig or any one else the surplus arising from the sale of the farm after satisfying Bishop's claim, until the court should ascertain and decide to whom the surplus belongs, and that the said surplus be paid to plaintiff, and for general relief.

The defendant Elizabeth C. Craig filed her answer, admitting the general assignment made by plaintiff of all his property for the benefit of his creditors, and the deed of trust given on the farm to secure defendant Bishop, and the sale of the property under the assignment, and the sale of the farm under said deed of trust to Bishop, but denied that the farm was purchased by the plaintiff, but alleged, on the contrary, that C. M. Bishop was the purchaser, and that plaintiff had nothing whatever to do with the purchase under the trust; that, a few days after said Bishop purchased, he sold the farm to respondent, but not until after he had positively and repeatedly declined to sell it to plaintiff. Averring that the sale was made directly to respondent, without any agreement, understanding, or intention that it was ever to be turned over to or conveyed to plaintiff if she could succeed in paying for it; that it was true respondent had not the means at the time to pay for the farm, but she had the promise of her three sons and a daughter that they would assist her in paying for it, that the home might be saved to her in her old age, as well as for plaintiff, who was also expected to assist respondent, as was his duty to do in the maintenance and care of the family, but respondent and all of the family knew that it would be utter foolishness for plaintiff to pretend to buy the farm, as his creditors would have taken all his earnings and those of the children as fast as they might be applied as payments on said land under such an arrangement; that respondent was willing for plaintiff to oversee and manage the affairs about the farm, as was his duty to do when well and able to work, and it was only when she found that he was not doing so properly that she decided to take the management out of his hands; that respondent had recently met with a fortunate sale of the coal underlying her said land, by which she had been able to discharge the entire purchase money lien resting on it, and had by said sale a fee-simple title to the surface and what was known as the three-foot vein of coal, and a surplus in money of about $700, and was situated so as to have a comfortable home and living for herself and plaintiff and such of her children as might choose to remain with them, if plaintiff would do right, and be content to share the home with them in peace, and abandon his baseless litigation, or unnecessary and unjust annoyance to her and her children.

The defendant C. M. Bishop filed his demurrer and answer, averring that he purchased the tract of land from Neil J. Fortney, trustee, as alleged in the bill, but said that, if there was any sacrifice in the transaction, he had no part in it, as respondent was advised that plaintiff had voluntarily made an assignment to Neil J. Fortney of all his property, including this tract upon which respondent already had a deed of trust, to secure his debt, and at the sale respondent was compelled to purchase said tract of land in order to protect himself as to his lien; that he openly bid upon the said sale in competition with all other bidders, and placed the highest bid thereon, and, after it was knocked off to him at the price of $1,545, received his deed therefor from said trustee. Respondent positively denied that he had any understanding or agreement with said C. C. Craig and Elizabeth C. Craig together, or either of them separately, at any time prior to the said purchase, at the time thereof, or at any other time, that he would or did purchase or had purchased the farm for said C. C. Craig or Elizabeth C. Craig, but that he made the purchase from said trustee in good faith for himself, and took his deed therefor, and some time afterwards sold the farm to said Elizabeth C. Craig at a price sufficient to cover his debt, interest, and cost; that he would not have sold to said C. C. Craig for the reason and on account of his failure and inability to pay off the debt existing at the time of the trustee's sale, and, as averred, that a sale to said Craig would simply put him in the position before occupied, and he would be taking the risk of a further accumulation of interest, and probably cost of a suit to enforce his vendor's lien, running the amount beyond the value of the land, but, upon representation of said C. C. Craig and Elizabeth C. Craig that he and some of his sons would assist the said Elizabeth C. Craig in making the payments, he was induced to, and did, sell it to her; but emphatically denied that there was any understanding or agreement on his part with said C. C. Craig and E. C. Craig, or anyone else, at any time, that said sale was made or intended as a sale to said C. C. Craig, or for him, in any way.

Some 280 pages of depositions were taken and filed in the cause, including the depositions of the plaintiff himself, Elizabeth C. Craig, Neil J. Fortney, and Charles M. Bishop, and others, in which depositions there is much conflict.

The cause was heard on the 18th of December, 1901, when the following decree was entered: "This cause came on this day to be finally heard upon the process duly served on both of the defendants, bill of the plaintiff, decree nisi, bill taken for confessed, separate answers for both of the defendants, and general replications to each of said answers, depositions for plaintiff and defendant Elizabeth C. Craig taken and filed herein, cause regularly set for hearing, and was argued by counsel. On consideration whereof, the court is of the opinion that, upon the pleadings and proofs in this cause, the case is for the defendants. It is therefore adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the plaintiff's bill herein be, and the same is hereby, dismissed; and it is further adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the plaintiff pay to the defendants their costs about their defense in this behalf expended. And it being made known to the court that a certain portion of the purchase money coming from W. P. Hurst to defendant Elizabeth C. Craig on her coal sale to said Hurst, to wit, $645.32, was put into the hands of Neil J. Fortney pending the determination of this suit, that the said Fortney is hereby directed to pay the said sum to said Elizabeth C. Craig or her attorney, whose receipt shall protect said Fortney in the payment thereof." From which decree the plaintiff appealed.

This is a suit to establish a trust upon an alleged oral agreement. At the sale by the trustee, Charles M. Bishop had purchased the farm, and had taken a deed therefor from the trustee. It is contended by appellant that it is admitted in the answer of the defendant Elizabeth C. Craig that the farm was purchased from Bishop by the plaintiff, and he quotes a part of a paragraph from the answer claiming that it contained such admission. On the contrary, the answer shows that the defendant denied emphatically that the plaintiff was the purchaser. This emphatic denial is followed by the paragraph which is only partially quoted by counsel for plaintiff in their brief, which paragraph contains facts intended to show that it was impossible for plaintiff at the time to have purchased the property with any hope or show of ever being able to pay for it or keep it. In the paragraph from the answer from which the partial quotation is made, after stating that Bishop had sold the farm to respondent, "but not until after he had positively and repeatedly declined to sell it to the plaintiff," then follows what respondent says, to show the utter futility of plaintiffs making said purchase from said Bishop at the time it was purchased by respondent; but plaintiff's counsel does not give the whole residue of the paragraph, which is as follows: "Respondent, not desiring to go into the long history of plaintiff's various purchases of said farm, and his failures to pay for it, as set out in his said bill, admits the truth of said statement, in the main, and says that, of all the purchases so alleged to have been made, in the case of no one of them was the plaintiff in as poor a situation, or had as poor a prospect of paying for said farm, as at the time of his last alleged purchase, when, in addition to his advanced age and greatly impaired physical condition, he was hopelessly insolvent. He had given up everything he possessed in the way of personal property, except the pittance allowed him under the exemption law, the proceeds of which paid only a trifling per cent. of his indebtedness, leaving the rest hanging over him, without any ability to pay it." It is hard to conceive, indeed, how this can be construed into an admission by the respondent of plaintiff's allegation that he made the purchase. Bishop had purchased the farm at a public sale, had the deed thereto from the trustee, and plaintiff had no interest in the farm, and no more right to purchase the same than the defendant or any other person. Bishop had very good reasons for not desiring to sell the farm to the plaintiff, who had failed for 40 years to pay for the same, and was even at that time embarrassed with indebtedness far beyond the value of the farm, as shown by the allegations of his bill, as well as by the answer of Elizabeth C. Craig. It is claimed by counsel for plaintiff that the plaintiff, Craig, paid down to Bishop at the time of purchase the sum of $204 on said purchase, the price being $2,050, agreed upon between them, which $204 was paid in the following manner: Craig was indebted to Bishop in the sum of $204, which was included in the price of the land, $2,050, for which amount the defendant Elizabeth C. Craig gave her notes to Bishop. The said $204 being included in the notes, and being owed to Bishop by Craig, plaintiff's counsel claims that the same was a payment of $204 on the land. Upon this theory, if plaintiff had owed Bishop at the time an additional $1,846, his indebtedness to Bishop would have just amounted to enough to pay for the farm, and would have entitled him to a deed from Bishop therefor. Plaintiff claims to have made some little payments to Bishop, derived from auctioneers' fees and from hauling; but no payments of any moment were made until the sale of the coal, when the whole purchase money was paid off, leaving a surplus. Counsel for plaintiff, in their brief, say, "There is practically no conflict of evidence upon the main question and claim of the plaintiff;" that the land was purchased by him, and paid for by him, as far as payments were made outside of the sale of the coal; and that the title passed to the defendant Elizabeth C. Craig at plaintiff's request. There is as direct conflict of evidence on the main question as there could well be. The testimony of C. M. Bishop and E. C. Craig is as positive and direct that the sale was made by Bishop to the defendant Elizabeth C. Craig as it is found in their answers. Also the evidence of the trustee, Fortney. When Fortney was asked whether he recollected of anything being said, when they were preparing the papers, between Bishop and Mrs. Craig, "about preparing a contract of some kind by which the land could be sold to Charley [meaning plaintiff], or of his asking you if you could prepare such a paper," he answered: "No, sir; I have no recollection of his asking it. On the contrary, as stated, the idea of Mr. Craig's participation in the deed was tabooed at the very outset."

In Phelps v. Seely, 22 Grat. 573, it is held: "A resulting trust may be set up by parol testimony against the letter of a deed, and a deed absolute on its face may, by like testimony, be proved to be only a mortgage. But the testimony, to produce these results, must in each case be clear and unquestionable." And in Troll v. Carter, 15 W. Va. 567 (Syl., point 7): "Whenever the courts permit parol evidence to be received to establish a trust, they always require such evidence to be clear and unquestionable, to produce such results." To establish this alleged oral agreement between himself and Bishop and the defendant Elizabeth C. Craig, the laboring oar is with the plaintiff, and he must establish it by clear and unquestionable evidence. The attempt to establish it is principally by conversations had with the defendants, Elizabeth C. Craig and C. M. Bishop, and of parts of such conversations overheard. Upon the evidence submitted in the cause, the circuit court has found for the defendants, and we can by no means say that his finding is so manifestly wrong as to warrant a reversal of the decree. Indeed, a strong preponderance of the evidence submitted in the case supports the decree; and, even if it were otherwise, from the nature of the case, the appellate court would have to sustain the decree, unless the evidence was so clearly against it as to make the finding of the court manifestly wrong. Even when the evidence is conflicting, but of such a character as to make it doubtful which way it preponderated, in a cause where the mere preponderance of the weight of the evidence controlled, this court will sustain the decree. Smith v. Yoke, 27 W. Va. 639; Doonan v. Glynn, 28 W. Va. 715; Prichard v. Evans, 31 W. Va. 137, 5 S. E. 461; Frederick v. Frederick, 31 W. Va. 566, 8 S. E. 295; Richardson v. Ralphsnyder, 40 W. Va. 15, 20 S. E. 854.

Appellant contended that the court decided the case and dismissed plaintiff's bill on the idea that the maxim, "Where both parties are equally guilty the defendant shall prevail," was applicable, but that it could not be so applicable, from the fact that no pleading in the case made it relevant. The allegations of the bill make it clear that, at the time of the purchase of the farm, plaintiff was deeply involved in debt; that his property had been sold and sacrificed at nominal prices, and was almost wholly lost to him. And according to the theory of his bill, he was purchasing the farm for his own use, and had the same conveyed to his wife to protect the title against his creditors. His wife, being cognizant of his insolvency and indebtedness, accepting the deed for the purpose of holding the farm in trust for the plaintiff against the rights of his creditors, and the plaintiff paying for the farm, would bring them both clearly within the maxim quoted; and the plaintiff would be guilty of a fraud in concealing his assets from his creditors, and the defendant, his wife, would be a party thereto. The court seems to have decided the cause upon its merits, and without noticing the demurrer of defendant, which is, in effect, overruled by decreeing upon the merits. Miller v. Miller, 92 Va. 196, 23 S. E. 232 (Syl., point 2). In Horn v. Star Foundry, 23 W. Va. 522, at page 543, in rendering the opinion of the court, Judge Greene says: "I need not take time to look up or cite authorities to show that this contract was fraudulent and contrary to public policy, for it seems to me to be so obviously of this character that it is only necessary for any lawyer to read the bill at once to pronounce it unquestionably of this character;" and says the circuit court ought to have sustained the general demurrer to the bill, and dismissed the same, at plaintiff's costs. This is what should have been done in the case at bar, upon the principle of the maxim, "Nemo allegans suam turpitudinem est audiendus." In Evans v. Folsom, 5 Minn. 422 (Gil. 342), it is held: "If the case made by a party seeking the aid of a court of equity is tainted with fraud on his part, it will not aid him." 7 Wait's Actions & Defenses, p. 55. It appears from exhibits filed with depositions taken in the case that plaintiff was discharged in bankruptcy from his debts, and his creditors have no interest in the issue of this case.

The said decree is right, and must be affirmed.

BROWN et al. v. NUTTER et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 7, 1903.)

BILL OF REVIEW—EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN.

1. Newly discovered oral evidence, contradictory or cumulative in its nature, to be sufficient to sustain a bill of review, must, like written evidence, be so indisputable as to be decisive of the case.

2. Newly discovered evidence which is of such doubtful character as only to open up the case for further litigation will not sustain a bill of review.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Harrison County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Bill by Beeson H. Brown and others against Cordella Nutter and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

John Bassel, W. Scott, and Davis & Davis, for appellants. Edward G. Smith, M. F. Snider, and Edward A. Brannon, for appellees.

DENT, J. "This is an appeal by Beeson H. Brown, Henry R. Smith, Gertrude Duncan, and George L. Duncan from a decree of the circuit court of Harrison county, entered February 2, 1903, sustaining a demurrer to the bill of review filed by leave of the circuit court, to review upon the ground of newly discovered evidence the decree of the appellate court entered on March 29, 1902, revising a decree of said circuit court in the cause of Cordella Nutter against Beeson H. Brown and others, entered on June 8, 1901, by which decree of the appellate court the words 'natural gas and oil' were directed to be expunged and struck out of the deed made to said Beeson H. Brown by Cordella Nutter and her former husband, William L. Strother." Nutter v. Brown, 51 W. Va. 598, 42 S. E. 661. The newly discovered evidence relied on is to the effect that Matilda Flanagan and her two daughters, Sallie Johnson and Jennie Kerns, will testify that in the year 1891 Cordella Nutter stated to them, or in their presence, that she received $1 more per acre than Matilda Flanagan and her husband received for their coal, because gas and oil was included in her conveyance. This testimony was first brought to the attention of appellants by virtue of the following note, written by one of the proposed witnesses, as she says, in the interest of justice, to wit:

"B H brown Dear Sir if you want any Evidence at coart in that law Suit you are Having with G a Garritt and Dr arnett just call on me i will get you the best Evidents for you that you Ever Had yet

"Mrs Sallie JohnSon."

The law governing this case has been fully settled by a former decision of this court. In the case of the Davis Sewing Machine Co. v. Dunbar, 32 W. Va. 335, 9 S. E. 237, in part second of the syllabus, the rule is stated thus: "A bill of review for newly discovered evidence will not lie where the evidence is simply confirmatory or accumulative. It must be decisive in its character; such as ought, if true, upon rehearing to produce a different decree, and of which the party was ignorant at the time of the decree, and could not have learned by the exercise of reasonable diligence." Nichols v. Nichols' Heirs, 8 W. Va. 174; Wethered v. Elliott, 45 W. Va. 436, 32 S. E. 209; Douglass v. Stephenson's Ex'r, 75 Va. 756. To sustain a bill of review for newly discovered evidence, the duty devolves upon the plaintiff, first, to produce evidence clearly decisive of the case; second, to show that such evidence could not have been discovered by due diligence. It matters not whether the newly discovered evidence be oral or written; if it is decisive of the case, it will be admitted for the purpose of reversing a decree; the difference between oral and written evidence being that written evidence, when the making of the writing is admitted, is indisputable. A demurrer to a bill admits the indisputable character of such evidence. On the other hand, a demurrer to a bill of review founded on oral testimony alone does not always admit that such oral testimony is true, but only that the witnesses will testify according to the allegations of the bill. Oral testimony therefore is nearly always open to dispute. To overthrow a decree of this character, the evidence must be indisputable. It must be so strong that on a review it will be decisive of the case, and not merely open it up for further litigation. If the appellants had produced a writing signed by Mrs. Nutter, wherein she admitted that she had received $1 per acre more for her oil and gas, this would be decisive of the case, and would have justified a review thereof. The fact that Mrs. Flanagan and her daughters will testify that Mrs. Nutter admitted in their presence that she received $1 per acre for her oil and gas is not at all decisive of the case, for the reason that their evidence is open to dispute, being a matter of memory alone; by their own cross-examination; by other facts and circumstances and by other witnesses. Hence to allow a review on their evidence is simply to throw the case wide open for further litigation, and would be nothing more than the granting of a new trial without sufficient justification thereof. To set aside the solemn decrees of this court on evidence so frail would be to throw wide open the door of equity to fraud and perjury, for defeated litigants would never allow a case to remain settled as long as witnesses could be discovered willing to testify as to admissions made by the successful party. Equity regards all such attempts with a critical and suspicious eye to preserve the fountain of justice from being too easily polluted, and rightly requires that oral evidence to overthrow a decree must be as indisputable and convincing as written evidence. The enforcement of such rule may operate harshly sometimes, but it is far better, even though it does, to uphold, rather than to destroy, such a barrier to a sea of unknown troubles and endless litigation. However desirous we may be to defend the character of litigants for whom we may have a friendly regard, yet it is the part of justice to be blind to matters extraneous to the record, and to be governed by its revealings alone. The voluntary note written by one of the proposed witnesses, as she claims in the interest of justice, is very peculiar indeed. The spelling and composition show her to be a very illiterate woman, and yet she claims the ability to get for Mr. Brown evidence, the best he ever had in his suit. Such illiteracy, knowledge of a suit, and the weight and necessity of evidence coupled with so highly a developed sense of justice at so opportune a time, is a combination seldom found in womankind, but is so rare as to excite suspicion of its sincerity. Voluntary evidence under such circumstances is always open to suspicion, and must be regarded as of little weight, instead of being decisive in its character, unless it be clearly indisputable. In the case of Reynolds v. Reynolds' Ex'r, 83 Va. 152, 13 S. E. 395, 598, the newly discovered evidence, though oral, was above suspicion, indisputable, and decisive of the controversy. In this case, the demurrer being regarded as an admission of what the newly discovered witnesses will testify, and not an admission of the truth of such evidence, the same must be regarded as disputable, indecisive of the controversy, and, in the light of facts, circumstances, and evidence disclosed by and contained in the old record, subject to suspicion and doubt as to the sincerity or soundness of the witnesses' memories. It is therefore wholly insufficient to justify a review of such decree.

Nor is it clear that, if the appellants had used the same diligence to discover the new evidence before the decree that they did afterwards, they would not have just as easily provided it then as now. For the first time the appellants claim, in effect, in their bill, that Beeson H. Brown paid Mrs. Nutter $1 per acre for oil and gas. This is stated to be a fact fully known to Brown, and the bill is sworn to by him. In the former suit he filed an answer under oath, in which he made no such claim. If such were the truth, and he had set the same up as a defense, and attempted to prove it on cross-examination of his agent and Mrs. Nutter, and testified in contradiction to their testimony that such was his understanding of his purchase, the result might have been entirely different. If such had been his position, and he had made any effort to obtain the evidence to sustain it, there can be no doubt that he could have easily, by the exercise of due diligence, obtained this newly discovered evidence. He made no such defense, and therefore made no effort to obtain the evidence to sustain it.

The absence of such defense is one of the prime reasons that led the court to its former conclusions, as is plainly evident from the following three separate quotations from the former opinion, to wit: "It is not shown in evidence that the defendant purchased or paid anything for the oil and gas. He was buying the coal, and, if he could get the oil and gas thrown in, he would take it. His sole reliance in this case is on the fact that they appear in the papers by the confessed mistakes of his agent. He does not claim that he bought and paid for them, but that because of their valueless character at that time the plaintiff was willing to let them go to secure the sale of her coal." "This undenied instruction from his principal shows that he was not bargaining for the oil and gas, but if by deceitful means or otherwise, without openly purchasing them, he could obtain them, he was willing to accept them, without regard to the means employed. He does not as a witness claim that he purchased them, or that he is out anything by reason thereof." "He gave nothing for the property, and is in statu quo without being put there." These quotations all show that the court reached its former conclusion from the fact that appellant, Brown, neither claimed nor pretended to prove that he actually purchased the oil and gas at $1 per acre, or that he was out anything by reason thereof. If he did purchase the oil and gas and paid $1 per acre, as he now pretends to assert, he should have set up the same in his answer, and sustained the same by his evidence. Having failed to do so when he had the opportunity, and having thereby misled the court into a wrongful decision, he is forever precluded from asserting the same, even though it were the truth. It has passed into the domain of things adjudicated, and there it must forever rest. Sayre's Adm'r v. Harpold, 33 W. Va. 553, 11 S. E. 16. This newly discovered evidence would have been admissible under the allegations contained in the pleadings of the former suit as tending to contradict the evidence of Mrs. Nutter and James M. Plant as to the agreement between them that the words "oil and gas" were to be stricken out of the deed, but would not have been decisive of the case, because not indisputable, as aforesaid.

A bill of review does not lie to adjudicate matters already adjudicated, except for error of law apparent on the face of the record, or for new and after-discovered evidence decisive of the case. It does not lie to let in evidence that might have had some weight, little or great, had it been introduced at the proper time, but only such as is of such force and weight as will forever end the case. Appellant Brown was negligent in not setting up and claiming that he had purchased the oil and gas at $1 per acre, and this fact, if true, cannot be used as a ground to sustain the bill of review. Yet it is a potent fact in showing that he did not use due diligence to obtain evidence to sustain it. A litigant seldom uses reasonable diligence to obtain evidence to sustain a fact on which he does not rely.

The main question, however, for determination is as to whether the fact that Mrs. Flanagan and her two daughters will testify that Mrs. Nutter said to them, or in their presence, that she received $1 per acre more for her coal because she included oil and gas, is decisive of the case, or, in other words, is sufficient to reverse the decree attacked. The answer to this question must be in the negative for many reasons. First, because the evidence is oral, and not indisputable, or decisive of the case; second, because the main fact which it seeks to establish was not relied on by the appellants either in their pleadings or evidence in the original litigation, but has all the marks of an afterthought that places such evidence under grave suspicion; third, because it is not of sufficient weight as contradictory evidence to overcome the positive statements of Mrs. Nutter and James M. Plant that there was an agreement between them that the oil and gas was not to be retained in the deed, but was to be stricken therefrom, sustained by the unexplained silence of the appellant Brown, for whom Plant was acting, and by other evidence and circumstances in and surrounding the case. Instead of this new evidence being decisive of the case, the suspicions against it are equally as strong as the suspicions it seeks to raise.

For these reasons we find the conclusions of the circuit court right, and affirm the decree.

BRANNON, J. (concurring). "Every distinct averment must be taken as true upon a mere application to file a bill of review." Davis v. Morris' Ex'rs, 76 Va. 21. In this case what do we take as true? Only the fact that the witnesses will state what the bill represents they will state, or that what they say is true? In other words, simply that they will state as the bill represents, or that their evidence is true, and proves that Cordelia Nutter made the admission specified? The case of Sewing Machine Co. v. Dunbar, 32 W. Va. 335, 9 S. E. 237, says that the new evidence must be such as, if true, ought to reverse the decree. If what is true? Why, the new evidence; the fact it goes to prove; that is, Cordelia Nutter's admission. The new evidence to sustain a bill of review must be "material, and such as, if unanswered, in point of fact would clearly entitle the party to a decree, or would raise a question of so much difficulty as to be the fit subject of a judgment in the cause." 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Prac. § 860. I conclude that on the demurrer we must take it that the new evidence is true, and that Cordelia Nutter made the admissions, not simply that the witnesses will so state. Then comes the question, what is the force of that admission on this bill of review? Is it only cumulative? In Grogan v. Railroad, 89 W. Va. 415, 19 S. E. 563, I endeavored to define cumulative evidence. On the former hearing the question was whether Cordelia Nutter sold to Brown oil and gas as well as the coal. Brown gave evidence that she did; she gave evidence that she did not. Is not this admission only more evidence that she did? Evidence of admissions is weak evidence, but at present we cannot consider this argument because that rule is based on the fact that evidence to prove admissions is weak, not that the admission is itself weak; that the witnesses may have misunderstood the admission. Upon the bill of review we are assuming that the admission was made. Then, treating it as made, what is its effect? If unanswered and established, does it call for reversal of the decree? I think not, because it is cumulative; more evidence to show that oil and gas were included in the sale. True, the evidence goes to prove a new independent fact not before in issue—that is, the admission; but that admission is only more evidence on the question whether oil and gas were in fact sold to Brown. I do not say that in all cases cumulative evidence is inadmissible; but I say that, if allowed, it must be so forceful as to leave no question of its effect to reverse the decree. The courts say it must be received with great slowness and caution, else there would be no end to a case, as more evidence bearing on the same issues can always be found. This admission does not, beyond question, call for a reversal of the decree. Bloss v. Hull, 27 W. Va. 503.

FUNKHOUSER v. SPAHR.

APPEAL AND ERROR—DIVIDED COURT—CONSTITUTION—STATUTES—INTERPRETATION.

1. The provision of section 88 of article 6 of the Constitution that, whenever the requisite majority of the judges of the Supreme Court of Appeals sitting are unable to agree upon a decision, the case shall be reheard by a full bench, applies only to cases involving the constitutionality of laws, and does not prohibit the decision of ordinary cases by a divided court.

2. It is an established canon of construction that effect shall be given to every word in the instrument to be construed, whether it be a will, a contract, a statute, or a constitution.

3. The only proper way to construe a legislative or constitutional enactment is from the language used in the act, and upon occasion by a resort to the history of the times when it was passed. Resort cannot be had to the views or debates of the framers of the enactment.

Action between one Funkhouser and one Spahr. From the judgment Funkhouser brings error. Affirmed by divided court without opinion. Petition to rehear denied.

Elder & Elder, for petitioner.

KEITH, P. Funkhouser, who was plaintiff in error in the case of Funkhouser v. Spahr, asks a rehearing of the judgment rendered against him at the September term of this court, in pursuance of section 3485 of the Code of 1887, which is as follows:

"The appellate court shall affirm the judgment, decree, or order, if there be no error therein, and reverse the same, in whole or in part, if erroneous, and enter such judgment, decree or order, as the court whose error is sought to be corrected ought to have entered, affirming in those cases where the voices on both sides are equal: provided however, that in order to declare, in any case, any law null and void by reason of its repugnance to the Constitution of the United States or the Constitution of this state, it shall be necessary that a majority of the judges elected to the Supreme Court of Appeals shall concur."

The contention of the petitioner is that the section above quoted is repugnant to the last sentence of section 88, art. 6, of the Constitution, which is as follows:

"Whenever the requisite majority of the judges sitting are unable to agree upon a decision, the case shall be reheard by a full bench, and any vacancy caused by any one or more of the judges being unable, unwilling, or disqualified to sit, shall be temporarily filled in a manner to be prescribed by law."

It will not do to segregate this sentence from its context. It is found in section 88 of article 6 of the Constitution, which deals with the organization and jurisdiction of this court. After stating with precision the subjects over which this jurisdiction shall extend, it proceeds to set forth the manner in which that jurisdiction shall in certain cases be exercised, and declares that: "The assent of at least three of the judges shall be required for the court to determine that any law is, or is not, repugnant to the Constitution of this state or of the United States; and if in a case involving the constitutionality of any such law, not more than two of the judges sitting agree in opinion on the constitutional question involved, and the case cannot be determined without passing on such question, no decision shall be rendered therein, but the case shall be reheard by a full court; and in no case where the jurisdiction of the court depends solely upon the fact that the constitutionality of a law is involved, shall the court decide the case upon its merits, unless the contention of the appellant upon the constitutional question be sustained. Whenever the requisite majority of the judges sitting are unable to agree upon a decision, the case shall be reheard by a full bench, and any vacancy caused by any one or more of the judges being unable, unwilling, or disqualified to sit, shall be temporarily filled in a manner to be prescribed by law."

The Constitution which preceded that now in force provided that "the assent of a majority of the judges elected to the court, shall be required in order to declare any law null and void, by reason of its repugnance to the federal Constitution, or to the Constitution of this state." The provision of the former Constitution upon this subject was deemed inadequate by the convention which framed the present Constitution, and it inserted in lieu of it the provision as it now stands, which declares that "the assent of at least three of the judges shall be required for the court to determine that any law is or is not repugnant to the Constitution of this state or of the United States." Where the constitutionality of a law is drawn in question, it is plain, therefore, that the assent of three judges is necessary to decide the case. A less number cannot hold that a law is constitutional or that it is unconstitutional. The assent of three judges is essential to the judgment, is a jurisdictional necessity, and less than that number is incapable of pronouncing any judgment in such a case. The convention was impressed with the delicacy and importance of the jurisdiction exercised by courts in passing upon the constitutionality of a law. It felt that the provision upon the subject in the former Constitution, which only went to the extent of holding that a law could not be declared null and void, as repugnant to the Constitution of the United States or of the state, unless three of the judges of the court concurred in that conclusion, did not fully meet the requirements of the situation, for under the law as it then stood an unconstitutional law might, in a particular case, be binding and operative upon the parties to the litigation because of an equal division among the judges composing the court. It considered that all cases in which the constitutionality of a law is involved are of first importance; that no statute which transcends the fundamental law should be enforced against any citizen; and therefore it required the concurrence of three judges for the disposition of the question, and prohibited any judgment for or against the validity of the law by an equally divided court. The evil which the convention sought to remedy was plain and obvious; the remedy which it applied is adequate and complete.

In the concluding sentence of the section under consideration, separated from what has been quoted, it is true, by a period, but wholly germane to and in pari materia with what has gone before, and with the manifest purpose of providing the means for carrying out the object so clearly expressed in the preceding portion of this section, the following language is used: "Whenever the requisite majority of the judges sitting are unable to agree upon a decision, the case shall be reheard by a full bench, and any vacancy caused by any one or more of the judges being unable, unwilling, or disqualified to sit, shall be temporarily filled in a manner to be prescribed by law." Now, if the purpose had been to prohibit the decision of any case by a divided court, we presume that the Constitution would have said so. The end could have been reached by simply declaring that in every case a majority of the judges sitting must agree upon a decision. If it had been intended that this sentence should reach a class of cases not embraced in that which precedes it, the convention might, with great propriety, have made it an independent paragraph; but, if that be not so, the language employed seems to be conclusive against the construction contended for by the petitioner. "Whenever the requisite majority of the judges sitting are unable to agree upon a decision, the case shall be reheard by a full bench." "Whenever" is an adverb of time. It is not the equivalent of "in any case." Its meaning, and the only meaning given to it by lexicographers, is "at whatever time." This sentence is not to be read as though the Constitution had said, "In any case in which the requisite majority of the judges sitting are unable to agree upon a decision, the case shall be reheard by a full bench," but "At whatever time it may happen that the requisite majority of the judges sitting are unable to agree upon a decision, the case shall be reheard by a full bench"; that is to say, the "case" and the "decision" in which the constitutionality of a law shall be called in question. What is meant by "the requisite majority"? Obviously, that "the assent of at least three of the judges shall be required to determine that any law is or is not repugnant to the Constitution of this state or of the United States."

If the sentence now being considered was meant to apply to cases in which a constitutional question does not arise, and to forbid the decision of such cases when the "voices on both sides are equal," in the language of section 3485, then it would have been enough to forbid the decision of any case unless a majority of the judges sitting should concur. The use of the word "requisite" would in such case be superfluous and unnecessary. The Constitution, however, uses the expression "requisite majority," and it is our duty in expounding it to give due effect to every word. We can reject no word as superfluous, unless it may be in an extreme case, in which not to do so would lead to a conclusion absurd in itself or necessarily repugnant to the plain meaning of the Constitution. "Requisite" means "essential, indispensable," and "requisite majority" must of necessity refer to the concurrence of three judges, for that satisfies, and alone satisfies, and gives force and effect to each word employed.

It is well to observe the precise language employed from another point of view. "If in a case involving the constitutionality of any such law, not more than two of the judges sitting agree in opinion on the constitutional question involved, and the case cannot be determined without passing on such question, no decision shall be rendered therein, but the case shall be reheard by a full court;" but no provision is made for the contingency of one of the judges being unable, unwilling, or disqualified to sit. In cases involving questions of the gravest importance it may well be that one of the judges, for some cause, cannot sit; and in that event, if the maining four are equally divided, what becomes of the case? It can only be decided by a "full court," and there is no provision for supplying the place of the absent judge, unless recourse be had to the concluding sentence of this section, or a special court of appeals be organized under the succeeding section. Here, then, is a reason—and a sufficient reason—for the addition to section 88 of the sentence under discussion. Again, if that sentence applies to all cases, then it follows either that the "requisite majority" of three judges is necessary in all cases, which would render by far the greater part of the careful provision with respect to cases involving constitutional questions meaningless and nugatory, or, if it be contended that a court of three may hear and a majority of two may decide a case not involving a constitutional question, then the adjective "requisite," which qualifies "majority," and limits its meaning, is not only superfluous, but misleading, while one of the established canons of construction, as we have seen, is that effect shall be given to every word in the instrument to be construed, whether it be a will, a contract, a statute, or a constitution.

Letters from eminent members of the constitutional convention are copied into the petition, from which it would appear that, in their opinion, the convention intended to accomplish the result contended for by the petitioner, and its purpose was to prohibit the decision of any case where the judges were equally divided.

In United States v. Union Pac. R. R. Co., 91 U. S. 72, 23 L. Ed. 224, construing an act of Congress, the court said: "We are not at liberty to recur to the views of individual members in debate, nor to consider the motives which influenced them to vote for or against its passage. The act itself speaks the will of Congress, and this is to be ascertained from the language used. But courts may with propriety, in construing a statute, recur to the history of the times when it was passed, and this is frequently necessary, in order to ascertain the reason as well as the meaning of particular provisions in it."

In United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Ass'n, 166 U. S. 318, 17 Sup. Ct. 550, 41 L. Ed. 1007, Justice Peckham uses the following language: "There is, too, a general acquiescence in the doctrine that debates in Congress are not appropriate sources of information from which to discover the meaning of the language of a statute passed by that body. The reason is that it is impossible to determine with certainty what construction was put upon an act by the members of a legislative body that passed it by resorting to the speeches of individual members thereof. Those who did not speak may not have agreed with those who did, and those who spoke might differ from each other; the result being that the only proper way to construe a legislative act is from the language used in the act, and, upon occasion, by a resort to the history of the times when it was passed"—citing a great number of authorities.

The English cases are to the same effect. In The Queen v. Hertford College, 3 Queen's Bench Div., at page 707, Lord Chief Justice Coleridge says: "We are not concerned with what Parliament intended, but simply with what it has said in the statute. The statute is clear, and the parliamentary history of a statute is wisely inadmissible to explain it, if it is not."

And this court, in Sherwood v. A. & D. R. R. Co., 94 Va., at page 301, 26 S. E. 946, uses the following language: "It is the duty of the court to ascertain the intention of the Legislature, and, when ascertained, to give it effect; and in the search for that intent it is its duty to consider the object of the statute and the purpose to be accomplished. It must reach the intent, however, by giving to the words used their ordinary and usual signification, and to every word and every part of the statute, if possible, its due effect and meaning. * * * The intent of the Legislature, therefore, is always to be sought for by giving a fair construction to the language used, attributing to the words their ordinary and popular meaning, unless it plainly appears that they were used in some other sense."

Our consideration of the case leads us to the conclusion that the convention did not intend to forbid the decision of a case by this court where the voices on both sides are equal, unless there is drawn in question the constitutionality of a law.

The petition to rehear is refused.

STEADMAN v. HANDY.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 28, 1904.)

DOWER — CONTRACTS — SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — PLEADING — ISSUE.

1. The fact that the outstanding inchoate right of dower cannot be extinguished constitutes no defense in a suit for specific performance by the vendee.

2. A court of equity can only decree on the case made by the pleadings, and a ground of complaint or defense not set up by the pleadings cannot be availed of.

3. A contract for the sale and purchase of land which is reasonable, certain, legal, mutual, based upon a valuable consideration, and entered into by competent parties, will be specifically enforced at the suit of the vendee, who has been at all times ready and desirous to perform.

¶ 2. See Specific Performance, vol. 44, Cent. Dig. § 196.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Patrick County. Bill by M. V. Steadman against B. A. Handy. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. J. Harvey and John W. Carter, for appellant. Hairston & Gravelly, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. The bill in this case was filed by the appellant, M. V. Steadman, seeking to enforce specific performance of the following contract, executed by the appellee, B. A. Handy:

"I have this day sold to M. V. Steadman my house and lot at Stuart, Va., for $1,500.00, which I inherited from my son, W. E. Handy, known as the Stonewall property, payable $500.00 cash, payable to Peoples Bank, Stuart, Va., $450.00 in two weeks and bal. $550.00 in thirty days; with general warranty of title. May 14, 1901."

There was a demurrer to the bill, in support of which two grounds are suggested in argument: (1) That the wife of the appellee should have been made a party defendant; that, if her husband should convey, she would be deprived of her right of dower in kind; and that her interest, though inchoate, and subject to be defeated, is vested. (2) That to grant specific performance of the contract, as prayed for, would leave the personal representative of the appellee liable to an action at law in the future should his wife survive and assert her dower rights.

The wife did not execute the contract, and was not a necessary party. The contract was executed by the appellee alone, and he had a right to sell his interest in the property without regard to whether or not his wife was willing to part with her contingent dower right. The bill expressly alleges that the appellant is willing to take such title as the appellee has bound himself to convey. The right of appellant to have specific performance of the contract is therefore not affected by an outstanding inchoate right of dower.

A sufficient answer to the second ground of demurrer is that the appellee has contracted to make a deed with general warranty of title, and the appellant only asks that the contract as written be enforced.

The answer filed by the appellee sets up the following defenses: (1) That, while appellee admits having signed a written agreement, he denies having signed the agreement exhibited with the bill. (2) That the $500 cash payment was to be deposited to the credit of appellee in the People's Bank, instead of being applied to incumbrances upon the property held by the bank. (3) That appellee had discovered that there was a vendor's lien upon the property for more than $300, and that he thought the property was bound for this lien, and that, if he could get appellant to pay him $1,500, he would also have to pay the vendor's lien, thus making the property cost appellant more than $1,800; but that, after signing the contract of sale, he discovered that appellant was himself primarily liable for the vendor's lien, and had fraudulently concealed that fact from him. (4) That appellant had falsely represented to him that the building on the property was in an unsafe condition. (5) That the contract was executed upon condition that the wife of appellee should ratify it.

Not one of these defenses is sustained by the evidence. The learned judge of the circuit court has filed, as part of the record, an opinion in writing, from which it appears that the defenses set up by the answer were discarded as unfounded, and the conclusion that appellant was not entitled to have specific performance of the alleged contract was rested upon the sole ground that appellant "was asking a court of equity to effectuate a transaction which he was seeking to carry through, in a measure, by keeping another buyer out of the field, and lulling him to silence and inaction by representing to him that he would purchase the property for him."

We are of opinion that the evidence relied on for this conclusion does not warrant the construction placed upon it. We will not, however, enter upon a discussion of this evidence for the reason that it presents an issue not made by the pleadings. There is no hint of such a defense in the answer, and therefore it cannot be made a ground for relief. The law is well settled that a court of equity can only decree on the case made by the pleadings. Mundy v. Vawter, 3 Grat. 518; Rorer Iron Co. v. Trout, 83 Va. 415, 2 S. E. 713, 5 Am. St. Rep. 285; Anderson v. Creston Land Co., 96 Va. 257, 31 S. E. 82.

The allegations of the bill are fully sustained by the evidence. The contract is distinctly proven. Its terms are clear. It is reasonable, certain, legal, mutual, based upon a valuable consideration, made and entered into by competent parties, and the party seeking its enforcement has been at all times ready and desirous to perform. Under these circumstances there should have been a decree specifically enforcing the contract in accordance with the prayer of the bill.

For these reasons the decree appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

RAILROAD—NEGLIGENCE—JOINDER OF AC-TIONS—PLEADING.

1. A count in a complaint alleging that defendant acquired a house adjoining plaintiff's tenement, and, contriving to disturb and injure plaintiff, pulled down and carried away the building on its lot in such a manner that the partition wall separating defendant's property from plaintiff's, with communicating doors, was left unprotected, exposed, etc., by reason of which plaintiff's tenement was greatly injured, was demurrable, since defendant, being the owner, was entitled to pull down its property, and, if its acts were negligently done, acts of negligence were not alleged.

2. Where a railroad company, under its charter, was authorized to maintain and operate a railroad adjoining plaintiff's property, plaintiff was not entitled to recover for annoyance consisting of noise, smoke, etc., caused by the operation of the railroad, unless such annoyance was the result of negligence in such operation.

3. Where plaintiff claimed damages for injuries to his tenement by reason of the negligence of a railroad company in tearing down an adjoining tenement belonging to it, to make room for its tracks, and for injuries by reason of smoke, noise, etc., resulting from the negligent operation of the railroad, such causes of action were of the same nature, and might properly be joined in the same declaration.

Error to Law and Equity Court of City of Richmond.

Action by Harris Fisher, as trustee, etc., against the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company. From a judgment sustaining demurrers to the declaration, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

A. W. Patterson and John H. Ingram, for plaintiff in error. Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. This action was instituted by Harris Fisher, trustee for his wife, Ester Fisher, in the law and equity court of the city of Richmond, to recover damages against the defendant company. There were six counts in the declaration, and the defendant company having demurred to each count, and to the declaration as a whole, a judgment was entered sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the case.

It is conceded by counsel for defendant in error that the court erred in its judgment with respect to the first and second counts. We shall therefore limit our consideration to the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts.

The third count is as follows:

"And for this also, to wit, that the said plaintiff being the owner in fee simple of a certain other store and dwelling house (fully described in the first count, above), the said defendant afterwards, to wit, on the 10th day of July, 1899, acquired the western tenement of said mansion house, and, well knowing the premises, and contriving to disturb and injure the said plaintiff in the peaceable and lawful enjoyment of his said land with its appurtenances, did thereafter, to wit, on the 1st day of September, 1899, pull down and carry away the building upon its lot in such manner that the partition wall, with communicating doors, between said two houses, was left unprotected, exposed, and in a most unsightly condition, by means whereof the plaintiff's said tenement has been greatly injured and depreciated in value."

The act complained of in this count is one which the defendant had a right to do. It was the owner of the building which it pulled down, and its liability, if any, results from its doing a lawful act in an unlawful or negligent manner. We are of opinion that the acts constituting negligence are not sufficiently stated in this count, and that the demurrer to it was properly sustained.

The same observations will hold good with respect to the fifth count. The defendant had the right to run its trains, but if it ran them so unskillfully, negligently, or carelessly as to injure the plaintiff, it would be responsible for such damages as might ensue. But the acts of negligence and carelessness should be stated with such reasonable certainty as to enable the defendant to make defense thereto.

The chief controversy in this case is with respect to the fourth and fifth counts, which are as follows:

"And for this also, to wit, that the said plaintiff being the owner of a certain other store and dwelling house (as described in first count, above) of great value, to wit, of the value of $10,000, the defendant, well knowing the premises, but contriving, etc., thereafter, to wit, on the 1st day of September, 1899, erected and built upon its said lot, in immediate proximity to the aforesaid store and dwelling of said plaintiff, to wit, within 8 feet thereof, a high trestle, to wit, of the height of 25 feet, which, approaching from the rear, curves around and runs along the entire length of the plaintiff's premises; and the said plaintiff further says that afterwards, to wit, on the 27th day of May, 1900, the said defendant began running cars, trucks, trains, and locomotives over and upon the said trestle, and that the running of same has steadily increased and continued from thence to the bringing of this suit; and he avers that the movement of these trains and locomotives on said trestle is an insufferable nuisance, owing to the many horrible noises, the jarring of the ground and shaking of the buildings, and the volumes of smoke and dust so created and emitted, whereby the walls of said building have been cracked and displaced, the air in and about the said plaintiff's premises so polluted as to sensibly impair the enjoyment thereof, and the ordinary comfort of human existence therein otherwise materially interfered with; in consequence of all which the said plaintiff says that said dwelling house has been entirely vacated, and the tenant of his store has given notice of a like intention to move at the expiration of his lease; that said property has thus been greatly injured, and is now of little or no value whatever to the plaintiff.

"And for this also, to wit, that the said plaintiff being so seised and possessed of another store and dwelling house [fully described in the first count of this declaration], of great value, to wit, $10,000, the defendant, well knowing the premises, but contriving to injure and disturb the said plaintiff in the peaceable and lawful enjoyment of his said property, heretofore, to wit, on the 1st day of September, 1899, and on divers other days between that date and the bringing of this suit, so unskillfully, carelessly, and negligently ran its trains and locomotives along and upon the trestle of defendant adjacent to said plaintiff's premises aforesaid that the latter were and are greatly injured thereby, and in consequence thereof the said property has become and is of little or no value to said plaintiff."

It will be seen that the defendant is not charged with having taken any part of the plaintiff's property. It appears that the defendant in error, a duly chartered and incorporated railway company, built upon its own property, within 8 feet of the dwelling of the plaintiff, a trestle 25 feet in height, which, approaching from the rear, curves around and runs along the entire length of plaintiff's premises; that upon and over this trestle the cars of the defendant, drawn by locomotives, were from and after the 27th day of May, 1900, to the bringing of this suit, continuously and with increasing frequency operated; and that the movement of these trains and locomotives constituted an insufferable nuisance, owing to the noise which they occasioned, the volumes of smoke and dust created and emitted, polluting the atmosphere, and the jarring of the ground and shaking of the buildings, impairing the enjoyment thereof, and as a consequence the tenant had given notice of his intention to move at the expiration of his lease, and the property has been so injured as to be now of little or no value. The sixth count presents the same question.

Pollock on Torts, pp. 154-156, treating of this subject, says: "A man cannot be held a wrongdoer, in a court of law, for acting in conformity with direction or allowance of the supreme legal power in a state. In other words, 'no action will lie for doing that which the Legislature has authorized, if it be done without negligence, although it does occasion damage to any one.' The meaning of the qualification will appear immediately. Subject thereto, 'the remedy of the party who suffers the loss is confined to recovering such compensation (if any) as the Legislature has thought fit to give him.'"

"* * * Apart from the question of statutory compensation, it is settled that no action can be maintained for loss or inconvenience which is the necessary consequence of an authorized thing being done in an authorized manner. A person dwelling near a railway constructed, under authority of Parliament, for the purpose of being worked by locomotive engines, cannot complain of the noise and vibration caused by trains passing and repassing in the ordinary course of traffic, however unpleasant he may find it, nor of damage caused by the escape of sparks from the engines, if the company has used due caution to prevent such escape as far as practicable."

In Vaughan v. Taff Vale Railway Co., 5 H. & N. 679, the court said: "A railway company authorized by the Legislature to use locomotive engines is not responsible for damage from fire occasioned by sparks emitted from an engine traveling on their railway, provided they have taken every precaution in their power and adopted every means which science can suggest to prevent injury from fire, and are not guilty of negligence in the management of the engine."

And Chief Justice Cockburn uses the following language: "Yet, when the Legislature has sanctioned and authorized the use of a particular thing, and it is used for the purpose for which it was authorized, and every precaution has been observed to prevent injury, the sanction of the Legislature carried with it this consequence that if damage results from the use of such thing, independently of negligence, the party using it is not responsible."

This case was approved in Hammersmith, etc., Ry. Co. v. Brand, reported in 4 English & Irish App. Cases, 171, where Mr. Justice Blackburn says: "I think it is agreed on all hands that if the Legislature authorizes the doing of an act which, if unauthorized, would be wrong and a cause of action, no action can be maintained for that act, on the plain ground that no court can treat that as a wrong which the Legislature has authorized, and consequently the person who has suffered a loss by the doing of that act is without remedy, unless in so far as the Legislature has thought it proper to provide for compensation to him. He is, in fact, in the same position as the person supposed to have suffered from the noise of traffic on a new highway is at common law, and subject to the same hardship. He suffers a private loss for the public benefit."

The Supreme Court of the United States is to the same effect. In Transportation Co. v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 25 L. Ed. 336, the court said: "That cannot be a nuisance, such as to give a common-law right of action, which the law authorizes. We refer to an action at common law, such as this. A Legislature may, and often does, authorize and even direct acts to be done which are harmful to individuals, and which, without the authority, would be nuisances; but in such a case, if the statute be such as the Legislature has power to pass, the acts are lawful, and are not nuisances, unless the power has been exceeded. In such grants of power a right to compensation for consequential injuries caused by the authorized erections may be given to those who suffer, but then the right is a creature of the statute. It has no existence without it. If this were not so, the suffering party would be entitled to repeated actions, until an abatement of the erections would be enforced, or perhaps he might restrain them by injunction." See, also, Ulline v. N. Y. Cent. R. Co., 101 N. Y. 98, 4 N. E. 536, 54 Am. Rep. 661; Sawyer v. Davis, 136 Mass. 229, 49 Am. Rep. 27; Heiss v. Railroad Co. (Wis.) 34 N. W. 916; Randle v. Pac. R. Co., 65 Mo. 325.

The decisions of this court are in harmony with these cases. In James River & Kanawha Canal Co. v. Anderson, 12 Leigh, 278, the court held that an injunction would not lie at the instance of a property owner, whose lands did not abut upon the street at the point at which the defendant was excavating, to enjoin the prosecution of the work. Judge Allen, at page 305, after alluding to the fact that the company had encroached upon the street, said: "Was the company authorized by its charter to make this encroachment? For, if it was, then, whatever injury may ensue to the property holders on the street, an injunction cannot be awarded."

In Richmond Traction Co. v. Murphy, 98 Va. 104, 34 S. E. 982, the tracks of the railroad company were laid in Broad street, in the city of Richmond, in front of a portion of a lot owned by Murphy. The track, as it left Murphy's lot, came close to the sidewalk, approaching the property line of the property owners abutting on the street, and immediately adjacent to the property of E. P. Murphy. By agreement, condemnation proceedings were had; and the commissioners reported that for the taking of the property of Murphy, and for damage to the residue of his lot by reason of the construction of the railroad in the street immediately in front of his property, he was entitled to $1,000, and further reported that, if he was entitled to damages by reason of the construction of the track immediately in front of the property adjacent to his lot, then he should be given $1,000 additional. But the court said he was entitled to the sum of $1,000 for the taking of his property, but that the injury done to his property by the construction of the railroad in front of the property adjacent to his lot was damnum absque injuria, and therefore no compensation could be allowed him.

Upon an appeal to this court, Judge Harrison delivered the opinion, saying: "To hold that each abutting lot was impaired in value by reason of the location of the road beyond its limits, and that the owner was entitled to receive compensation therefor, would so multiply the damages to be paid as to amount to a denial of the right to construct the road." See, also, Smith v. City Council of Alexandria, 33 Grat. 208, 36 Am. Rep. 788; Home, etc., Co. v. City of Roanoke, 91 Va. 52, 20 S. E. 895, 27 L. R. A. 551.

Meyer v. City of Richmond was a suit brought to recover damages against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company and the city of Richmond for damages caused to the property of the plaintiff by the obstruction of the street upon which plaintiff's property abutted, caused by tracks, sheds, and fences of the railroad company built under authority of its charter, and with the assent of the city of Richmond, by which travel along the street was arrested, and the property rights of petitioner as an abutter on said street were practically destroyed. It appears, however, that the structures complained of did not touch the property of the plaintiff. A judgment was entered in the law and equity court of the city of Richmond for the defendant, and to that judgment a writ of error was denied by this court. The case was afterwards carried to the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that Meyer had been deprived of his property without due process of law. The Supreme Court took jurisdiction of the case, but ultimately affirmed the decision of this court. 19 Sup. Ct. 106, 43 L. Ed. 374. In the course of the opinion the court said: "The substantial thing is not that one may be damaged by an obstruction in a street—not that one may be specially damaged beyond others—but, is such damage a deprivation of property, within the meaning of the constitutional provision? According to the Virginia cases, an additional servitude may be said to be another physical appropriation, and hence another taking, and must be compensated. But the plaintiff's case is not within this doctrine, nor is there anything in the decisions of Virginia which makes consequential damages to property a taking, within the meaning of the Constitution or that state. Decisions in other states we need not resort to or review."

After reviewing a large number of cases from this and other states, the court held that consequential damage to property by an obstruction in a street is not a deprivation of the property, within the constitutional provision against depriving a person of property without due process of law.

We do not think that the demurrer should have been sustained because of the improper joinder of various and distinct causes of action accruing at different times, and resulting in different species of alleged injuries. Indeed, this ground of demurrer was not insisted upon in the argument, and is clearly not well taken. "Wherever causes of action are of the same nature, and the same judgment is to be given in all, they may be joined in one declaration." 4 Minor's Inst. (3d Ed.) 1160.

We are of opinion that the third, fourth, fifth, and sixth counts were all demurrable, for the reasons assigned—with respect to the third and fifth, because the acts of negligence were not stated with reasonable certainty; and with respect to the fourth and sixth, because, as stated, the acts charged upon the defendant were authorized by its charter. But in order to secure this immunity, the power conferred by the Legislature must be exercised without negligence, with judgment and caution. For damage which could not have been avoided by any reasonable, practicable care on the part of those authorized to exercise the power, there is no right of action; but they must not do needless harm, and, if they do, it is a wrong against which the ordinary remedies are available. "If an authorized railway comes near my house, and disturbs me by the noise and vibrations of the trains, it may be a hardship to me, but it is no wrong. For the railway was authorized and made in order that trains might be run upon it, and, without noise and vibrations, trains cannot be run at all. But if the company makes a cutting, for example, so as to put my house in danger of falling, I shall have my action, for they need not bring down my house to make their cutting. They can provide support for the house, or otherwise conduct their works more carefully. When the company can construct its works without injury to private rights, it is, in general, bound to do so." Pollock on Torts (Webb's Am. Ed.) supra; Stearns v. City of Richmond, 88 Va. 992, 14 S. E. 847, 29 Am. St. Rep. 758.

The judgment of the law and equity court is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with leave to amend the declaration in any manner that the plaintiff may be advised, not inconsistent with the foregoing opinion.

MOSS v. HARWOOD.

LIBEL—ACTIONABLE PUBLICATIONS—CHARGE OF CRIME—CHARGE PROVOCATIVE OF VIOLENCE—CHARGE INJURIOUS TO GOOD NAME—CONSTRUCTION OF LANGUAGE EMPLOYED—INUENDO—FEES.

1. A publication stating that plaintiff, a chief of police, had collected certain fines of an official, which fines did not appear by the records of the police court to have been recorded, did not charge plaintiff with the commission of the crime of embezzlement or larceny which is a statutory crime, committed, under Code 1887, § 3716, when a person wrongfully and fraudulently uses, disposes of, conceals, or embezzles any money, etc., or any other property, which he shall have received for another, or by virtue of his office, trust, or employment; or under section 3717, when an officer, agent, or employé of the state, or of any city, town, or county, having the custody of public funds, knowingly misuses or misappropriates the same, or knowingly disposes of them otherwise than in accordance with law.

2. Where the words employed in an alleged libel, interpreted in their usual and ordinary meaning, do not impute a crime, their meaning cannot be enlarged by an innuendo so as to accomplish that purpose.

3. A publication stating that plaintiff, a chief of police, had collected certain fines of a certain officer, which fines did not appear by the records of the police court to have been recorded, is not libelous under Code 1887, § 2897, which provides that all words which, in their usual construction and in common acceptance, are construed as insults, and tend to violence and breach of the peace, shall be actionable.

4. Where the words employed in a libel tend to injure the person libeled in his good name, fame, and credit, and to bring him into public scandal, infamy, and disgrace, they are actionable, although not imputing an indictable offense.

5. As it is the duty of the chief of police to collect and report fines, to say of him that he has collected fines, but does not appear to have recorded them, while falling short of an imputation of crime, and not in express terms charging a breach of official duty, yet, when aided by a proper innuendo, does impute to him conduct tending to injure his reputation in the common estimation of good citizens, and is libelous.

Error to Circuit Court, Elizabeth City County.

Action by one Harwood against A. A. Moss. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

O. C. Berkeley and J. H. Gilkerson, for plaintiff in error. R. M. Lett and O. D. Batchelor, for defendant in error.

KEITH, P. The first count of the declaration in this case charges that Harwood was chief of police of the city of Newport News, and that on the 23d of November, 1896, in the city of Newport News, A. A. Moss, the mayor of the city, published a certain false, malicious, scandalous, and defamatory libel concerning the plaintiff, as follows: "Your complainant (meaning the said defendant A. A. Moss) charges that the said chief of police (meaning the plaintiff, Harwood) has within the last past twelve months collected certain fines of Officer Padgett, which fines do not appear by the records of the police court to have been reported"—Moss meaning thereby to insinuate and charge, and have it understood, that the plaintiff, Harwood, was guilty of the crime of embezzlement and larceny.

The second count of the declaration charges that the defendant composed and published concerning the plaintiff a certain false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory libel, setting it out in the same words employed in the first count, and charges that the defendant knew the falsity of the said charge, and that by means of the publication of the same the plaintiff has been greatly injured in his good name, fame, and credit, and brought into public scandal, infamy, and disgrace with and amongst all of his neighbors and other good and worthy citizens of the commonwealth, etc.

The defendant demurred to the declaration, and, while the demurrer does not state in terms that it is to the declaration and each count thereof, we think the language in which the demurrer is couched may be so considered. The circuit court overruled the demurrer, and its action in this respect constitutes the first assignment of error.

The language of the imputed libel is, "Your complainant charges that the chief of police has within the last past twelve months collected certain fines of Officer Padgett, which fines do not appear by the records of the police court to have been reported."

It is averred that the purpose of the defendant by this publication was to charge the plaintiff with being guilty of embezzlement.

It is well settled that: "In determining whether or not the language does impute a criminal offense the words must be construed in the plain and popular sense in which the rest of the world would naturally understand them. It is not necessary that they should make the charge in express terms. It is sufficient if they consist of a statement of matters which would naturally and presumably be understood by those who heard them as charging a crime." Payne v. Tancil, 98 Va. 264, 35 S. E. 725. That case, it is true, was an action for a slander, but in this respect there seems to be no difference between written and spoken words.

We are of opinion that, construing the language employed in the libel in accordance with this rule, it does not justify the interpretation placed upon it by the plaintiff.

Embezzlement is a statutory crime. "If any person wrongfully and fraudulently use, dispose of, conceal, or embezzle any money, bill, note, check, order, draft, bond, receipt, bill of lading, or any other property which he shall have received for another, or for his employer, principal, or bailor, or by virtue of his office, trust, or employment, or which shall have been entrusted or delivered to him by another, or by any court, corporation, or company, he shall be deemed guilty of larceny thereof." Code 1887, § 3716.

"If any officer, agent, or employee of the state, or of any city, town, or county, having custody of public funds, knowingly misuse or misappropriate the same, or knowingly dispose thereof otherwise than in accordance with law, he shall be confined in the penitentiary not less than one nor more than ten years; and any default of any such officer, agent, or employee, in paying over said funds to the proper authorities when required by law to do so, shall be deemed prima facie evidence of his guilt." Id. § 3717.

A comparison of the language employed in the libel with these quotations from the Code makes it obvious, we think, that the innuendo cannot be sustained; in other words, that the language employed, construed in its plain and popular sense, does not impute the crime of larceny or embezzlement to the plaintiff.

"The office of an innuendo is to define the defamatory meaning which the plaintiff seeks to put upon the words complained of, to show how they come to have the defamatory meaning claimed for them, and also to show how they relate to the plaintiff, whenever that is not clear upon the face of them. But an innuendo must not introduce new matter, or enlarge the natural meaning of words. It must not put upon them a construction which they will not bear. It cannot alter or extend the sense of the defamatory words, or make that certain which is in fact uncertain." Newell on Slander & Libel (2d Ed.) p. 619.

The same author (at page 620) says: "The law proceeds on the hypothesis that what is the ordinary meaning and nature and intrinsic force of language is a question of law. When, therefore, words are set forth as having been spoken by the defendant of the plaintiff, the first question is whether they impute a charge of felony or any other infamous crime punishable by law. If they do, an innuendo undertaking to state the same in other words is useless and superfluous; if they do not, such an innuendo cannot aid it. It therefore often happens that where innuendoes are added which do alter and vary, and even inflame and exaggerate, the sense of the words much beyond their natural force and meaning, yet such innuendoes are held not to vitiate the declaration; the reason of which I take to be this: The words themselves imputing an infamous offense, the innuendo may be rejected as surplusage; and, as the plaintiff is not allowed to go into evidence aliunde to show that the words were in fact used in the sense imputed by the innuendo, they can have no influence whatever. But if the words do not impute such infamous crime by their natural sense and meaning, then, as a general rule, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover; and, as he cannot enlarge that meaning by an innuendo so as to let in proof of extraneous facts, his action must fail." To the same effect, see Payne v. Tancil, supra, and Moseley v. Moss, 6 Grat. 534.

If the words employed in the libel had imputed the crime of embezzlement or larceny, the innuendo would have been unnecessary. As the words employed, interpreted in the usual and ordinary acceptance of their meaning, do not impute a crime, their meaning cannot be enlarged by an innuendo so as to accomplish that purpose. We think the demurrer to the first count should have been sustained.

The second count is equally insufficient, if considered as charging any criminal offense upon the defendant. Nor is it good under section 2897 of the Code of 1887, which provides that all words which, from their usual construction and common acceptance, are construed as insults, and tend to violence and breach of the peace, shall be actionable.

In Hogan v. Wilmoth, 16 Grat. 80, it is said that, if a proceeding be under the statute, the declaration must aver that the words, from their usual construction and common acceptance, are construed as insults, and tend to violence and breach of the peace, or else employ some other equivalent averment to denote that the words are actionable under the statute. Chaffin v. Lynch, 83 Va. 106, 1 S. E. 803; Payne v. Tancil, supra.

The count, therefore, is not good as charging an indictable offense, nor under the statute as for insulting words.

If the words employed in a libel tend to injure the defendant in his good name, fame, and credit, and to bring him into public scandal, infamy, and disgrace, they are actionable, although not imputing an indictable offense.

In Adams v. Lawson, 17 Grat. 250, 94 Am. Dec. 455, it is said: "It is not necessary, to constitute a libel, that the writing should contain the imputation of an offense which may be indicted and punished. It is sufficient if the language tends to injure the reputation of the party, to throw contumely or to reflect shame and disgrace upon him, or to hold him up as an object of scorn, ridicule, or contempt."

And Judge Cooley, in his work on Torts (2d Ed.) p. 240, says: "In libel, as in slander, defamatory publications are classified as publications actionable per se, and publications actionable on averment and proof of special damage. In the first class are embraced all cases of publications which would be actionable per se if made orally. These cases, therefore, require no further attention. It also embraces all other cases where the additional gravity imparted to the charge by the publication can fairly be supposed to make it damaging. Thus, to say of a man, 'I look upon him as a rascal,' is no slander, unless shown to be damaging; but if it be published of him in one of the public journals, the presumption that injury follows is reasonable and legitimate. So to call a man in print 'an imp of the devil and cowardly snail' is libelous, though an oral imputation of the sort would be presumably harmless. So, to charge a teacher with falsehood in a report made to the official board, and with general untruthfulness, is libelous per se. The general rule is stated thus: Any false and malicious writing published of another is libelous per se when its tendency is to render him contemptible or ridiculous in public estimation, or expose him to public hatred or contempt, or to hinder virtuous men from associating with him." And again the same author says: "In other words, injury is presumed to follow the apparently deliberate act of putting the charge in writing or print, or of suggesting it by means of picture or effigy, where mere vocal utterance to the same effect might be disregarded as possibly harmless."

The law is thus stated in Newell on Slander and Libel, at page 37: "In conclusion it may be said that any publication, expressed either by printing or writing, or by signs, pictures, or effigies, or the like, which tends to injure one's reputation in the common estimation of mankind, to throw contumely, shame, or disgrace upon him, or which tends to hold him up to scorn, ridicule, or contempt, or which is calculated to render him infamous, odious, or ridiculous, is prima facie a libel, and implies malice in its publication."

It appears to have been the duty of the chief of police to collect and report fines. To say of such an officer that he has collected fines, but does not appear to have reported them, while falling short of the imputation of a crime, while not in express terms charging a breach of official duty, yet, when aided by the innuendo, operating within the scope of its legitimate functions, does impute to the plaintiff conduct tending to injure his reputation in the common estimation of good citizens. We are of opinion that the demurrer to the second count was properly overruled.

For the error of the court in overruling the demurrer to the first count, the judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

BERKELEY & HARRISON v. GREEN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 28, 1904.)

TRUSTS—ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—COUNSEL—FEES—CONTRACT.

1. A trustee in a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors may, in good faith, employ counsel, and pay them out of the trust fund reasonable compensation for their services.

2. Evidence considered, and held that an express contract fixing the compensation of attorneys for a trustee for the benefit of creditors is established.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Danville.

Action by Berkeley & Harrison against Berryman Green, trustee. Decree for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Berkeley & Harrison, Frank W. Christian and Thos. Hamlin, for appellants. Guthrie & Guthrie, Peatross & Harris, Julian Meade, Withers & Green, E. E. Bouldin, C. U. Williams, Cabell, Cabell & Custer, and Jas. L. Tredway, for appellee.

WHITTLE, J. The controversy on this appeal is between appellants and creditors of the late John W. Holland with respect to a fee asserted by the former, as counsel for Berryman Green, trustee, against a trust fund under the control of the court.

It appears that John W. Holland, who had become liable as indorser for his brother C. G. Holland in the sum of $156,235.10, conveyed a large amount of valuable property, real and personal, in trust to secure creditors holding indorsed notes, and other creditors of the grantor. The deed contains, among other stipulations, the following:

"It is understood and agreed that in the execution of his duties hereunder, the said Berryman Green, trustee, shall be authorized and empowered to employ counsel and compensate them for their services out of the trust funds."

By virtue of the foregoing provision, which is binding upon all creditors who have accepted the benefits of the deed, the trustee in good faith engaged appellants as his counsel to aid him in the execution of the trust. Thereupon a suit was instituted by them, in the name of the trustee, against the beneficiaries, to construe the deed, and to obtain the guidance and assistance of the court in the administration of the trust.

At the time of their retainer the amount of appellants' compensation was not fixed, but subsequently it was agreed between them and the trustee that they should be allowed a fee of $1,000, to be paid out of the trust fund. In pursuance of that agreement the trustee paid appellants $500 on account of their fee, and took a receipt from them to that effect. Afterward other trustees were substituted in the place of Berryman Green, and appellants presented a petition setting forth their contract with the original trustee, the payment made in accordance therewith, and praying that the balance of their fee might be audited and approved by the court, and decreed to be paid them out of the trust fund under its control. The court directed one of its commissioners in chancery to take and report the testimony bearing upon the transaction, and, upon a return of the evidence, entered the decree appealed from, declaring that the $500 already paid was a reasonable fee for the services rendered by appellants for the trustee, and dismissed their petition.

The trial court obviously disposed of the controversy on the theory that, upon a quantum meruit, appellants had already been adequately compensated for their services. But it must be observed that no such issue was made and submitted to the court either by the pleadings or evidence. Appellants relied in their petition upon an express contract between themselves and the trustee that they should receive $1,000 for their services, and that allegation is fully sustained by the evidence. Indeed, there is practically no conflict between the testimony of appellants and that of the trustee with respect to the terms of the contract, and no countervailing evidence was adduced.

It is fair to presume that, if appellants had intended to rely upon an implied contract that they were to be compensated for their services upon a quantum meruit, they would have made that case in their petition, and have undertaken to prove the services rendered, and what such services were reasonably worth. Relying, however, as they had a right to rely, upon an express contract, reasonable in its terms, which the trustee was authorized by the deed to make, in the absence of any suggestion of collusion or bad faith, there was no necessity for appellants to have introduced evidence of the value of their services, other than that afforded by the agreement itself. Even where a deed does not expressly authorize it, a trustee may in good faith employ counsel to advise and assist him in the discharge of his duties, and may pay them out of the trust fund reasonable compensation for their services. Cochran v. Richmond, etc., R. Co., 91 Va. 339, 21 S. E. 664.

The administration of this trust necessitated the institution and prosecution of a litigated chancery cause, and involved debts and assets to the amount of several hundred thousand dollars. The trustee, himself a lawyer of experience and ability, was of opinion that the fee agreed upon was not unreasonable, and in that opinion this court concurs.

It follows from the foregoing views that the decree complained of is erroneous and should be reversed, and this court will enter such decree as the trial court ought to have entered, sustaining and enforcing the contract of the parties.

JOHNSTON & CHEEK v. GREEN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Jan. 23, 1904.)

BANKS—INSOLVENCY—PREFERRED CREDITORS—DEPOSITS—APPROPRIATION—PAYMENTS—DATE.

1. An insolvent at the time of his assignment was indebted to certain bankers, and their claim was given a preference over all others. The trustee under the assignment kept an active bank account with such bankers until the final settlement of his accounts. On June 4, 1900, during his administration, he collected and deposited to such account over $16,000 under a decree which directed him to deduct therefrom his commissions, reasonable attorney's fees, and unpaid costs of suit, and to distribute the balance to creditors according to their priorities as ascertained by the report of a commissioner, then filed and confirmed. Checks were drawn against this deposit, and other amounts added thereto, but the larger part of the deposit remained in the bank until January 13, 1902, when the trustee gave a check to his successors for the balance standing to his credit in the bank, and on that day the substituted trustees paid such balance to the bankers on their preferred claim. Held that, though the bank had the use of the money during the time it was deposited, they had no authority to apply it to their claim, and hence it should be treated as having been paid to them on the day it was paid by the substituted trustees, and not on the day it was deposited.

Appeal from Corporation Court of Danville.

Action between Berryman Green, as trustee of the insolvent estate of John W. Holland and Johnston & Cheek. From a decree fixing the date of a payment to Johnston & Cheek as preferred creditors, they appeal. Reversed.

A. C. Edmunds, for appellants. Guthrie & Guthrie, Peatross & Harris, Julian Meade, Withers & Green, E. E. Bouldin, C. U. Williams, Cabell, Cabell & Custer, Jas. L. Tredway, and Berkeley & Harrison, for appellee.

HARRISON, J. In January, 1897, John W. Holland conveyed a large estate to Berryman Green, trustee, to secure numerous creditors. In March of the same year the trustee filed a bill asking the direction of the court in administering his trust. In this assignment Charles L. Holland, doing a banking business under the name and style of Johnston & Cheek, was given priority over all other creditors for a debt of $20,000, which seems not to have been questioned by any one.

It appears that the trustee kept his bank account with the banking house of Johnston & Cheek from the time the suit was instituted until the final settlement of his accounts. On June 4, 1900, the trustee collected and deposited to his credit with Johnston & Cheek $16,393.52 under a decree which directed him to deduct therefrom his commissions, a reasonable fee to be paid his attorneys, the unpaid costs of the suit, and to distribute the balance to the creditors according to their rights and priorities as ascertained by the report of the commissioner then filed in the cause and confirmed. Checks were drawn by the trustee against this account, and other deposits added thereto, but the larger part of the deposit of June 4, 1900, remained in the bank until January 13, 1902, when Green, trustee and receiver of the court, gave to Victor & Patterson, substituted trustees, his check for $14,193.62, the balance then standing to his credit in the bank, and on the same day the substituted trustees paid this sum to Johnston & Cheek on account of their preferred debt of $20,000.

The contention of the general creditors is that, inasmuch as the deposit in question was made in the bank of Johnston & Cheek, and as the balance of such deposit would, after the payment of commissions, reasonable attorney's fees, and unpaid costs, have been payable to the bank as the preferred creditor, therefore such balance should be credited upon the preferred debt due to the bank as of June 4, 1900, the date of the deposit, rather than as of January 13, 1902, the date of the formal payment by the substituted trustees to Johnston & Cheek; that the trustee having failed to distribute the deposit as directed by the decree, and allowed the same, or the greater part thereof, to remain in bank until January, 1902, the bank had thereby derived all the benefit that it would have received had the balance in question been promptly and formally paid over, and should therefore be required to account for such balance as a credit upon its debt as of the date of the deposit.

We are of opinion that the lower court erred in sustaining this contention. The record shows that the account kept by Green, trustee and receiver, at the bank of Johnston & Cheek, was an active and varying one, and was subject to no special agreement, but was received and treated as the accounts of all other customers of the bank whose deposits were at all times subject to check. The decree relied on as dedicating the deposit of June 4, 1900, to the payment of the debt due to Johnston & Cheek cannot be so construed.

The decree does not direct any certain sum to be paid to the creditors. Indeed, the fund was not in the hands of the trustee. He was directed to collect certain moneys due to the fund and to deduct his commissions, pay reasonable attorney's fees, pay the unpaid costs of suit, and, lastly, to distribute the balance to the creditors according to their rights and priorities. The several payments to be made by the trustee were not ascertained by the decree, were uncertain in amount, and some of them left to the discretion of the trustee by the direction to him to pay reasonable attorney's fees. This item of attorney's fees has since been the subject of litigation, and is now undetermined, and pending on appeal in another case before this court. 46 S. E. 387. The disbursement of this fund was a duty imposed by the trust deed and the decree of the court upon the trustee, and the appellant was not only under no obligation to assume that responsibility, but its assumption would have been an unwarranted interference with a fund under the exclusive control of the court and its officer. The deposit in question did not belong to Johnston & Cheek. Under the decree no part of it was to be distributed to creditors until certain items of expense and costs had been paid by the trustee. This officer would himself doubtless have been unable to determine and settle these several items on the day the deposit was made; and yet it is insisted that the bank, ignoring the trustee and receiver, should have assumed the responsibility of determining these several matters, and should have appropriated a part of this trust fund to its own use as of the day the deposit was made. Johnston & Cheek would have had no right to apply money deposited in their bank by a bonded receiver and trustee of the court, in a pending suit, to the payment of a debt they had proved in that suit. Railroad Co. v. Smith, 60 Mich. 112, 15 N. W. 39; Bank v. Evans & Dorsey, 9 W. Va. 373; People v. Remington, 59 Hun, 307, 12 N. Y. Supp. 829.

The case last cited is very much in point. That was a suit to liquidate the affairs of a firm, among whose creditors was the Illion Bank. In the regular course of the liquidation, a dividend which should have been paid to the bank, amounting to nearly $50,000, was delayed for a year or more, and during this period the receiver of the court kept on deposit at the Illion Bank a part of the trust funds largely in excess of the dividend; and it was there contended that because the bank had the use of the funds it was not entitled to interest on the dividend, but the court held that the arrangement between the bank and the receiver was one of mutual benefit and convenience, and whether one received more benefit than the other could not be inquired into; that it was in the nature of a contract between the parties with which the court had no right to interfere.

In the case at bar the report of the commissioner, filed September 24, 1902, properly credited the debt due appellant with the payment in question as of January 13, 1902, the day it was actually paid by the substituted trustees, and the exceptions taken to that finding should have been overruled, and the report in that respect confirmed.

For these reasons the decree appealed from must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

CONSUMERS' BREWING CO. v. DOYLE'S ADM'X.

NEGLIGENCE—CONCURRENT NEGLIGENCE—ACCIDENT—ACTION FOR INJURIES—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. In an action for personal injuries, negligence of defendant must be established by affirmative evidence, which, while it need not be direct and positive, by some one who witnessed the occurrence and saw how it happened, yet must show more than a probability of a negligent act, and must be such as to satisfy reasonable and well-balanced minds that the injury resulted from defendant's negligence.

2. Plaintiff's intestate was employed by a painter to paint a sign over the front of defendant's building, about 15 feet from the ground. A swinging stage was erected, supported by ropes fastened to the top of the building, and which were allowed to hang from the ends of the stage to the ground below. While plaintiff's intestate was on this stage, engaged in painting the sign, defendant's wagons were constantly driving up to the front door of the building, which was under the stage, for the purpose of loading and unloading boxes. One wagon stood there about 25 minutes, and when it started away, one of the ropes became, or had already become, entangled in one of the wheels; and, as the wagon moved off, the stage received a jerk, precipitating plaintiff's intestate to the ground. Held that, if there was any negligence on the part of defendant or his servants, there was an equal degree of concurrent negligence on the part of plaintiff's intestate, in failing to guard against any danger rendered imminent by the presence of the wagon and its motions, which precluded a recovery.

3. Where one engaged in painting a sign on the side of a building about 15 feet from the ground was precipitated from the staging on which he was working, owing to the ropes suspending the staging, and which had fallen to the ground, becoming entangled with the wheels of a wagon, which had stood under the staging for some 25 minutes, there being nothing to suggest such an occurrence to either the painter or the driver of the wagon, and it being a matter of pure speculation as to how or when the rope became entangled with the wagon wheel, the consequent injury of the painter must be deemed an accident for which there could be no recovery.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by the administratrix of Charles H. Doyle against the Consumers' Brewing Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

White, Tunstall & Thom, P. H. & H. C. Cabell, and G. M. Dillard, for plaintiff in error. Thos. H. Wilcox and Hubard & Hubard, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by the administratrix of Charles H. Doyle to recover from the Consumers' Brewing Company damages for the alleged negligent killing of the plaintiff's intestate by the servants of the defendant company.

It appears that the brewing company employed the firm of Dalby & Butler to paint its building, and to paint its name across the front of said building. This firm employed the plaintiff's intestate, Charles H. Doyle, to paint the sign, which was about 15 feet from the ground. A swinging stage was erected by these painters, from which the lettering was to be done. This stage was supported by ropes fastened to the top of the building, and during the progress of the work these ropes were allowed to hang from the ends of the stage to the ground below; the northern rope being coiled on the ground near the large front door of the building, and the southern rope fastened around a knob that came out of the building near a small south door.

While Doyle was on this stage, engaged in painting the sign, the wagons of the brewing company were constantly driving up to the large front door of the building, which was under the stage, for the purpose of loading and unloading boxes and crates of beer. In the afternoon of the day, while Doyle was upon the stage, a covered wagon of the defendant company drove up to the building to unload beer crates. This consumed about 25 minutes, when the driver came out of the building and got upon the wagon, and started immediately for the stable. In some way, not explained, the rope which lay coiled upon the ground, near the large door, became, or had already become, entangled in one of the wheels; and, as the wagon moved off, the stage received a jerk, causing Doyle to fall to the ground, producing injuries from the effects of which he died several days thereafter.

The essential grievance stated in the declaration is that the defendant company, regardless of its duty in the premises, had so negligently and carelessly governed, controlled, managed, and driven its wagon and horses that the same had become entangled with the rope attached to the staging, and had torn the same from the roof, where it was securely fastened, thereby throwing Doyle violently to the ground, and causing the injury complained of.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed the damages at $8,500, which was distributed by the verdict, in equal proportions, to the widow and children of the deceased.

A motion for a new trial was made upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, and for other reasons; but the court overruled the motion and gave judgment for the plaintiff, to be distributed as directed by the verdict, and the defendant excepted.

We are of opinion that in no aspect of the case, under the evidence adduced, was the plaintiff entitled to recover, and in this view it is unnecessary to consider any other assignment of error than the refusal of the court to set the verdict aside as contrary to the law and the evidence.

It is an established fact that the coming and going of the wagons of the defendant up to and from the door over which the deceased was at work was well known to him, and to the firm of painters by whom he was employed. It is further established—indeed, it is not contradicted—that, when the wagon in question drove up to the door, it assumed a position of absolute safety, so far as the deceased was concerned. Doyle himself says that he looked, and the ropes were hanging $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 feet from the wheels of the wagon, and that he went on with his work, and paid no further attention to the wagon. It further appears that the wagon remained unmoved in this safe position for about 25 minutes, when the driver came out and started for the stable; the horse moving off as he was stepping to his seat. The last seen of the ropes by either Doyle or the driver was when the wagon was left standing with the ropes $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 feet from it. There is no evidence which shows how or when the rope became entangled with the wheel of the wagon, nor is there any evidence from which any satisfactory or reliable inference can be drawn to show with any certainty when, how, or by whose instrumentality the rope and the wagon, which were from 2 to 3 feet apart, became entangled with each other. The evidence leaves this important question in the region of the barest conjecture. Whether the rope became entangled with the wagon while the driver was in the building, or after he mounted the wagon and started off, or by his driving against the rope, or whether the contact was the result of the stage upon which Doyle was working shaking or moving the rope so as to bring it and the wagon together, is not revealed by the evidence. Any one of these conjectures is as consistent with the testimony as the other. Indeed, other theories might be suggested in explanation of the accident, but in such cases we are not permitted to indulge in conjecture or speculation. The burden is upon the plaintiff to make out her case, which is, in the first instance, to establish the negligence of the defendant by affirmative evidence, which must show more than a probability of a negligent act. The proof need not be direct and positive, by some one who witnessed the occurrence and saw how it happened, but it must be such as to satisfy reasonable and well-balanced minds that it resulted from the negligence of the defendant. Southern Ry. Co. v. Hall, 102 Va. —, 45 S. E. 867; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Poole's Adm'r, 100 Va. 148, 40 S. E. 627.

In the case last cited, Judge Buchanan says: "When damages are claimed for injuries which may have resulted from one of two causes, for one of which the defendant is responsible, and for the other of which it is not responsible, the plaintiff must fail if his evidence does not show that the damage was produced by the former cause. And he must also fail if it is just as probable that the damages were caused by the one as by the other, since the plaintiff is bound to make out his case by the preponderance of evidence."

If, however, it appeared that the defendant's driver was guilty of negligence, as alleged, and, as contended, guilty of negligence in not looking, when he came out of the building, to see if the rope was in or near the wheel, the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover, because of the continuing and concurrent negligence of the deceased. Doyle was in full view of the wagon and horse from the time it stopped until the moment of the accident, and it was certainly as incumbent upon him to be on the alert to protect himself, as it was obligatory upon the driver to be on the lookout for his protection. If the driver was negligent in not seeing the danger to which Doyle was exposed before starting the wagon, it was equally negligent in Doyle not to have seen and guarded against such danger. If the driver was negligent in handling the reins and starting the horse, Doyle was equally negligent in handling the rope, which was under his control. There is no testimony suggesting negligence on the part of the driver that does not convict Doyle of an equal or greater degree of negligence. One had no better opportunity to anticipate the accident, nor any better means of preventing it, than the other. If, therefore, there was negligence, it was concurring negligence, continuous and mutual up to the instant of the accident, which disentitles the plaintiff to recover. Richmond Traction Co. v. Martin's Adm'x, 102 Va. —, 45 S. E. 886.

There was nothing in the situation to suggest danger to either party from the time the wagon stopped until it started away. Doyle says that he regarded the situation as a safe one, and paid no further attention to the wagon after it stopped. If the accident had been anticipated, it could have been easily avoided by either party—on Doyle's part, by drawing the rope up to a place of safety above the wagon, and on the driver's part by examining to see that the rope had not come in contact with the wagon during his absence. Neither, however, anticipated trouble, and therefore neither took precautions to avoid it. The true view of the case presented by the record is that the injury complained of was the result of an accident which was not expected, and could not have been anticipated by a person of ordinary prudence. The fact, as shown in the outset, that it is a matter of pure speculation how or when the rope became entangled with the wagon wheel, greatly strengthens the view that the case must be referred to the region of pure accident. It would violate every principle of justice or law if the defendant were compelled to foresee and provide against that which reasonable and prudent men would not expect to happen. Persinger's Adm'x v. Alleghany Ore & Iron Co., 102 Va. —, 46 S. E. 325.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the lower court erred in overruling the motion of the defendant to set aside the verdict, and its judgment must therefore be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

SEABOARD & R. R. CO. v. HICKEY.

RAILROADS—INJURIES TO CHILDREN—JUMPING ON CARS—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Plaintiff, a boy eight years old, ran out from a throng of people, and attempted to catch hold of a cuff or socket on a car of defendant's freight train, when he slipped and fell between the two rear trucks of the car, and was injured. The preponderance of evidence was that plaintiff was attempting to jump on the car. The only member of the train's crew who saw the accident was a brakeman standing on the top of one of the cars, who saw plaintiff jump, and attempt to clutch the cuff, when he lost his hold and fell, and who thereupon immediately signaled the engineer, but failed to attract his attention. Held, that there was no evidence of negligence on the part of defendant.

Error to Hustings Court of Portsmouth.

Action by John Hickey against the Seaboard & Roanoke Railroad Company. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

G. Hatton, for plaintiff in error. Jeffries & Lawless, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This action was brought by defendant in error to recover damages from the plaintiff in error, who was the defendant in the court below, for personal injuries alleged to have been inflicted upon him by the negligence of the defendant.

The specific allegation of the amended declaration is that during a carnival in the city of Portsmouth the defendant, while running a freight train over its tracks along one of the streets of that city, negligently permitted the plaintiff, a boy eight years and four months of age, to attempt to climb and ride upon one of its cars; that while so attempting to climb upon said car, and while riding thereon, plaintiff was by the default, carelessness, recklessness, negligence, willfulness, and improper conduct of the defendant, violently thrown to the ground and under the cars, by means whereof his left leg was so fractured and injured that it had to be amputated.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $6,000, whereupon the defendant submitted a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and evidence, and for other reasons; but the court overruled the motion, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant excepted.

The view taken by this court is that there was a total failure on the part of the plaintiff to trace actionable negligence to the defendant, and that in no aspect of the case was he entitled to a verdict; and that renders a detailed notice of other assignments of error unnecessary.

All the instructions given by the court were, in one form or another, predicated upon the supposed negligence of the defendant, and, as there was no evidence tending to establish that fact, upon familiar principles the instructions ought not to have been given. A brief statement of the circumstances and uncontroverted facts bearing upon the casualty will show the utter groundlessness of plaintiff's demand.

At the time of the accident a freight train of the defendant, consisting of 3 box cars, attached to the rear end of the train—13 flat cars and an engine—was being propelled along Crawford street. As the train was passing a "baby stand," around which a crowd had assembled, the plaintiff ran out from the throng, and attempted to catch hold of a cuff or socket (intended to receive a stanchion) on the hindermost flat car, when he slipped and fell between the two rear trucks, one of the wheels of which passed over his leg and inflicted the injury complained of. Fisher, the only witness for the plaintiff who saw the accident, was standing within 10 yards of him when he fell. His attention was first directed to plaintiff by observing his arm raised and seeing him fall underneath the car. Witness ran to him at once, and plaintiff drew up the injured leg, and was in the act of stretching out the other leg, when he was drawn from between the wheels. While Fisher's testimony is not very clear, and differs from that of other witnesses in that he expressed the opinion that plaintiff was not attempting to jump on the car when he fell, it involves no question of veracity between them. Considered in the light of other evidence bearing directly upon the accident, it would seem that Fisher observed the plaintiff for the first time after he had failed to grasp the cuff on the flat car, and was in the act of falling. However that may be, his statement that he did not think plaintiff was endeavoring to jump on the car, which was but the expression of an opinion, is opposed to the allegation of the amended declaration, the oft-repeated admissions of the plaintiff, and to all the other evidence in the case upon that point. But, if his version of the occurrence were accepted, it would not affect the result, because, while it tends to exonerate the plaintiff from willful misconduct, it in no wise imputes negligence to the defendant.

The only member of the train's crew who saw the accident was a switchman and brakeman, who was standing on the top of the middle box car. He testified that a number of boys were attempting to get on the train, and that, while a policeman was trying to keep them off on one side, he was similarly engaged on the other. He saw the plaintiff jump and attempt to clutch the cuff or socket on the flat car, when he lost his hold and fell. He also saw some one seize him, and immediately signal the engineer, but failed to attract his attention. The occurrence was instantaneous, and, after plaintiff's danger became known to the brakeman, it was impossible for him to have averted the accident.

It was likewise in evidence that the plaintiff was an intelligent boy, that he lived on a street along which the railroad was located, and was accustomed to trains, and knew of the danger he incurred in attempting to ride on them. He had received repeated warnings on the subject, and been punished for disregarding them. A year or two prior to the accident one of the yard conductors, who lived next door to plaintiff, remonstrated with him about riding on these trains, and several days after the accident plaintiff remarked to the physician who attended him that he would not have been hurt if he had heeded the conductor's advice. He had been ordered off another train of the defendant by a policeman and by one of his own witnesses not more than half an hour before the accident. Notwithstanding these reiterated admonitions, while the train in question was passing, he endeavored to persuade one of his playmates to go with him and ride on the cars, and, despite the refusal and expostulation of his friend, made the attempt which terminated so disastrously.

It cannot be affirmed of the plaintiff that he did not possess sufficient knowledge and discretion to understand the nature of his act and the peril he was encountering. But the case does not depend upon the capacity or incapacity of the plaintiff to commit negligence. The primary question is, has the defendant been guilty of negligence? And that question, upon the evidence, admits of but one answer. To sustain the verdict of the jury in this case would present the anomaly of subjecting a defendant wholly free from fault to the payment of damages by way of compensation for an injury to a plaintiff which was the direct result of his own gross negligence and misconduct.

It was suggested that the defendant was negligent with respect to the length and speed of the train, and in failing to ring the bell. Of that contention, it is sufficient to observe that no such grounds of negligence are alleged in the declaration, and, if alleged and proved, there would have been no causal connection whatever between them and the accident.

For these reasons the lower court erred in overruling the motion of the defendant to set aside the verdict, and for that error its judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

VIRGINIA IRON, COAL & COKE CO. v.
CRANE'S NEST COAL & COKE CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 4, 1904.)

EJECTMENT—EQUITABLE TITLE.

1. No recovery can be had on an equitable title in an action of ejectment.

Error to Circuit Court, Wise County.

Action by the Crane's Nest Coal & Coke Company against the Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. D. Hull, Jr., and Bullitt & Kelly, for plaintiff in error. J. Norment Powell, for defendant in error.

CARDWELL, J. This is an action of ejectment, brought by the Crane's Nest Coal & Coke Company, defendant in error, against the Virginia Iron, Coal & Coke Company, plaintiff in error, to recover possession of the coal, with the right to mine the same, lying upon and under a parcel of 44 acres and 32 poles of land, situated in Wise county, Va.

At a trial of the cause, upon the plea of the general issue, all questions of law and fact were, by agreement of the parties, submitted for the determination of the judge of the circuit court without a jury, upon an agreed statement of facts; the right of either party being reserved at the hearing to object and have the court pass upon the admissibility, as evidence, of any of the facts set out in the agreement, etc. The judgment of the circuit court was for the plaintiff, and the case is before us upon a writ of error awarded the defendant, plaintiff in error here.

Both the plaintiff in error and the defendant in error claim title to the coal in question from a common source—Samuel Horn. About the year 1855, Samuel Horn, under color and claim of title, entered into the possession of two parcels of land in the county of Wise, the legal title to which he afterwards acquired, which two parcels to gether constituted his "farm on Sandy Ridge," and which for more than 20 years prior to 1886 had been generally known and locally designated as "Samuel Horn's Sandy Ridge Tract." The coal in controversy lies upon and under one of these parcels of land, the title to which was conveyed to Samuel Horn by one G. W. Kilgore, as commissioner.

The deed from Horn to Greenway and Warner, trustees, under which plaintiff in error claims, was executed and delivered April 23, 1887, and recorded August 25, 1887, while the deed from Horn to Clayton Mead, under which the defendant in error claims, was executed and delivered May 21, 1887, and not recorded until April 19, 1889. The former deed was made pursuant to contract dated October 12, 1886, and the latter pursuant to contract dated April 6, 1886, neither of which contracts were recorded.

Mead's contract of April 6, 1886, is as follows:

"April the 6, 1886.

"Know all men by these presents, that I, Samuel Horne, sold this day to Clayton Mead a certain piece or tract of land, lying on Sandy Ridge, in Wise County, Va., say forty or fifty acres, more or less, for which I received of the said Mead a certain black mair for which I am to give the said Mead forty acres of land, the remainder the said Mead is to pay me three dollars per acre, in young cattle; day and date above written.

"Samuel Horne."

The deed from Horn to Mead, with covenant of special warranty, contains a description by courses and distances of 44 acres and 82 poles, taken from an ex parte survey caused to be made by Horn at some time between the date of his above contract with Mead and the date of his deed to him of May 21, 1887.

By the contract of October 12, 1886, which was an "option and coal sale" obtained from Samuel Horn, through one G. W. Bond, to G. V. Litchfield, Horn agreed to grant, bargain, and sell to Litchfield, his heirs and assigns, at the rate of 50 cents per acre, "all the coal lying and being upon and under my farms or tracts of land, containing twelve hundred and seven acres, and situated on Guest's River and Sandy Ridge, in the County of Wise and State of Virginia, being my land and adjoining the lands of one tract N. J. Horn, Wm. Horn and Samuel Counts, one tract D. S. Hoge, J. B. Miller and Widow Gray, one tract N. R. Fuller, D. K. Banner, W. V. Kiser, Hop Richardson, H. G. Kiser, and I. B. Dunn with the right of the said G. V. Litchfield, his heirs and assigns, of entry to mine the said coal with all the usual mining privileges, reserving to myself the fee simple of my said land and the right to mine coal thereon for my own household use, but not for sale."

This contract included the coal on three parcels of land, being the Bruce tract on Guest river, supposed to contain 107 acres, and the two tracts designated and generally known as "Samuel Horn's Sandy Ridge Tract," aggregating a supposed area of 1,250 acres. But when, in pursuance of the contract, Horn and wife came to make the conveyance of April 23, 1887, to Greenway and Warner, trustees, it being found that he did not have the legal title to the Bruce tract of 107 acres, that tract was left out, and his conveyance with general warranty of title embraces "all the coal lying upon and under our farm, containing eleven hundred more or less acres situated on north side of Guest's River and Sandy Ridge on the waters of Big Tom's Creek and the waters of Caney Creek in the County of Wise, State of Virginia, being my land and adjoining the lands of on the 1st tract joins N. J. Horne, Wm. Horne, Sam'l Counts, W. H. Nash, the Sandy Ridge tract joins N. R. Fuller, D. K. Banner, W. V. Kiser, H. Richardson, H. G. Kiser, and I. B. Dunn, with the right of the said Jas. C. Greenway and Jas. C. Warner, Trustees, their heirs and assigns, of entry to mine said coal with all the usual mining privileges; reserving to ourselves the fee simple of the surface of said farm, also all timbers and all other minerals. I have sold the coal only and nothing more," etc. The coal in question underlies the land last described as the "Sandy Ridge tract," adjoining N. R. Fuller and others named.

It is conceded that the contract between Samuel Horn and Clayton Mead of April 6, 1886, is void for uncertainty in the description of the land referred to, and it must also be conceded that, if the deed from Samuel Horn to Greenway and Warner, trustees, of April 23, 1887, recorded August 25, 1887, was sufficient in description to include the coal upon and under the 44 acres and 82 poles of land claimed by Clayton Mead, the legal title thereto was no longer in Samuel Horn, and could not have been acquired by Mead by his deed of May 21, 1887, not recorded until April 19, 1889. A decision of the case must therefore turn upon whether or not the deed to Greenway and Warner, trustees, is sufficiently clear in the description of the premises conveyed to embrace the coal in question.

There is nothing whatever upon the face of the deed to indicate an intention on the part of Samuel Horn, the grantor, to exclude this coal from the operation and effect of the conveyance, while by its very terms, as we have seen, it conveys with general warranty of title all the coal lying upon and under the lands of the grantor known as the "Sandy Ridge Tract," adjoining N. R. Fuller, D. K. Banner, W. V. Kiser, H. Richardson, H. G. Kiser, and I. B. Dunn, with all the usual mining privileges, reserving to the grantor only the fee simple of the surface of the land and coal for home use. It is true that the description by adjoining owners is not a complete description of the en-the lands upon and under which the grantor, Samuel Horn, conveys the coal, with the usual mining privileges to the grantees, Greenway and Warner, trustees, but from a plat of the "Properties and Leases on Sandy Ridge," verified by the signatures of counsel for the parties to this suit, made a part of the record, the description by adjoining landowners is all-sufficient to include the 44 acres and 32 poles of land (the Mead land), under which lies the coal in question. This land adjoins, as the plat shows and as the deed states, the lands of H. Richardson and W. V. Kiser, and while, if it be excluded, the Sandy Ridge tract would still adjoin these parties, it is the more rational view, we think, that, if it was not intended to convey the coal on the Mead land, he would have been named as an adjoining landowner, as well as H. Richardson and W. V. Kiser. A grantor in a deed will not be allowed to change the effect of his conveyance by a statement that he did not intend to include this or that parcel of land in his conveyance, which intention on his part was not made known to his grantee at the time and acquiesced in by the latter. The conveyance in this case is of the coal upon and under the grantor's lands in Wise county, known generally at that time and for 20 years prior as his "Sandy Ridge Tract," the boundaries of which, so far as necessary to embrace the coal upon and under the 44 acres and 32 poles of the Sandy Ridge tract, which Clayton Mead claims to have purchased of the same grantor under a mere parol agreement. The evidence in the case sustains unmistakably this construction of the conveyance. 2 Devlin on Deeds, § 1012; Minor's Insts. vol. 2, p. 1071.

The doctrine laid down in Chapman v. Chapman, 91 Va. 401, 21 S. E. 813, 50 Am. St. Rep. 846, cannot be invoked by the defendant in error, as the facts upon which the doctrine that "actual, notorious, and exclusive possession of land takes the place of the recordation of the instrument of title" was vested in that case upon a very different state of facts from the case here. There the possession was actual, notorious, exclusive, unambiguous, and unequivocal, of a definite tract of land. The equitable owner, though he had received no deed, had paid all the purchase money and been in the possession of a definite tract of land for more than 15 years, and the trustees, who claimed to be bona fide purchasers for value, without notice, knew of said possession, and one of them had knowledge of the interest that the party in possession had in the land. Here Mead had not paid all his purchase money. He had purchased no definite boundary, his contract calling for "a certain piece of land lying on Sandy Ridge, in Wise county, Virginia, say forty or fifty acres," out of a boundary generally known as the "Samuel Horn's Sandy Ridge Farm" of a thousand acres or more. The general location of the land referred to in their agreement may have been understood between Horn and Mead, but the acreage and boundary lines thereof had not been determined. The ex parte survey, heretofore referred to, which Horn had made in 1886, was not accepted by Mead, so far as the record shows, until his deed of May 21, 1887, was taken, and there is not the slightest proof that Greenway and Warner, trustees, or G. V. Litchfield, or G. W. Bond, who obtained the contract from Samuel Horn of October 12, 1886, had knowledge of Mead's purchase or possession of any part of Horn's Sandy Ridge land. Nor does it appear that either of these parties had such knowledge when the deed from Samuel Horn to Greenway and Warner, trustees, of April 23, 1887, was executed and delivered; nor does it appear that Mead's possession was in any sense notorious, but rather the contrary, as G. W. Bond and W. A. Carico, who for years had lived within $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 miles of Mead, had never heard of it. Prior to Mead's contract from Horn he lived on the H. Richardson tract, near the dividing line between Richardson and Horn, and the only acts of ownership done by Mead are these: During the spring or early summer of 1886 he cleared about one acre on the Horn land within 25 yards of the cabin in which he lived on the adjoining land of H. Richardson, at a point that years before had been cleared, but which had again grown up in brush and timber, some of the trees on it being as much as a foot in diameter. In July or August of 1886 he planted turnips on about one-half of the land thus cleared, and between the 1st and 15th of July of the same year he rented the remainder, about one-half acre, to Franklin Horn (son of Samuel Horn), who planted millet, under a verbal agreement that Mead was to have one-third of the crop as rent for the land, but, as the crop failed, Mead received no rent. Some brush from this clearing was put around the cleared ground for the purpose of inclosing it, and made an indifferent fence. Prior to September 22, 1886, Mead made a further clearing on the Horn boundary for a house site, and prior to that date felled on or near the site some house logs or timber for building a cabin, which logs or timber remained where felled till Mead's one-room log cabin was built, the building of which did not begin till after October 12, 1886, and was not nearly enough completed for him to move into until the early summer of 1887, subsequent to the deed from Horn to Greenway and Warner, trustees, of April 23, 1887.

It is argued that W. V. Kiser, who lived on adjoining land, had the impression from the clearing of this house site and the felled timber near the same, independently of any other information, that some one intended to put up a log structure of some kind at that place, and he had been told by Mead, in advance, of the purpose for which the timber was being felled; but, if the agreed statement as to what Kiser would have stated had he been formally examined as a witness be given the broadest interpretation, it would not warrant the conclusion that the acts of Mead upon the land were to be considered as acts of ownership, since they could as well have been regarded as the acts of a tenant or lessee of the land.

If it were conceded that it was competent for Samuel Horn to testify as to how he arrived at the acreage called for in his deed to Greenway and Warner, trustees, and that he deducted from the acreage called for in his title papers 43 acres, as being the acreage of the boundary he had theretofore sold to Mead, the statement would be entitled to no weight in this controversy, as Horn knew at the time that the Mead land contained 44 acres and 32 poles by his ex parte survey, which he carefully kept from the knowledge of Bond when he contracted with him to convey all the coal on his Sandy Ridge tract to Litchfield or his assigns, and also kept from Greenway and Warner, trustees, knowledge of his sale to Mead when he made the deed to them pursuant to his contract with Litchfield. He admits that he has no recollection of telling Litchfield about the deduction of the acreage of the Mead land, and the agreed facts are conclusive that no mention of this was made when the deed to Greenway and Warner, trustees, was executed and delivered. Mead admits that at the time he took his deed he had heard that Horn had sold his coal under his Sandy Ridge lands to the interest represented by G. W. Bond, but did not know the names in which the contract and deed were taken, or that it was claimed that the deed included all coal under the tract he himself had purchased. Considered in connection with this admission of Mead, and the further fact that he took a deed from Horn with only a covenant of special warranty, it is quite significant that when Mead came to convey the coal on the land claimed by him to Ross, trustee, through whom defendant in error claims, he also conveyed with only the covenant of special warranty.

We have gone thus into a consideration of the material facts in the case, not in recognition of the doctrine contended for that a plaintiff in an action of ejectment may recover upon an equitable title or on an equitable estoppel against the defendant, but to show that, if the doctrine prevailed in this state, the evidence of the delivery of the possession to Mead of the land upon and under which the coal in question lies and of his acts of ownership thereon is not sufficient to entitle defendant in error to recover in this action, since it could not be deemed sufficient to induce a court of equity to decree specific performance, which is the test in those jurisdictions in which the doctrine is recognized. Whatever may be the rights of the defendant in error as the successor in title to any rights Clayton Mead may have had under his contract with Samuel Horn—as to which we express no opinion—it cannot recover in this action without the legal title to the coal in question. In a large number, if not the majority, of the states of the Union, and in all of them where not changed by statute, the rule, subject to a few exceptions, is that a plaintiff cannot recover in ejectment without the legal title. The principal exception to this general rule is where the plaintiff is in the possession of the land from which he is ousted under circumstances from which the jury may infer a conveyance of the legal title.

In a note to Carter v. Ruddy (166 U. S. 493, 17 Sup. Ct. 640, 41 L. Ed. 1090) 4 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 161, it is said: "The action of ejectment being purely a common-law remedy, and ejectment on an equitable title being a mere substitute for a bill of specific performance, therefore governed by equitable principles, it follows that in such an action the legal title must prevail wherever the incidents of the action remain as at common law; and consequently no recovery can be had in an action of ejectment on a purely equitable title, without express statutory authority in those states in which the common-law and equity systems of jurisprudence are kept distinct."

Among the numerous authorities cited in the note are Suttle v. E. F. & P. R. R. Co., 76 Va. 284; Nelson v. Triplett, 81 Va. 236; and Jennings v. Gravely, 92 Va. 377, 23 S. E. 763. See, also, Russell v. Allmond, 92 Va. 484, 23 S. E. 895.

The opinion in Carter v. Ruddy, supra, citing Langdon v. Sherwood, 124 U. S. 74, 8 Sup. Ct. 429, 31 L. Ed. 344, and Johnson v. Christian, 128 U. S. 374, 9 Sup. Ct. 87, 32 L. Ed. 412, says: "It is well settled that an action of ejectment cannot be maintained in the courts of the United States on a merely equitable title."

In Jennings v. Gravely, supra, Keith, P., reviews section 2741 and other sections of the Code of 1887, as well as the decisions by this court on the subject, and says: "The plaintiff may come into court upon an absolutely perfect equitable title, but will lose his case if the defendant can show an outstanding legal title in himself or a stranger, except in a few cases dependent upon certain technical principles."

In that case the defendant sought to set up, under section 2741 of the Code of 1887, an equitable title in defense to the right of the plaintiffs, shown to be the holders of the legal title to the land in question. And in Suttle v. E. F. & P. R. R. Co., supra, the plaintiff came into a court of law in an action of ejectment, basing his right of recovery upon an equitable estoppel, and lost his case because he was unable to show a legal title in himself, and a present right of possession under it at the time of the commencement of the action. In Jennings v.

Gravely, supra, the opinion further points out clearly that the enactment of the statute, now section 2741 of the Code of 1887, was dictated not by a general, but by a restrictive policy, and could not be availed of, even by a defendant in an action of ejectment, in but a few classes of cases, which were selected and confined within narrow limits by careful and cautious provisions; and quotes from the opinion of Staples, J., in Suttle v. R. F. & P. R. R. Co., supra, as follows: "The provisions of the statute * * * require that there shall be written evidence of the contract; that the vendee shall have fully complied with all of its terms, so that he would be entitled to the conveyance of the legal title without any condition imposed. * * * If, as now claimed, the holder of an equitable title may maintain or defend in ejectment, if a party in that action may rely upon a mere equitable estoppel in pais—the statutes cited are altogether unnecessary, and this court has utterly misapprehended the grounds upon which they were enacted."

We are of opinion that all evidence considered by the lower court relative to an alleged superior equity in the defendant in error as the successor of Clayton Mead in title to the coal in question was irrelevant, and should have been excluded, and that upon the relevant testimony contained in the agreed statement of facts and the exhibits therewith the case is clearly with the plaintiff in error. The judgment of the circuit court will therefore be reversed and annulled, and this court will enter such judgment as that court should have entered.

RICHMOND STANDARD STEEL SPIKE &
IRON CO. v. CHESTERFIELD COAL CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 4, 1904.)

PLEADING—CONTRACTS—VARIANCE—TRIAL —OFFERS TO PROVE.

1. Where a plea alleged a contract between plaintiff and defendant whereby defendant was to buy from plaintiff all its coal for one year from the date thereof, and by the terms of which plaintiff was to furnish defendant two car loads of coal a week during the prescribed period, which defendant was to pay for at a certain rate, a contract which stipulated that plaintiff was to ship the coal in such quantities and at such times as the defendant should direct varied materially from that pleaded, and was properly excluded when offered in evidence, irrespective of any question as to its validity under the statute of frauds.

2. Defendant pleaded a contract between itself and plaintiff whereby plaintiff was to deliver coal at specified times and for a certain rate, and offered in evidence a contract varying from that pleaded in respect to the times of shipment. Its admission was objected to by plaintiff on the ground of variance and on other grounds, whereupon defendant stated that the contract offered was only a part of the contract really made between the parties, and that it was incomplete on its face, in showing a want of date, and offered to show all the facts which led to the making thereof, in order that the want of date might be shown, and its true meaning explained. Held, that the contract was properly excluded, as the variance between it and that pleaded was not as to its date, but as to other matters, and the admission of evidence showing the correct date of the writing would not obviate the objection on the ground of variance.

Error to Corporation Court of Manchester.

Action by the Chesterfield Coal Company against the Richmond Standard Steel Spike & Iron Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

William L. Royall, for plaintiff in error.
Wm. Crump Tucker and Coke & Pickrell, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. The Chesterfield Coal Company instituted its action of assumpsit to recover the sum of $233.56 for coal sold and delivered to the Richmond Standard Steel Spike & Iron Company. The defendant appeared, and issue was joined upon the plea of non assumpsit, and a special plea filed under section 3299 of the Code of 1887. Upon the trial there was a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed in the declaration, for which the court rendered judgment, after overruling the defendant's motion to set aside the verdict because contrary to the law and the evidence.

To sustain the issue on its part, the defendant offered to introduce in evidence a writing which it stated was the contract relied on in its pleading. Objection was made to its introduction, which the court sustained, and refused to allow it to go in evidence.

The writing, the circumstances under which it was offered, the objection made to its introduction in evidence, appear from bills of exception numbered 1, 2, and 3, which are as follows:

Bill of Exception No. 1.

"Be it remembered that upon the trial of this cause, and after defendant had introduced as witnesses Meriwether Jones, who had completed his testimony, and J. T. Jewett, who was then being examined in chief, as set out in bill of exceptions No. 10 herein, which is hereby referred to and made a part hereof, the defendant, after asking said witness the sixth question set out in bill of exception No. 10, offered in evidence a certain letter from John S. Lear & Co. to J. C. Diminny, dated November 6, 1901, which letter the court admitted in evidence, with the provision that if the agency was not established the jury would be instructed to disregard it, whereupon the plaintiff moved the court to exclude said letter until the defendant had introduced in evidence the contract on which it relied, whereupon defendant's counsel offered in evidence a certain contract, which is in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Agreement entered into this 20th day of May, 1902, by and between the Chesterfield Coal Co. of New York, N. Y., of the first part, and Richmond Standard Steel Spike & Iron Co., of Richmond, Va., of the second part. Witnesseth:

"That the party of the first part agrees and binds itself to furnish and deliver to the party of the second part, on board cars at Winterpock, Va., all of the Clover Hill R. O. M. coal, same quality as sample sent us, they may need from the date hereof until May 31, 1903, approximating a quantity of 2,500 (more or less) tons, and to ship the same in such quantities and at such times as the party of the second part may, from time to time, direct, during the continuation of this contract, and at the following prices per ton, 2,240 pounds, viz.: $2.00 f. o. b. mines.

"Two dollars.

"The party of the second part agrees to buy from the party of the first part all of the Clover Hill R. O. M. coal it may need during the period hereinbefore specified, and to pay therefor to the party of the first part, at the price set forth above, on or before the 15th day of each calendar month for all shipments made during the previous month. All settlements to be made on railway scale weights as ascertained by initial lines and as shown on bills to be rendered by the party of the first part, in accordance with the usages of the coal trade.

"Deliveries of coal under this contract are subject to strikes, accidents, interruptions to transportation, and other causes beyond the control of the party of the first part, which may delay or prevent shipment.

"When such interruptions to deliveries occur, no deficit shall be made up after the time limit noted above in this agreement, except it be mutually agreed so to do by both parties to this agreement.

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto have set their hands this ____ day of ____, 190-. Chesterfield Coal Co. Richmond Standard Steel Spike & Iron Co., by Corbin Warwick, Vice-Pres. and Gen. Mgr.'

—To the introduction of which said contract the plaintiff objected, and moved the court to exclude the same under the circumstances and for the reasons appearing in the transcript of the evidence set out in bill of exceptions No. 10, which motion the court sustained, and excluded said contract from the evidence herein; to which ruling of the court sustaining said motion and excluding said contract the defendant, by counsel, excepted, and tenders to the court this, his first bill of exception, which he prays may be signed, sealed, and made a part of the record, which is accordingly done."

Bill of Exception No. 2.

"Be it remembered that upon the trial of this cause, and after defendant had introduced as witnesses Meriwether Jones and

J. T. Jewett, and while J. T. Jewett was being examined in chief as set out in bill of exception No. 10 herein, which is hereby referred to and made a part hereof, the defendant, by counsel, propounded to said witness a certain question, numbered 36 in his testimony as set out in said bill of exceptions No. 10, as follows:

"Please tell me what Mr. Warwick's orders were?"

—Which was objected to by plaintiff, whereupon counsel for the defendant stated to the court that he had stated all along that the written contract which he showed to the court was only a part of the contract really made between the parties; that that contract was on its face incomplete, in showing the want of a date; that he was then attempting to show all the facts which led to the making of the agreement, of which the writing is only a part evidence, in order that its want of a date may be shown, and its true meaning explained; which objection the court sustained, and refused to allow said question to be propounded to and answered by said witness, to which ruling of the court the defendant excepted, and tenders to the court this, its second bill of exceptions, which it prays may be signed, sealed, and made a part of the record, which is accordingly done."

Bill of Exception No. 3.

"Be it remembered that upon the trial of this cause, and after defendant had introduced as witnesses Meriwether Jones, who had completed his testimony, and J. T. Jewett, who was then being examined in chief, as set out in bill of exception No. 10 herein, which is hereby referred to and made a part hereof, the defendant, by counsel, after asking said witness the forty-fifth question, as set out in his testimony in said bill of exception No. 10, to which witness had replied, 'The Chesterfield Coal Company,' offered in evidence a certain written paper, dated May 20, 1902, signed by the Richmond Standard Steel Spike & Iron Company, by Corbin Warwick, vice president and general manager, and which is the same paper set out at large in bill of exception No. 1 herein; to the introduction of which said written paper in evidence the plaintiff objected, which objection the court sustained, and refused to allow said written paper to be introduced in evidence, to which ruling of the court the defendant excepted, and tenders to the court this, its third bill of exception, which it prays may be signed, sealed, and made a part of the record, which is accordingly done."

Bill of exception No. 10, to which the foregoing bills of exception refer, contains the following questions, answers, and objections, which throw some light upon the circumstances under which the writing was offered, the objections to its introduction in evidence, and the rulings of the court:

"Mr. Crump: I move to reject that letter and all testimony of this character until the Standard Steel Spike & Iron Company have offered to prove the contract on which it relies.

"Mr. Royall: This is the beginning of my proof now.

"Mr. Crump: I ask the court to ask the witness, or the counsel, whether that contract is not in writing; and, if it is, I object to this oral testimony.

"Mr. Royall: The contract is in writing, but I want to prove that the witness was the agent in making the contract.

"Mr. Crump: I object to any oral testimony until that contract is tendered in evidence, in order that it may be inspected by the court and counsel, and be seen if oral testimony is admissible.

"Mr. Royall: I will offer in evidence the contract relied upon in the pleading in this case.

"Mr. Crump: I object to it for three reasons: First, it is not described in the pleading. If the contract is the paper intended to be relied upon, there is a variance between the pleading and the proof. In the next place, it is unquestionably within the statute of frauds—a contract for one year and nine days on its face. And in the next place, because it is a contract made by a corporation that had no right to make it or tender it.

"35th Q. Now, Mr. Jewett, had you, prior to writing that letter, come to an understanding with Mr. Warwick about his (Warwick's) buying coal from Mr. Dinlany?

"A. Well, I had taken his orders.

"36th Q. Please tell me what Mr. Warwick's orders were?

"Mr. Crump: I object on two grounds: First, that the court has been assured by the counsel that the contract which was described in the pleading, and which was the basis of this action, and which was to be relied on in proof, was in writing, and that contract has been tendered in evidence and been exhibited to the court and been rejected, because of the contention of counsel that the written contract upon which the defendant at bar stated he rested his case was not properly described in the plea, and was, moreover, on its face, within the statute of frauds. On that ground I object to any oral testimony concerning the contract mentioned in the letter just read, which was stated before at the bar of the court by counsel for defendant to be the contract which he has tendered in evidence, and which has been rejected.

"Mr. Royall: Defendant's counsel replies that he has stated all along to the court that the written contract which he showed to the court is only a part of the contract really made between the parties; that that contract is on its face incomplete, in showing its want of date; and defendant's counsel is now undertaking to show all of the facts which led to the making of the agreement between the parties, of which that writing is only a part evidence, in order that the want of date may be shown, and the true meaning may be explained.

"The Court: I shall sustain the objection. You will have to stand on the contract.

"38th Q. Did you put any agreement between you and Warwick in respect to the sale by you of the Chesterfield Coal Company's coal, and the purchase by Warwick of the Chesterfield Coal Company's coal? Did you put any such agreement into writing and send it to Warwick?

"A. There was no correspondence between Mr. Warwick and ourselves at all.

"39th. Q. I asked you, did you put any such agreement into writing, and send it to him for his signature?

"A. Yes, sir; we submitted that contract, and begged him to sign—solicited his signature, to be sent on to New York for the approval of the principal.

"40th Q. Look at the paper I now hand you, and say whether that is the agreement which you sent to Warwick?

"A. This is a carbon copy of the contract submitted to Mr. Warwick.

"By Mr. Royall: I now offer in evidence a paper signed by the Richmond Standard Steel Spike & Iron Company, by Corbin Warwick, vice president and general manager, purporting to be a contract between the Chesterfield Coal Company and the Richmond Standard Steel, Spike & Iron Company, described in its beginning as an 'Agreement entered into this 20th day of May, 1902,' and concluding as follows: 'In testimony whereof, the parties hereto have set their hands this — day of —, 19—,' the same being an agreement by which the Chesterfield Coal Company was to sell the Standard Steel Spike & Iron Company certain coal, and the Standard Steel Spike & Iron Company was to purchase same from the Chesterfield Coal Company, and being the same paper referred to in fortieth question above.

"The Court: The court rejects the paper, and states that it has already rejected the paper heretofore.

"By Mr. Crump: Counsel for plaintiff moves the court to exclude this paper, and not admit it in evidence, on the ground that it is obnoxious to the statute of frauds; and being the same paper as to which counsel for the defendant has made the statement that it is the paper described in the plea, and relied upon as the basis for this suit, it constitutes a variance between the pleading and proof. And defendant's counsel then and there excepted to said ruling and action of the court."

The special plea, after stating the circumstances under which the contract was entered into, sets forth its terms as follows:

"After this, plaintiff resumed its solicitations that defendant should buy its coal from it; and defendant, explaining to plaintiff the press of orders in its mill, entered into a contract with plaintiff in the month of May, 1902, to buy from plaintiff all of the coal for one year from the date of said contract that it should use in said year in its said furnaces, which is the only contract that was made between the plaintiff and defendant, and plaintiff's claim against defendant grows out of that contract. By the terms of this contract, plaintiff was to furnish defendant two car loads of its coal each week during the period of one year from the date of the same, of same quality as that supplied in the three car loads above described that defendant had used; and defendant was to pay plaintiff for same at the rate of $2 per ton of 2,240 pounds, free on board of cars at the mines; and plaintiff was to send to defendant each week two car loads of said coal, which defendant was to pay for at said rate; and defendant was to pay the freight on same from said mines to defendant's mill."

The court refused to allow the contract set out in the writing to be introduced in evidence upon two grounds: First, because it varied materially from the contract set up in the special plea; and, second, because it was an agreement not to be performed within a year, and was not signed by the party to be charged. Code 1887, § 2840.

If there was a variance between the contract offered in evidence and that set up in the plea, it is wholly immaterial whether or not it was within the statute of frauds (as to which we express no opinion), so far as its admissibility in evidence was concerned, for neither an oral nor a written contract is admissible in evidence when there is a material variance between it and the contract set up in the pleadings, if objected to.

That there is material variance between the contract set up in the plea and that which was sought to be proved at the trial by the introduction of the rejected writing is clear. This we do not understand defendant's counsel to controvert, but his contention is that the court had no right to pass upon the question of variance until he had introduced all his evidence, since he was compelled by the court, at the instance of the plaintiff, to offer the writing in evidence when he did, although he insisted at that time that "it is an incomplete paper, and that it will be necessary for the court to consider much other matter in order that it may find out from it all what the contract between the parties is."

It is true, the defendant's counsel did not offer the writing in evidence until objection was made that, if the contract relied on was in writing, oral evidence as to the contents was not admissible; but, as soon as that objection was made, counsel for defendant declared that the contract relied on in the pleading was in writing, and offered the writing in evidence of his own motion. When objection was made to a question asked one of the defendant's witnesses and sustained by the court, as disclosed by bill of exceptions No. 2, counsel for defendant stated to the court that he had stated "all along to the court that the written contract which he showed to the court is only a part of the contract really made between the parties; that that contract is on its face incomplete, in showing its want of a date; and defendant's counsel is now undertaking to show all of the facts which led to the making of the agreement between the parties, of which that writing is only a part evidence, in order that the want of date may be shown, and the true meaning may be explained." In that statement counsel only claims that the written contract offered in evidence was incomplete in one respect, and that was as to its date. There is no claim that the writing offered in evidence and rejected by the court did not contain the terms of the contract between the parties, except its date. The variance between the contract set out in the writing and the contract set up in the plea was not as to its date, but as to other matters, so that, if the court had allowed evidence to be introduced to show that the correct date of the writing was other than that which it bore, it would not have cured the objection made to its admissibility by reason of the variance.

When the court held that there was a material variance between the contract set up in the plea and that contained in the writing, the defendant might have asked leave to amend his plea, under section 3384 of the Code of 1887, which provides that if, at the trial of any action, there appears to be a variance between the evidence and the allegations or recitals, the court, if it consider that substantial justice will be promoted, and that the opposite party cannot be prejudiced thereby, may allow the pleadings to be amended on such terms as to the payment of costs or postponement of the trial, or both, as it may deem reasonable, or, instead of the pleadings being amended, the court may direct the jury to find the facts, and, after such finding, if it consider the variance such as could not have prejudiced the opposite party, shall give judgment according to the right of the case. But no such motion was made then or at any time during the trial.

There being a material variance between the contract sought to be proved and that set out in the plea, and no motion being made to amend the plea so as to conform its averments to the proof, or to otherwise take advantage of the provisions of section 3384 of the Code of 1887, the court did not err in excluding such evidence.

The court having rightly refused to allow a contract to be proved different from that set up in the plea, there was no error in its other rulings, set out in bills of exception 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, refusing to allow evidence to be introduced tending to prove that there was such a contract, and the damages that resulted from its breach.

Upon the evidence before the jury, which is set out in bill of exceptions No. 10, the verdict is clearly right, and the court did not err in refusing to set it aside and grant a new trial.

We are of opinion that the judgment must be affirmed.

STATE v. BIGGS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 18, 1903.)

PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS—PRACTICE WITHOUT LICENSE—CRIME—STATUTE—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—POLICE POWER—MASSAGE AND PHYSICAL CULTURE.

1. An act passed in the supposed interest of a state medical society, limiting the practice of medicine and surgery, will be construed most strongly against the society.

2. Act 1903, p. 1074, c. 697, amending Code, § 3122, designating who are eligible to practice medicine and surgery, provides that, for the purpose of the act, the expression "practice of medicine or surgery" shall be held to mean "the management for fee or reward of any case of disease, physical or mental, real or imaginary, with or without drugs, surgical operation, surgical or mechanical appliances, or by any other method whatsoever," and excepts only midwives, nurses, and persons who minister to or cure the sick or suffering by prayer. Held, that the act does not confer and is not intended solely to confer protection on the public, but attempts to confer a monopoly on the method of treatment of disease by doctors of medicine or surgeons, and is violative of Const. art. 1, § 31, prohibiting monopolies.

3. Patients have a right to use methods of treatment requiring less skill and learning on the part of the practitioner than is requisite to constitute a doctor of medicine or a surgeon, and a legislative act which attempts to deprive them of such right is not warranted by any legitimate exercise of the police power.

4. Defendant was prosecuted for unlawfully practicing medicine and surgery, and the branches thereof, for fee or reward, without a license. The proof showed that the acts he was convicted of doing were administering massage baths, physical culture, manipulating muscles, bone, spine, and solar plexus, and advising his patients as to diet. The proof also showed that he did all those things without prescriptions being given to the patients, or any drugs or surgery used, that he charged and received fees therefor, and had no license. Held, that there is nothing in such treatment that calls for the exercise of the police power, and defendant could not be punished under a law, passed by virtue of the police power, prohibiting such treatment by unlicensed persons.

Appeal from Superior Court, Guilford County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

Andrew C. Biggs was convicted of unlawfully practicing medicine and surgery, and appeals. Reversed.

C. M. Stedman and E. J. Justice, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

46 S.E.—26

CLARK, C. J. The defendant is indicted on a charge that he "did unlawfully and willfully begin, engage in, and continue the practice of medicine and surgery, and the branches thereof, for fee or reward, without having obtained a license so to do from the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of North Carolina." Upon the facts found, the court was of opinion that the defendant was guilty. The defendant appealed from the judgment imposed.

The special verdict found that the defendant advertised himself as a "nonmedical physician"; that he held himself out to the public to cure disease by a "system of drugless healing, and treats patients by said system without medicine, claiming not to cure by faith"; that he advertises to cure by natural methods, without medicine or surgery. The only acts that he is found by the verdict to have performed are that "he administers massage baths and physical culture, manipulates the muscles, bones, spine, and solar plexus, and kneads the muscles with the fingers of the hand; he writes no prescriptions as to diet, but advises his patients what to eat and what not to eat; all the above treatment is administered to the exclusion of drugs." It was admitted that the defendant was not licensed by the State Medical Board, and claims no exemption, under the provisions of the act of 1903, as a nurse, or midwife, nor as one curing by prayer; and then there is the important finding that "the defendant charges a fee or reward for his services," and has treated patients by the above treatment, and received payment therefor, since the passage of chapter 697, p. 1074, Laws 1903, "To Define the Practice of Medicine and Surgery."

Section 3124 of the Code requires that every person who applies for license to practice "medicine or surgery or any of the branches thereof" shall stand an examination in "anatomy, physiology, surgery, pathology, medical hygiene, chemistry, pharmacy, materia medica, therapeutics, obstetrics and the practice of medicine." There was added by section 2, c. 117, p. 180, Laws 1885, the following provision: "And any person who shall begin the practice of medicine or surgery in this state for fee or reward, after the passage of this act, without first having obtained license from said Board of Examiners [meaning the State Board of Medical Examiners] shall not be entitled to sue for or recover before any court any medical bill for services rendered in the practice of medicine or surgery or any of the branches thereof, but shall also be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $25, nor more than one hundred dollars or imprisoned at the discretion of the court for each and every offense."

The constitutionality of this last act has been vigorously assailed in the courts, on the ground that every one had an "inalienable right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness," as our great Declaration phrases it, and that by that guaranty it is the right of every one to earn his livelihood by pursuing any calling or vocation not unlawful, and that to place his liberty to do so within the power of a committee chosen by those already pursuing any given calling would be to infringe upon section 7 of article 1 of our state Constitution, which forbids exclusive privileges and emoluments to any set of men, and section 31 of the same article, which prohibits "monopolies and perpetuities." Of late years there has been added the argument that such act is also obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits any state "to deny to any person the equal protection of the law." There was undeniably great force in the argument on that side. The lawmaking power slowly, in this state and in others, yielded to the view that it could or should pass such act. In 1858-59 (Acts 1858-59, p. 356, c. 258) it first incorporated "The State Medical Society," and authorized the above examination, and prohibited any one to practice medicine or surgery or prescribe for the cure of diseases, for fee or reward, without such license, but was careful to add a proviso that no one who should practice without such license should be guilty of a misdemeanor, the only penalty being that if he practiced on credit he could not recover his fees in the courts. The law remained thus till the above recited act passed in 1885, and which was made prospective. The constitutionality of this last statute was fully considered, and after a most able argument against it by counsel was sustained by this court, but not without great hesitation, and upon the ground solely that the act was "an exercise of the police power for the protection of the public against incompetents and impostors, and in no sense the creation of a monopoly or special privilege." State v. Call, 121 N. C. 646, 28 S. E. 517. If the object of the act could be construed as intended to give special and exclusive privileges to a special body of men, and not solely and in truth for the protection of the public, the Legislature was prohibited by the Constitution from enacting it, nor could the Legislature restrict the cure of the body to the practice of "medicine and surgery," or establish any state system of healing. State v. McKnight, 131 N. C. 723, 42 S. E. 580, 59 L. R. A. 187. After these decisions, moderation and wisdom would have suggested that the matter rest. Those who wish to be treated by practitioners of medicine and surgery had the guaranty that such practitioners had been duly examined and found competent by a board of gentlemen eminent in that high and honorable profession, and those who had faith in treatment by methods not included in the "practice of medicine and surgery," as usually understood, had reserved to them the right to practice their faith and be treated, if they chose, by those who openly and avowedly did not use either surgery or drugs in the treatment of diseases. The courts have declared that they possessed this right, and that the Legislature could not, under the Constitution, restrict all healing to any one school of thought or practice. What is "the practice of medicine and surgery" is as well understood, and its limits, as the practice of dentistry. The courts have also held that of the many schools of "medicine and surgery" the Legislature could not prescribe that any one was orthodox and the others heterodox, but that those professing the different systems—"allopathic," "homeopathic," "Thompsonian," and the like—should be examined upon a course such as is taught in the best colleges of that school of practice, but that it is not essential that a member of each, or of any special school, should be upon the Board of Examiners.

At the last session of the General Assembly the following act (Act 1903, p. 1074, c. 697) was passed amendatory of section 3122 of the Code: "For the purpose of this act the expression 'practice of medicine and surgery' shall be construed to mean the management for fee or reward of any case of disease, physical or mental, real or imaginary, with or without drugs, surgical operation, surgical or mechanical appliances, or by any other method whatsoever; provided that this shall not apply to midwives nor to nurses; provided further that applicants not belonging to the regular school of medicine shall not be required to stand an examination except upon the branches taught in their regular colleges, to-wit, the osteopaths shall be examined only upon descriptive anatomy, general chemistry, histology, physiology, urinalysis, and toxicology, hygiene, regional anatomy, pathology, neurology, surgery, applied anatomy, bacteriology, gynecology, obstetrics and physical diagnosis; provided this act shall not apply to any person who ministers to or cures the sick or suffering by prayer to Almighty God, without the use of any drug or material means."

Chief Justice Pearson, in McAden v. Jenkins, 64 N. C. 801, noted, as of common knowledge, and reiterated in Railroad v. Jenkins, 63 N. C. 506, that railroad charters are drafted by "promoters," and hence should be construed most strongly against the grantees and in the interest of the public. The same construction can fairly be applied to this act amendatory of the charter of this corporation, in whose supposed interests it was evidently drafted, and not solely in the interest of the public. Under the guise of "construction" of those well-understood terms, the "practice of medicine and surgery," the act essays to provide that the expression "'practice of medicine and surgery' shall be construed to mean the management 'for fee or reward' of any case of disease, physical or mental, real or imaginary, with or without drugs, surgical operation, surgical or mechanical appliances, or by any other method whatsoever." That is, the practice of surgery and medicine shall mean practice without surgery or medicine, if a fee is charged. If no fee is charged, then the words "surgery and medicine" drop back to their usual and ordinary meaning, as by long usage known and accustomed. Where, then, is the protection to the public, if such treatment is valid when done without fee or reward? Yet, unless the act confers, and is intended solely to confer, protection upon the public, it is invalid. The Legislature cannot forbid one man to practice a calling or profession for the benefit or profit of another.

Again, the act means more than its friends probably intended, for it says, "any case of disease, physical or mental, real or imaginary." Is not a disease of the eye physical, and is not a disease of the ear, or of the teeth, or a headache, or a corn, physical? Then every dentist and aurist and oculist is indictable unless he has also license from the State Medical Society as an M. D., as is also every corn doctor who relieves aching feet, and every peripatetic of stentorian lungs on the courthouse square who banishes headache, real or imaginary, by rubbing his hands over some credulous brow. He, too, must be an M. D. Then there is the closing expression, forbidding treatment "for fee or reward" by other than an M. D. "by any other method whatsoever." This would take in all the old women and the herb doctors, who, without pretending to be professional nurses, relieve much human suffering, "real or imaginary," for a small compensation. Then it is forbidden to relieve a case of suffering, "physical or mental," in any method unless one is an M. D. It is not even admissible to "minister to a mind diseased" in any method, or even dissipate an attack of the "blues," without that label, duly certified. Is not this creating a monopoly, and the worst of monopolies, that diseases shall not be cured or alleviated, whether real or imaginary, mental or physical, though without medicine or surgery, "if for a fee," unless one has undergone an examination on "anatomy, physiology, surgery, pathology, medical hygiene, chemistry, pharmacy, materia medica, therapeutics, obstetrics and the practice of medicine?" Such examination is eminently proper for one who holds himself out as an M. D., and those who wish to employ an M. D. should certainly have the guaranty that is given by his license that the M. D. is competent. But how about those who are too poor, or too ignorant, or too perverse, to wish that kind of treatment? Is it requisite that the man who treats a diseased ear shall really be competent in obstetrics, or that it is a penalty to treat a disease of the eye unless the operator understands chemistry, or that it is indictable in this state to remove corns or to plug teeth without full knowledge of the materia medica, or to banish headache by the application of the hands without having passed a satisfactory examination on anatomy, or to apply a fomentation without being able to "pass up" on therapeutics, or to sell a little herb tea for the stomach ache without being scientifically versed in pathology and physiology? The act is too sweeping. Besides, the Legislature could no more enact that the "practice of medicine and surgery" shall mean "practice without medicine and surgery" than it could provide that "two and two make five," because it cannot change a physical fact. And when it forbade all treatment of all diseases, mental or physical, without surgery or medicine, or by any other method, for a fee or reward, except by an M. D., it attempted to confer a monopoly on that method of treatment, and this is forbidden by the Constitution.

Our early legislation naturally gave physicians no special privileges, but it was directed solely to fixing a limitation upon their charges and providing penalties for malpractice. Were a monopoly of all treatment of diseases conferred upon M. D.'s, it would necessarily follow that the Legislature would have to prescribe their scale of charges again. That matter could not, with due regard to the public interest, be left to a monopoly.

Those not M. D.'s contend that the allopathic system of practice is contrary to the discoveries of science and injurious to the public. Some M. D.'s doubtless believe that all treatment of disease, except by their own system, is quackery. Is this point to be decided by the M. D.'s themselves, through an examining committee of five of their own number, or is the public the tribunal to decide, by employing whom each man prefers, whether allopath, homeopath, osteopath, or the defendant? The law says that the M. D.'s may examine and certify whether an applicant is competent to be one of their number, and no one can practice medicine and surgery without it; but they cannot decide for mankind that their own system of healing is now and ever shall be the only correct one, and that all others are to be repressed by the strong arm of the law. This act admits Christian Scientists to practice to cure diseases without such examination. By what process of reasoning can massage, baths, and the defendant be excluded? In the cure of bodies, as in the cure of souls, "orthodoxy is my doxy, heterodoxy is the other man's doxy," as Bishop Warburton well says. This is a free country, and any man has a right to be treated by any system he chooses. The law cannot decide that any one system shall be the system he shall use. If he gets improper treatment for children or others under his care, whereby they are injured, he is liable to punishment; but whether it was proper treatment or not is a matter of fact, to be settled by a jury of his peers, and not a matter of law, to be decided by a judge, nor prescribed beforehand by an act of the Legislature.

The practice of medicine and surgery, in the usual and ordinary meaning of that term, is of the highest antiquity and dignity. In the Code of Hammurabi, King of Babylon, 15 centuries older than the Code of Moses, and which, engraved on a column of black diorite, was but recently dug up at Susa, in ancient Elam, there are found (sections 215-225) regulations of the medical profession, fixing a scale of fees, and penalties for malpractice. Physicians are mentioned in both the Old and New Testaments. Jeremiah asks, "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?" The public have a right to know that those holding themselves out as members of that ancient and honorable profession are competent, and duly licensed as such. The Legislature can exert its police power to that end, because it is a profession whose practice requires the highest skill and learning. But there are methods of treatment which do not require much skill and learning, if any. Patients have a right to use such methods if they wish, and the attempt to require an examination of the character above recited for the application of such treatment is not warranted by any legitimate exercise of the police power. The effect would be to prohibit to those, who wish it those cheap and simple remedies, and deprive those who practice them of their humble gains, by either giving a monopoly of such remedies to those who have the title M. D., or prohibiting the use of such remedies altogether, neither of which results the Legislature could have contemplated, and both of which are forbidden by the provisions of the Constitution above cited.

In this case the defendant is found guilty of the following acts, and no more: (1) Administering massage baths and physical culture; (2) manipulating muscles, bones, spine, and solar plexus; (3) kneading the muscles with the fingers of the hand; (4) advising his patients what to eat and what not. And all this without prescriptions, without any drugs or surgery. These acts, by the terms of the statute, are harmless and not indictable, "unless done for fee or reward." There is nothing in this treatment that calls for an exercise of the police power by way of an examination by a learned board in obstetrics, therapeutics, materia medica, and the other things, a knowledge of which is so properly required for one who would serve the public faithfully and honorably as a doctor of medicine.

It is not only in the scope of the police power for the state to regulate the "practice of medicine and surgery," and to throw around the public any reasonable protection against unfit members of that honorable profession, and provide against malpractice, but the General Assembly can prohibit any pretended art of healing which is calculated to deceive and injure the public. It is also within its power to protect the public against the ignorant and vicious who profess knowledge and skill in any art or profession of healing in which technical knowledge and learning are required to safely and properly practice it. But it is not found here that the defendant is deceiving and injuring the public, or is ignorant and incompetent, to the detriment of the public, in the application of the methods he uses. It may be that if he were not there some of the patients might call in an M. D., but that is due possibly to the ignorance or perversity of the patients, who may prefer the defendant's methods and scale of fees. The police power does not extend to such cases. The law is thus stated in Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. pp. 137, 138, 14 Sup. Ct. 501, 38 L. Ed. 885: "The Legislature may not, under the guise of protecting public interests, arbitrarily interfere with private business, or impose unusual or unnecessary restrictions upon lawful occupations. In other words, its determination of what is a proper exercise of its police power is not final or conclusive, but is subject to the supervision of the courts." After citing cases, it is said on page 138, 152 U. S., page 501, 14 Sup. Ct., 38 L. Ed. 885: "In all those cases the acts were held to be invalid as involving an unnecessary invasion of the rights of property, and a practical inhibition of certain occupations, harmless in themselves, and which might be carried on without detriment to the public interests." See, also, State v. Pendergrass, 106 N. C. 667, 10 S. E. 1002; Ohio v. Gardner, 58 Ohio St. 599, 51 N. E. 136, 41 L. R. A. 689, 65 Am. St. Rep. 785.

License is required for the practice of pharmacy, of dentistry, of law, and many other skilled professions. We have a state system of law, for the "law is the state," and laws are prescribed by the Legislature; and we also have a state system of education. Yet it is not indictable for one not a lawyer to draw wills, deeds, bills of sale, or any other legal instrument whatever; nor is it made punishable to settle litigation out of court by arbitration or otherwise, without the aid of a lawyer, nor to teach in other than the state schools. Though there are many methods of treating diseases, among which the Legislature is not authorized to select one as the state system, excluding all others, yet this act, if valid, would make it punishable by law to charge a fee for treatment of "any disease, real or imaginary, mental or physical, by any method whatever," unless the party has been admitted by a committee from one school of treatment, upon examination of that system, thus denying mankind any relief from pain and suffering, except at the hands of that particular school of medical thought. It may be, and probably is, the best system. But that is a matter which must be decided by those who seek and must pay for the relief—not by the M. D.'s themselves, nor by the courts. Judges are lawyers, and are not competent to decide, except for themselves as individuals, which is the best system of treatment, and those practitioners who eschew medicine and surgery have a right to object to leaving the question whether "medicine and surgery" is the only permissible method of treatment to be decided by the practitioners of that method.

The defendant is not charged nor shown to be an osteopath, and disclaims being one.

His learned counsel contends that Acts 1903, p. 1074, c. 697, is further unconstitutional because of the following (quoted from his brief): "There is no provision for the examination of any but allopaths and osteopaths. It provides that all persons, except midwives, nurses, and those who profess to heal by prayer, who minister to the sick for fee or reward, 'by any other method whatsoever,' shall be construed to be practicing medicine or surgery, and then follows this language: 'provided further that applicants not belonging to the regular school of medicine shall not be required to stand an examination except upon the branches taught in their regular colleges, to-wit, the osteopaths shall be examined only upon descriptive anatomy, general chemistry, histology, physiology, urinalysis and toxicology, hygiene, regional anatomy, pathology, neurology, surgery, applied anatomy, bacteriology, gynecology, obstetrics and physical diagnosis.' The osteopath is required to stand an examination in surgery and every other branch that those belonging to the regular school of medicine are required to be examined in, except pharmacy, materia medica, therapeutics, and the practice of medicine, and, in addition, he is required to stand an examination in branches that the regular medical student is not required to be examined on, as follows: 'histology, urinalysis and toxicology, regional anatomy, neurology, bacteriology, gynecology and physical diagnosis.' But it is remarkable that he is not required to pass examination in the branches that his profession recognizes and teaches to be of special importance in the practice of osteopathy, such as principles of osteopathy, osteopathic manipulations, and osteopathic diagnosis." As his client is not an osteopath, we are not called upon in this case to pass upon the alleged discrimination against osteopaths in the prescribed course of study. But if it be objected that we have only shown that the defendant's practice did not call for the examination required, as above set out, for an allopath, it may be as well to say that the acts of which he was convicted of doing "for a fee," to-wit, using massage baths, physical culture, manipulating muscles, bone, spine, and solar plexus, and advising his patients as to diet, could be done as safely to the public, so far as shown, without an examination on "histology, urinalysis and toxicology, bacteriology, neurology, and gynecology," which are some of the things added to the course by the aforesaid act, for the comfort and convenience of those wishing to obtain license to practice osteopathy, and, of course, only to protect the public against incompetents in that line of practice.

It is possible, however, that an expert knowledge of gynecology is not essential in administering baths, and there is room for serious doubt whether bacteriology and toxicology are connected with massage in any way. The term "practice of medicine and surgery" embraces probably the larger, and certainly by far the most profitable, part of the "treatment of diseases," but is not coextensive with the latter term, and cannot be made so, unless "surgery and medicine" are adopted as the state system of treatment—a monopoly—and all other methods are made indictable. On the other hand, the State Medical Society would hardly wish to broaden out so as to take in all methods of treatment of diseases, for this would be to take in practitioners and practices which they would not wish to recognize. All the law so far has done or can do is to require that those practicing on the sick with knife and drugs shall be examined and found competent by those "of like faith and order." Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in an address before the Medical Society in Massachusetts, said: "If the whole materia medica was sunk to the bottom of the sea, it would be all the better for mankind and all the worse for the fishes." An eminent medical authority in this state has said that out of 24 serious cases of disease, 3 could not be cured by the best remedies, 3 others might be benefited, and the rest would get well anyway. Stronger statements could be cited from the most eminent medical authorities the world has known. Medicine is an experimental, not an exact, science. All the law can do is to regulate and safeguard the use of powerful and dangerous remedies, like the knife and drugs, but it cannot forbid dispensing with them. When the Master, who was himself called the Good Physician, was told that other than his followers were casting out devils and curing diseases, he said, "Forbid them not."

Upon the special verdict, the defendant should be adjudged not guilty. Reversed.

WALKER and CONNOR, JJ., concur in result.

(119 Ga. 389)

EAGLE & PHENIX MILLS v. HERRON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1904.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYE—PETITION—SUFFICIENCY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A petition for damages which charges negligence on the part of the "defendant, its servants or agents," is not subject to demurrer on the ground that this allegation is equivocal and ambiguous, in that it charges negligence against either the defendant or its servants or its agents; the evident and unmistakable intention of the language and of the whole petition being to charge negligence against the defendant, acting through the medium of its servants or agents.

2. It is not error for the trial judge, in charging the jury, to summarize the pleadings, and instruct them that "that makes the issue that you are sworn and impaneled to pass upon," without further charging them upon a theory of defense not set up in the defendant's plea, and upon which a charge is not requested by counsel, and is not demanded by the evidence.

3. It was not cause for a new trial that the judge read in charge to the jury a Code section, part of which was applicable to the case under consideration, and part not; it not appearing that the reading of the inapplicable part was calculated to mislead the jury, erroneously affected their verdict, or was prejudicial to the rights of the complaining party.

4. Where the defendant (a cotton mill company) in an action for damages on account of injuries alleged to have been sustained by reason of the operation of a defective pulley on one of its machines admitted "that there was a small piece of the rim broken off on the side [of the pulley] next the machine," but denied "that the pulley was thereby made defective," it was not error for the court, in charging the jury, to refer to the break as a defect; they being expressly instructed that the plaintiff could not recover unless this break or defect caused the injuries sued for.

5. It was not error, after charging that, regardless of whether the defendant was negligent or not, if the plaintiff, a child, could have avoided his injuries by the use of such care as his mental and physical capacity fitted him for exercising, he could not recover, for the court to add: "If you believe that the child, * * * in the exercise of all his mental capacity, such as he was possessed of at the time, did not know that the same was dangerous, and the accident happened by reason of this defect in the pulley, then he would be entitled to recover."

6. There was no error in any charge complained of in the motion which is not herein specifically considered; the requests to charge, so far as legal and pertinent, were fully covered by the charge as given; and the evidence warranted the verdict, which was not excessive.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by William F. Herron, by his next friend, against the Eagle & Phenix Mills. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Goetchins & Chappell, for plaintiff in error.
Hatcher & Carson, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This was an action by an employé of a cotton mill company to recover damages on account of personal injuries sustained in the discharge of his duties, and alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the employer. The plaintiff was a minor, 12 years old, and sued by his mother, as next friend. From his petition it appears that he was employed by the defendant in the capacity of "alley boy"; his duties being to look after a number of carding machines, and to keep the lint from accumulating around and under them, so as to prevent their becoming clogged. At stated times he was required to get down under the machines and clean them, and it was while so doing that his injuries were received. He alleged that, in order for him to clean the machines, it was necessary for him to get down on the floor in a very small space between the machine and a wooden box, or conveyer, which was situated just in front of it, and that his undivided attention to the work in hand was required to prevent his fingers from being caught in the machinery. Under and parallel with the box before mentioned, and immediately in front of the machines, was certain shafting, attached to which was a pulley, and when the machine was in operation a leather belt extended from the pulley on the shafting to another pulley attached to the machine. In stopping the machine to permit of its being cleaned, it was customary "to slip the belt off the pulley attached to the carding machine, when the pulley to the shafting would continue in motion, and would turn in the loose leather belt aforesaid." While cleaning the machine, on account of the small space in which it was necessary for him to get, the plaintiff's feet and legs extended "near to and in proximity with the said revolving shafting and pulley." It was alleged that, while the plaintiff was engaged in cleaning one of the machines, "the leather belt having been slipped off the pulley of the carding machine, and it being stopped so as to enable petitioner to clean it off with his hands, the leather belt wrapped around shafting near the floor, and caught the foot of petitioner in it, and caused his leg and foot to wrap around said shafting, and broke his leg and foot, which necessitated the amputation of one foot between the ankle and knee." The petition charged that the injuries were due to the negligence of the defendant, in that the pulley attached to the shafting was defective and dangerous, having on its surface a triangular broken place, which tended to, and did, cause the belt to catch and wind around the shafting; that this defect had existed for a considerable time, and was, or ought to have been, known to the defendant, its servants or agents, but could not have been discovered by the plaintiff in the exercise of ordinary care, because it was kept in motion, and while so moving was covered by the belt, which concealed it from view. It was also charged that the defendant was negligent "in allowing the loose belt, when removed from the carding machine, to dangle and lie on the floor when the pulley on the shafting was in motion, as was the custom, and as plaintiff was directed to let it do," and in putting the plaintiff, a child 12 years old, at work with the machine in its broken condition, without warning him of the danger to which he was exposed. The defendant demurred generally and specially. Its demurrer was overruled, and it excepted pendente lite. The jury found for the plaintiff $5,000, and the defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. The bill of exceptions to this court assigns error upon the overruling of the demurrer and of the motion for a new trial.

1. There can be no doubt that the petition was good as against a general demurrer, and we do not think it fairly subject to the attack made upon it by the special demurrer. The ground that the petition does not charge that the defendant, or any one whose knowledge is chargeable to it, knew of, or had reason to know of, the alleged defect in the shafting pulley, is not well taken, in view of the distinct allegation "that said broken place in said pulley had existed for some time, and was known to defendant, its servants or agents, or ought to have been known." The demurrer does not make the point that the petition fails to set out which of the defendant's agents or servants were responsible for the alleged defect, or were guilty of negligence in failing to have it repaired; but stress is laid upon the contention that the allegation of negligence on the part of "defendant, its servants or agents," is equivocal and ambiguous, in that it charges negligence against either the defendant or its servants or its agents, without definitely alleging that any particular person or persons was or were guilty of negligence. It is true that pleadings are to be construed most strongly against the pleader; and it is also true that, taking the words "defendant, its servants or agents," alone, they might be given an entirely disjunctive meaning. In other words, the ellipsis marked by the comma after the word "defendant" may be supplied by the word "or," instead of the word "and." But the rule of strict construction of pleadings is one of law, and not of grammar; and where it is plainly evident that a petitioner intends to charge negligence against a defendant corporation through the medium of its servants or agents (by whom alone it can do any act), that rule does not require that his words shall be grammatically distorted into a meaning which was far from the pleader's mind, and which, under the circumstances, is unwarranted. The cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error on this point have, in our opinion, no application to the case now under consideration. In all of them the use of the word "or" gave to the language employed a distinct disjunctive meaning, which rendered it open to the attack made on it; and, if it be conceded that in the present case the plaintiff intended to use the words in the meaning sought to be placed upon them by counsel for the defendant, there is no doubt that the demurrer should be sustained. What we hold, however, is that the allegation that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the negligence of "defendant, its servants or agents," does not mean that either the defendant or its servants or its agents was at fault, but that the negligent acts complained of were done by the defendant, acting through its agents or servants. As against the demurrer filed, the allegations of negligence in the petition are set forth with sufficient particularity to enable the defendant to prepare its defense, and we find no reason for reversing the judgment on this ground.

2. In his charge to the jury, the trial judge, after summarizing the allegations of the plaintiff's petition, said: "To this declaration the defendant comes into court, and denies every material allegation set forth in the petition of the plaintiff, and says that the plaintiff was hurt by his own carelessness; and that makes the issue that you are sworn and impaneled to pass upon." Error is assigned upon this charge, because "It excluded the issue, supported by proof, that the plaintiff was hurt by 'unavoidable accident,' and nowhere else is the error cured by submitting to the jury whether said hurt was the result of unavoidable accident." An examination of the defendant's answer fails to disclose any reference to this theory as a defense to the suit. For the most part, the plea was a categorical admission or denial of the allegations of the petition; the concluding paragraph being "that, if plaintiff was injured and damaged by the accident as claimed in said petition, the same was the result of his own carelessness and negligence, and without any fault on the part of this defendant." In charging the jury as before indicated, the court was simply outlining the issues made by the pleadings, and, as will have been seen, this was accurately done. It does not appear that counsel for the defendant made any request for a charge on the subject of unavoidable accident, and, as the evidence introduced did not demand such a charge, the failure to give it will not be cause for a new trial.

3. In charging the jury as to the duty of a master to his servant, the court read section 2611 of the Civil Code of 1895 in its entirety. The motion complains that the first clause of the section in question, to wit, "The master is bound to exercise ordinary care in the selection of servants, and not to retain them after knowledge of incompetency," was inapplicable to this case, and should not have been given, and error is assigned on the charge for that reason. It is true that there was not involved in this case any question as to the diligence or negligence of the master in the selection or retention of its servants, and it would, perhaps, have been best if the clause quoted had been omitted from the charge. It is not made to appear, however, in what way, if any, this charge injuriously affected the rights of the defendant company; and it is difficult to conceive that the jury were misled or in any way influenced by it, or that it could have affected the verdict. The refusal to grant a new trial on this ground will not, therefore, work a reversal of the judgment.

4. Complaint is also made that the court erred in using the following language in charging the jury: "It is admitted and stated by the defendant that there was a slight defect in this pulley, to wit, that there was a slight break in the edge of the same; but they deny that the injury was caused by reason of this defect;" and: "The plaintiff must show in this particular case that the injury was caused by this defect in the machinery, to wit, this break in the pulley." The objection urged against this charge is that while the defendant, in its answer, admitted that there was a break in the pulley, it denied that this break constituted a defect; and it is urged that the charge was error, in that it assumed as true an assertion that was expressly controverted, viz., that the pulley was defective. What constitutes a defect, in machinery as in men, is not always easy to determine. Ordinarily a pulley with a piece broken out of it would be considered defective to the extent that it fails to come up to the standard of a perfect pulley, just as a one-armed man or one with a besetting sin is considered defective in failing to measure up to physical or moral standards of human perfection. If a pulley with a small piece broken out of it is not defective, then why not make them all with pieces broken out, and effect a saving in raw material? A pulley with a piece broken out of it may nevertheless be capable of good service, in the same way that a man may be a highly useful member of society in spite of a physical affliction or a moral weakness; but, as a matter of terminology, is it not still a defective pulley? The real question was whether the break in the pulley—call it a "defect," or what you will—was responsible for the plaintiff's injuries; and this question the trial judge fairly and ably presented to the jury.

5. The court, after charging the jury that if the plaintiff, in the exercise of such care as his mental and physical capacity fitted him for exercising in the actual circumstances under investigation, could have avoided the injury, he would not be entitled to recover, regardless of whether or not the defendant was negligent, added the following qualification: "If you believe that the child, or the plaintiff in this particular case, in the exercise of all his mental capacity, such as he was possessed of at the time, did not know that the same was dangerous, and the accident happened by reason of this defect in the pulley, then he would be entitled to recover. How this is, it is for you to say, and not for the court." We see no error in this qualification. It can certainly make no difference if, as contended by counsel, it is an independent proposition of law under the name of a proviso, so long as it is a correct one; and the objection that the judge failed, in this qualifying charge, to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not recover if his injuries were caused by his own negligence, is met by the fact that this proposition was fully announced in the original charge, to which the "proviso" was added.

6. The foregoing disposes of every contention made by the motion for a new trial which, in our opinion, merits extended discussion. It was not error to qualify a charge to the effect that the defendant would not be liable for injuries due to a defect in its machinery if it used ordinary care in selecting such machinery, by a proviso that it did not know of the defect which caused the injury. Of the two requests to charge set out in the motion, one was unsound and was properly refused, while the other was fully covered by the charge as given. The evidence was in many respects conflicting, but the conflicts were reconciled by the jury, whose duty it is to pass upon disputed issues of fact, in favor of the plaintiff. We need hardly add that a verdict for $5,000 damages for injuries to a twelve year old boy, resulting in the loss of his leg, and in his being thus maimed and crippled for life, was not excessive.

KESSLER v. STATE.

DISORDERLY HOUSE—LEASING—PRINCIPALS—EVIDENCE.

1. One who owns or controls a house, and leases it to another for the purpose of keeping a lewd house, or who rents it to another knowing that it is to be used for this purpose, or, after having leased the house, knowingly permits the occupant to use it for the practice of fornication or adultery, maintains and keeps a lewd house, and is indictable under the provisions of Pen. Code, § 391. The offense being a misdemeanor, all concerned in the perpetration are indictable as principals.

2. The evidence authorized the verdict, and no reason has been shown for reversing the judgment refusing a new trial.

Code, § 391, which declares that "if any person shall maintain and keep a lewd house, or place for the practice of fornication or adultery, either by himself or others, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," is but a codification of the common law. To sustain an indictment under the section just quoted it is necessary to show only that the accused contributed to or aided, directly or indirectly, in maintaining and keeping a lewd house. Clifton v. State, 53 Ga. 241. One placing another in possession of a house for the purpose of being used for lewd purposes, or giving possession with knowledge that it is to be so used, directly aids him who is thus placed in possession in the unlawful enterprise by him therein carried on, and is liable to indictment as the keeper of a lewd house, under the provisions of Pen. Code, § 391. As the offense is a misdemeanor, all persons aiding, directly or indirectly, in its perpetration, are indictable as principals; and it is upon this principle of the common law that the numerous authorities holding that the owner or controller of GAMMAGE v. STATE.

FALSE SWEARING—INDICTMENT.

1. An indictment for the statutory offense of false swearing, in that the accused falsely swore, in an affidavit to a specified account, that the person against whom the account was made out was indebted to him the amount of the same, need not allege that the affidavit was material, nor that it was made for the purpose of influencing or misleading any one, or under circumstances that would influence or mislead any one.

T. C. Gammage was convicted of false swearing, and brings error. Affirmed.

Jos. W. & Jno. D. Humphries, for plaintiff in error. O. D. Hill, Sol. Gen., for the State.

FISH, P. J. T. C. Gammage was indicted for the statutory offense of false swearing. Upon the overruling of his demurrer to the indictment, he excepted. The part of the indictment material to be considered in deciding the questions made in the record charge that the accused on September 22, 1902, willfully, knowingly, absolutely, and falsely swore in an affidavit made before S. H. Landrum, a justice of the peace in and for Fulton county, that one J. B. Thompson was indebted to the accused in the sum of $16.40 on an itemized account set out in the indictment. The demurrer to the indictment was: "(1) Because it is not alleged that said affidavit was in any way material to said account. (2) Because it is not alleged that said affidavit was in any manner whatever material. (3) Because it is not alleged that said affidavit was made with any purpose whatever to influence or mislead any one whatever, nor under any circumstances that would influence or mislead any one."

Perjury consists "in willfully, knowingly, absolutely, and falsely swearing, * * * or affirming, in a matter material to the issue or point in question, in some judicial proceeding, by a person to whom a lawful oath or affirmation is administered." Pen. Code 1895, § 256. False swearing consists "in willfully, knowingly, absolutely, and falsely swearing, * * * or affirming, in any matter or thing (other than a judicial proceeding) by a person to whom a lawful oath or affirmation is administered." Pen. Code 1895, § 258. The Legislature evidently intended, in this latter section, to make false swearing penal where it would not be punishable as perjury under the common-law or statutory definitions of that offense. In perjury the false oath must be "in a matter material to the issue or point in question, in some judicial proceeding," while a false oath "in any matter or thing (other than a judicial proceeding)" will constitute the offense of false swearing, when made by a person to whom a lawful oath or affirmation is administered. It is manifest that the materiality of the oath does not constitute an essential element of the latter offense, and therefore it need not be alleged. Nor is it necessary to allege that the purpose of the oath was to influence or mislead any one, or that it was made under circumstances that would influence or mislead any one. The indictment substantially followed the section of the Penal Code defining false swearing, and, we think, it was good against the demurrer filed thereto, but whether or not the indictment is subject to other exception is not now determined. The present ruling goes only to the extent of holding that the points made in the demurrer were not well taken.

ECHOLS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. It is error to charge the jury as to a state of facts not authorized by the evidence.

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

J. M. Echols was convicted of crime, and brings error. Reversed.

Robt. McMillan and J. B. Jones, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Charters, Sol. Gen., for the State.

SIMMONS, C. J. An indictment was found against Echols for adultery and fornication. He was convicted, and his motion for a new trial was overruled. He excepted.

One of the grounds of the motion complained of the following charge of the court: "If a man goes to [a brothel] and remains there for some time alone with a common prostitute in a room, it might be considered by you as sufficient proof of the crime." One complaint of this charge was that there was no evidence upon which to base it. After a careful study of the evidence contained in the record, we find that the complaint is well founded. While the evidence showed that the accused frequently visited the house of the woman with whom he was charged with having had illegal intercourse, and that the reputation of the house was bad, there was no evidence that the accused was ever alone in the house with her, or that they were ever in the same room of that house. We think, therefore, that it was error for the judge to assume the state of facts set out in his charge when the same could, at most, be arrived at only by an inference by the jury. In view of the evidence that the accused had frequently visited the house, the charge complained of was calculated to injure the case of the accused before the jury.

BROWN et al. v. BOWMAN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Dec. 10, 1903.)
CONTRACT—SUBSEQUENT CONSIDERATION—ACTION FOR BREACH—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

1. Though a promise may be a nudum pactum when made because the promisee is not bound, it becomes binding when he subsequently furnishes the consideration contemplated by doing what he was expected to do. Accordingly, where, by a written agreement, the owner of a designated tract of land gave to another the exclusive right to prospect for gold thereon, and agreed to give a half interest in all the gold he might locate and develop, "with all rights of mining and mineral privileges, wood, water, and right of way," and the latter, at considerable expense and much labor in sinking shafts, etc., located and developed gold on the land, he was entitled to a half interest in the same, and, if the owner afterwards sold the land to an innocent purchaser, the party locating and developing the gold had a right of action against the owner for half the value thereof.

2. Where, in an action brought in such a case by the promisee against the owner of the land to recover one-half of the gold so located and developed, the petition failed to allege the value of such gold, it was not erroneous to sustain a demurrer upon a special ground thereof attacking the petition for this defect therein.

(a) In view of the fact that the demurrer was both general and special, and was expressly sustained upon all the grounds thereof, and the probability that, if the judge had intimated or announced his intention to sustain this special ground, the plaintiffs would have prevented a dismissal of their petition by offering a proper amendment thereto, and the further fact that the petition presents a meritorious case, the judgment is affirmed, with direction that the plaintiffs be allowed to amend the petition, in the respect above indicated, before the judgment of this court is made the judgment of the court below.

Error from Superior Court, Paulding County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by B. W. Brown and others against L. N. Bowman. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

H. F. Sharpe and Rowell, Copeland & Rowell, for plaintiffs in error. W. E. Spinks, John W. Akin, and R. R. Arnold, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. 1. Bowman's agreement, which appears in the foregoing statement of facts, was evidently without consideration when made, as Brown and Taylor at that time neither did nor agreed to do anything. It was therefore, when made, unenforceable for want of mutuality. When, however, Brown and Taylor within a reasonable time, and in the absence of any revocation of the agreement by Bowman, by much labor and considerable expense, as the petition alleged, located and developed gold in the land in question, they did the very thing they were expected to do, and thereby furnished the contemplated consideration, which changed the nudum pactum into a valid and binding contract. "A contract is often such that, until something is done under it, the consideration is imperfect; yet a partial performance, or a complete performance on one side, supplies the defect. If, for example, one promises another, who makes no promise in return, to pay him money when he shall have done a specified thing, if he does it, not only is the contract executed on one side, but also the consideration is perfected, and payment can be enforced. And, in more general terms, when from any cause the party from whom the consideration moves is not compellable to render it, if he does render it, the contract becomes thereby perfected." Bishop, Contracts, § 87. To the same effect, see Parsons on Contracts, *451; Clark on Contracts, pp. 169, 170; Story on Contracts, § 569; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 115. In Hammond on Contracts, p. 683, it is said: "The test of mutuality is to be applied, not as of the time when the promises are made, but as of the time when one or the other is sought to be enforced. A promise may be unenforceable for want of mutuality when made, and yet the promisee may render it valid and binding by supplying a consideration on his part before the promise is withdrawn." This doctrine is well settled by many adjudged cases cited by the above-named text-writers, and has been fully recognized by this court. Sivell v. Hogan (this day decided) 46 S. E. 67, and cases therein cited.

Counsel for defendant in error cite Peacock v. Deweese, 73 Ga. 570; Grizzle v. Gaddis, 75 Ga. 350; Lindsay v. Warnock, 93 Ga. 619, 21 S. E. 127; Morrow v. Southern Express Co., 101 Ga. 810, 28 S. E. 998; Perry v. Paschal, 103 Ga. 134, 29 S. E. 703; and Marietta Paper Co. v. Bussey, 104 Ga. 477, 31 S. E. 415—but nothing was decided in any of these cases in conflict with the principle above announced. The contract in Peacock v. Deweese was purely unilateral when made, and it was not even claimed that the promisee did anything afterwards which furnished a consideration. Under the facts the court held that a specific performance could not be decreed in behalf of the promisee. It was held in Grizzle v. Gaddis that: "A parol contract, by which it was agreed that, if a man and his family would take possession of certain land, and cultivate and improve it, they should have it as their home during the lives of himself and wife, paying therefor a reasonable rent, and that if, at any time after paying such rent from time to time, he should become able to purchase, the owner would convey to him a title for such price or sum as it was then worth, was too vague, uncertain, and wanting in mutuality to furnish a foundation for a decree for a specific performance requiring a conveyance from the other party to the contract, or one who purchased from him with notice." There the insufficiency of the contract resulted more from its vagueness and uncertainty than from its lack of mutuality. See remarks of Mr. Justice Cobb in Perry v. Paschal, 103 Ga. 139, 29 S. E. 703. The facts in Lindsay v. Warnock were very similar to those in the present case, and the decision there made is really in line with the well-settled rule as stated in the text-books to which we have hereinbefore referred. It was held in that case: "Where, by a written contract, the owner of a tract of land stipulated to convey to the other contracting party a half interest in all the minerals that the latter might find, open, and develop to the extent that it will justify the employ of labor, with timber and water for mining purposes, the other party stipulating in the writing to prospect the land within a specified time at his own expense, and the latter having complied with this stipulation, and discovered, opened, and developed a mineral of unknown name, but of sufficient value to justify the employment of labor in mining the same, equity will, at his instance, compel the former to specifically execute his contract to convey in accordance with its terms. There was no want of mutuality in the terms of the contract as set forth in the writing, and the failure to sign the writing by the party who performed his undertaking is of no consequence after full performance on his part." In Morrow v. Southern Express Co., the agreement was entirely without consideration, and Mr. Justice Little, who delivered the opinion, said: "There are instances in which a promise, though a mere nudum pactum when made, because the promisee is not bound, may become binding on him afterwards, furnishing the consideration contemplated." Nor does the case of Perry v. Paschal help the defendant in error, for it was there held: "Where one by written agreement binds himself to convey to another a designated tract of land upon the payment of a sum stated, and by the same agreement likewise undertakes to extend the time of payment to a definite time in the future, and the vendee upon his part undertakes to pay a certain sum annually by way of rent for the immediate use of the premises, the vendee has the election at any time to tender the full amount of the purchase money, with interest, and then to demand a conveyance; and, a continuing tender being made by him in accordance with the terms of the contract, the right of the vendor to demand rent thenceforth ceases." In Marietta Paper Co. v. Bussey the ruling was only as to the allowance of an amendment, and the case is not in point. Counsel for defendant in error further contend that the agreement was merely a license, a gratuitous privilege granted by Bowman to Brown and Taylor to make a certain use of Bowman's land, and that, as there was no consideration for such license, it was recoverable at any time. Granting that the written instrument involved in this case was originally a mere license, revocable at the will of the licensor, still, after the licensees had done the work and gone to the expense contemplated by the agreement, the right of revocation was lost, certainly there could not then be an unconditional revocation. Even a parol license is not revocable after the licensee has executed it, and in doing so has incurred expense. Civ. Code 1895, § 3069. See City Council of Augusta v. Burum, 93 Ga. 68, 19 S. E. 820, 26 L. R. A. 340. After Brown and Taylor had, as alleged in the petition, by much labor, and at considerable expense, located and developed gold in the land, Bowman could not revoke the license, and free himself from liability for one-half of the value of the gold so located and developed. We conclude, therefore, that the petition set forth a good cause of action for the recovery of one-half of the value of the gold which was located and developed in the land by the defendants, and hence the first, second, third, and fourth grounds of the demurrer should not have been sustained.

2. The judgment of the court was not only general, but it expressly sustained the demurrer upon all the grounds taken therein. This judgment must be affirmed, as one of the special grounds of the demurrer was good. That ground was that the petition did not allege the nature, character, and value of the minerals located and developed. The petition did not allege the value of the gold located and developed. It alleged that the plaintiffs "developed and located valuable minerals, including gold," but was silent as to the amount or value of the gold; and the defendant was entitled to be informed what the plaintiffs expected to prove upon this subject. It is true that the petition alleged that by the discovery, location, and development of the valuable minerals the land was increased in value from $100 to $1,500, and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover $750. But the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the value of a one-half interest in the land, nor were they entitled to recover anything for the enhanced value of the land. What they were entitled to recover for was a one-half interest in the value of the gold which they had located and developed. It is apparent that there was no sufficient averment as to the value of the gold. In view of the fact that the trial judge did not base his judgment simply upon this special ground, but expressly placed it upon all the grounds taken in the demurrer, and the probability that, if he had intimated or announced his intention to sustain this special ground, the plaintiffs would have prevented a dismissal of their case by offering a proper amendment; and the further fact that the plaintiffs, by their petition, seem to present a meritorious case—we affirm the judgment, with direction that plaintiffs be allowed to amend the petition before the judgment of this court is made the judgment of the court below.

Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concurring.

JOINER v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSIONS—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF PROSECUTING WIT-NESS—WIFE-BEATING.

1. Evidence of a third party as to statements of a wife that her husband had just beaten her, made in the presence of the husband without denial on his part, and under such circumstances that his silence amounted to an admission, is admissible on the trial of the husband for wife-beating, although the wife declines to testify at the trial against her husband. Knight v. State, 39 S. E. 928, 114 Ga. 48, 88 Am. St. Rep. 17.

2. While it is true that one accused of crime cannot be convicted upon his confessions alone, yet if, on the trial of one charged with wife-beating, it is shown that he and his wife had been together in his house, that the wife had run crying from the house, called a policeman, and showed him a swollen eye, and a bowl of bloody water in which she had bathed her nose, the jury may properly regard this as sufficient corroboration of the husband's confession to show the corpus delicti, and to justify a conviction. COXWELL, Marshal, v. GODDARD.

BUSINESS TAX—EXEMPTIONS—CONFEDERATE SOLDIER.

1. The uncontradicted evidence showed that petitioner was a disabled Confederate soldier, and entitled to an exemption as such; and it was not error to grant an injunction restraining a sale of his personal property levied on under a fi. fa. issued by a municipality for a business tax.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Taylor County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by E. A. Goddard against W. W. Coxwell, marshal. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

On September 12, 1902, Goddard filed an equitable petition, asking for an injunction to restrain Coxwell, marshal of the town of Reynolds, from selling property of the plaintiff under an execution issued against him for the amount of a business tax in said town. Petitioner claims that he was a disabled Confederate soldier, and entitled to do business without having a license, under Pol. Code, § 1642; that in August, 1901, he had been summoned to appear before the mayor of the town to answer for the offense of carrying on his said business in said town for that year without paying the business tax; that he exhibited a certificate showing that he was a disabled Confederate soldier, before the mayor's court, which decided that the certificate was a protection, and discharged petitioner; that the aldermen, knowing of said decision, thereafter had an execution issued, and had Coxwell, the marshal, to levy the same on petitioner's personal property. This petition was sworn to, and used as an affidavit on the hearing. Petitioner also offered in evidence a certificate of the ordinary, dated October 7, 1901, that Coxwell was a Confederate soldier, with an additional certificate thereon, dated March 21, 1902, signed by the ordinary, that the word "disabled" had been originally omitted by mistake on his part. The defendant objected to the admission of the certificate, and assigns error on the ground that the taxes appear to have been for the year 1902; that, if the certificate was a protection, it did not operate as such until after its amendment; and that the amendment was made after the tax accrued. The defendant introduced no testimony, further than its sworn answer, in which it denied the material allegations of the petition. The tax execution and the tax ordinance were not introduced in evidence, and it nowhere appears when the tax execution was issued, nor the date when taxes were required to be paid. The judge granted the injunction.

R. S. Foy, for plaintiff in error. O. M. Colbert and H. P. Wallace, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. The record does not show whether the business tax became due before or after the amendment to the certificate, and there is therefore not enough to enable us to consider the assignment of error based upon its admission as evidence.

Sections 1643-1645 of the Political Code grant to Confederate soldiers over 50 years old, who have resided 8 years in this state, the right to do business without the payment of a tax, provided they first make the oath and obtain the certificate therein required. But the exemption under section 1642 is rooted in the sole fact of the owner of the business being a disabled Confederate soldier, not in the certificate, which is only prima facie evidence of the fact. It appearing from the amended certificate of the ordinary, and also from the allegations in the verified petition, which was offered as evidence, that Goddard was a disabled Confederate soldier, the judge rightly granted the injunction.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

MCCOLLUM v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)
INTOXICATING LIQUORS—SALES TO MINOR—EVIDENCE—SENTENCE—NEW TRIAL.

1. A witness may testify as to his own age, notwithstanding all the information he has upon the subject is derived from his mother, who is living in the county where the trial occurs.

2. An inappropriate charge is not cause for a new trial when it is manifest that the complaining party was not injured thereby.

3. The sentence was not excessive, and, if it were, this would not be cause for a new trial.

4. The evidence authorized the verdict.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Habersham County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

David McCollum was convicted of selling liquor to a minor, and brings error. Affirmed.

Fermor Barrett, for plaintiff in error. W. A. Charters, Sol. Gen., for the State.

FISH, P. J. David McCollum was convicted of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor to a minor—one John D. Ayers. A new trial having been refused, the accused excepted. Upon the trial, in September 1903, Ayers testified that he was 19 years old in the summer of that year; that he purchased the liquor from the accused in the early part of the year 1902, before the bill of indictment was found, in March of that year. He further swore that all that he knew about his age was what his mother told him, and that she was then living in the county where the trial was had. Counsel for the accused moved to rule out the testimony of Ayers as to his age, upon the ground that his mother, who knew the fact and was living in the county, was a competent witness, and what she had told her son in reference to his age was hearsay and inadmissible. The court refused to rule out the testimony, and complaint was made of this ruling in the motion for a new trial. The ruling of the court was not erroneous. It is well settled that a witness may testify as to his own age. Central Railroad v. Coggin, 73 Ga. 689; 1 Greenleaf, Ev. § 430k; Underhill, Crim. Ev. § 342; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 647; 1 Enc. Ev. 735. In Bain v. State, 61 Ala. 75, it was held: "A witness may testify as to his own age, though he states that his knowledge is derived from what his mother told him; and the fact that his mother, who is not shown to be dead, or out of the jurisdiction of the court, was not introduced, does not affect the admissibility of the evidence, though the jury may consider it, with the other circumstances of the case, in determining its credibility." It was held in Cherry v. State, 68 Ala. 29, that "a person may testify to his own age, and his testimony is not rendered inadmissible by his further statements, given as reasons for his testimony as to the fact, 'that his mother told him so; that it was written down in a book which his father had in the courthouse.'" And in Pearce v. Kyzer, 16 Lea (Tenn.) 521, 57 Am. Rep. 240, it was held: "A defendant in a suit, who relies upon the defense of infancy, is a competent witness to prove his own age, and it is no objection to his testimony that he obtained the information as to the year of his birth from his mother, who is living in the county in which the suit is tried." In State v. Cain, 9 W. Va. 559, it was held that it was competent for a witness to testify as to his own age, with a view of proving that he was a minor at the time of a sale of intoxicating liquors to him, notwithstanding there was evidence given to the jury tending to show that his father and mother were living. See, also, People v. Ratz, 115 Cal. 132, 46 Pac. 915. Our Civil Code of 1895 (section 5177) provides: "Pedigree, including descent, relationship, birth, marriage, and death, may be proved either by the declarations of deceased persons related by blood or marriage, or by general repute in the family, or by genealogies, inscriptions, 'family trees,' and similar evidence." This section, however, does not, as contended by the plaintiff in error, render a witness incompetent to testify to his own age, when his father or mother is living and within the jurisdiction of the court. The section, in providing that pedigree, etc., may be proved by the declarations of deceased persons related by blood or marriage, refers to the declarations of third persons, which, according to the authorities, are not admissible unless such persons be dead. See cases above cited.

2. Upon cross-examination, Ayers swore that no one was with him when he bought the liquor from the accused, and that he did not tell the accused, at a given time and place, that one Watson was with him, at the house of the accused, when the liquor was bought, but that he told the accused that he left Watson some two or three hundred yards from the house of the accused when he went to buy the liquor, and that he carried it back to where Watson was, and he and Watson drank it. Watson testified that he was never at the house of the accused with Ayers. The accused, in his statement, said that Ayers told him, at the time and place referred to, that Watson was with him (Ayers) at the time that he bought the liquor. The accused also stated that he never sold Ayers any liquor at any time. The court charged the jury: "If a witness has been impeached in any of the modes known to the law, or in any manner known to the law, it is the duty of the jury to disregard his testimony, unless corroborated in material particulars; and if a witness has been impeached as required by law, so that the jury would disregard his entire testimony, still it is their right and privilege to believe him, if he is corroborated by other testimony in the case—corroborated in material particulars in the case, although impeached. In the motion for a new trial, error was assigned upon this charge, because there was no corroborating evidence to sustain the witness sought to be impeached. The exception to the charge was well taken. Ayers was the only witness for the state, and there was nothing to corroborate his testimony. We do not think, however, that this error of the court was such as to require the grant of a new trial, as it is manifest that the accused was in no way prejudiced by the charge. There was absolutely no evidence which the charge could have misled the jury to consider as corroborating Ayers' testimony, and if, in the minds of the jury, Ayers had been impeached they would, under the instruction given, and in the absence of any corroboration whatever, have disregarded his testimony. It is evident that they did not believe the statement of the accused, for in it he said he had never sold any liquor to Ayers; and, if they had believed that the statement successfully impeached Ayers, they certainly, it seems, would have believed the balance of the statement, that the accused had never sold the liquor as charged, and have acquitted him. It has been frequently held by this court that the statement of the accused is not, strictly speaking, evidence, and it may be doubted if the mere statement of the accused will authorize a charge upon the subject of the impeachment of witnesses. It is perfectly obvious that the testimony of Watson did not even tend to impeach Ayers.

3. The fine imposed by the court upon the accused was $500. Complaint was made in the motion for a new trial that this was excessive. Under the statute the court could have imposed a fine not to exceed $1,000, and a fine within that limit was within the discretion of the trial judge, and is not the subject of review. Baldwin v. State, 75 Ga. 482. Moreover, if it were excessive, this would not be cause for a new trial. Beltinger v. State, 116 Ga. 545, 42 S. E. 747.

4. The evidence fully warranted the verdict, and the court did not err in refusing to grant a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

BENTON v. HUNTER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1904.)
PARTNERSHIP—DISSOLUTION—ACTION AT LAW
—DEMURRER—REMARKS OF COUNSEL
—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. A petition brought by one man against another who had formerly been his partner in business, which proceeds upon the idea that the partnership has been dissolved, its affairs wound up, and an accounting had between its members, and which seeks to recover a sum of money made up partly of an alleged individual indebtedness independent of the partnership relation, and partly of a sum alleged to be due by reason of the existence of the partnership and growing out of its dissolution, the latter sum being in no way affected by any debts due by or to the firm, is not subject to demurrer on the ground that it is a suit at law by one partner against his copartner to recover money due by reason of partnership transactions.

2. Where such a petition sets out the items of the alleged indebtedness sued on, but alleges that, on account of the wrongful failure of the defendant to furnish the plaintiff with the partnership books, a more complete bill of particulars cannot be set forth, there is no merit in a special demurrer based on the failure to set out the details of the items of indebtedness making up the sum for which suit was brought.

3. The jury, after retiring to their room, returned and requested information as to whether, in the event they should find for the defendant, the plaintiff would be barred from suing in equity. Counsel for the plaintiff, in the presence of the jury, requested the court to charge that such a verdict would be a bar to an equitable proceeding. No motion for a mistrial was made by counsel for the defendant, nor does it appear that he requested of the court any specific instructions. Held, that it was not, under such circumstances, error for the court to fail to instruct the jury to disregard the remarks made by counsel for the plaintiff, or to fail to instruct them "that it was their duty to endeavor to find a verdict regardless of whether their verdict would prejudice the case of either party, and regardless of whether either party would or not be barred from suing in a court of equity."

4. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from City Court of Columbus; J. L. Willis, Judge.

Action by G. P. Hunter against J. A. Benton. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. H. Martin and A. W. Cozart, for plaintiff in error. J. E. Chapman, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. This was a suit on open account for $861.10 principal, besides interest, in which the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for $264.22. The defendant brought the case to this court by bill of exceptions, complaining of the overruling of his demurrer to the plaintiff's petition and the refusal to grant his motion for a new trial.

It appears from the petition that prior to the bringing of the suit there had been a partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant, "which was formed on or about February 22, 1899, and was dissolved seventeen months thereafter." The sum sued for was made up of various items set forth in a bill of particulars attached to the petition, some of which seem to relate to partnership transactions, and others not. It was alleged that on the dissolution of the firm all the books and accounts of the partnership became, by agreement, the property of the plaintiff, but that they were "left by petitioner in the possession of said defendant, under an agreement between petitioner and defendant that as petitioner was going out of business, and defendant was to continue in said business, the said books and accounts, the property of petitioner, were to be left in the possession of defendant, who would collect on said books and accounts all the money he could and turn it over to petitioner, after retaining ten per cent. of the amount collected by defendant as his full compensation for making said collections." It was also alleged that "said books are now in the possession of defendant, who now refuses to return them to petitioner," which rendered it impossible for petitioner to give detailed information in regard to several items in the bill of particulars. Subsequently the petition was amended by setting out the dates of some of the transactions out of which it was alleged the indebtedness arose. The demurrer was upon the grounds that no cause of action was set out; that the petition failed to allege that the partnership owed no debts to third persons, or that no debts were due it, or that there were no funds on hand, or that the profits already on hand had been equally divided; that it did not appear from the petition that the partnership was at an end; and that it was not set out when certain of the items of alleged indebtedness accrued. Besides the complaint that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence, the motion for a new trial contained only one ground. From that it appeared that, after the jury had retired to make up their verdict, they returned and asked the court, through their foreman, "to withdraw the case from their consideration, or, if he would not do this, they wanted to know if it would prejudice the plaintiff's right to sue in a court of equity if they found a verdict for the defendant." Counsel for the plaintiff asked the court, in the presence of the jury, to charge that a verdict for the defendant would bar the plaintiff from suing in equity. The court made no reply to this request, but "instructed the jury that it was their duty to make a verdict if they could, and to make no verdict except one authorized by the evidence; but after they had faithfully tried to make a verdict, if they then failed to do so, there was a provision of law for the granting of a mistrial." The assignment of error is that "the court erred in not instructing the jury to disregard the remark of [counsel for the plaintiff], and in not instructing them that it was their duty to endeavor to find a verdict, regardless of whether their verdict would prejudice the case of either party, and regardless of whether either party would or would not be barred from suing in a court of equity."

1. Counsel for the plaintiff in error sought to bring this case within the rule that an action at law will not lie in favor of a partner against his copartner during the continuance of the partnership, and in support of their position the case of Miller v. Freeman, 111 Ga. 654, 36 S. E. 961, 51 L. R. A. 504, is cited. It is true that "it is a general rule that an action at law will not lie in favor of one or more partners or their representatives against one or more copartners or their representatives upon a demand growing out of a partnership transaction until there has been a settlement of accounts and a balance struck." 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1005. The petition in the present case, however, proceeds upon the idea that all partnership relations between the plaintiff and the defendant have come to an end, that a balance has been struck, and that an indebtedness is due by the defendant to the plaintiff which cannot be affected by any transactions between the partnership and its creditors or debtors. Strictly speaking, it is not an action by a member of a firm against his copartner, but an action by one man against another who had formerly been his partner, upon an indebtedness a part of which grew out of the formerly existing partnership between them. "The reason most frequently assigned for the rule under consideration rests upon the principle that one cannot be both a plaintiff and a defendant in the same suit, either singly or with others;" but "the objection to the maintenance of this class of actions between partners lies deeper than any mere question of procedure or forms of action. The real reason for the rule is found in the inherent nature of the partnership relation, and consists simply in the fact that prior to an accounting and settlement of the partnership affairs no cause of action exists between partners founded solely upon partnership dealings." 15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 1011, 1015. And in 2 Bates, Part. § 878, it is said: "The real test is not solely whether the action can be tried without going into the partnership accounts, but whether the defendant has bound himself personally to the plaintiff." Applying the reasoning of the authorities quoted to the case now under consideration, it is quite clear that as to this ground the demurrer was properly overruled. The partnership had been dissolved, and upon the dissolution, according to the petition, a fixed and definite liability arose from the defendant to the plaintiff. As to the matters involved in the suit the partnership relation had ceased, and that of debtor and creditor begun. We do not lose sight of the distinction sought to be drawn by counsel for the plaintiff in error between a dissolution of the partnership and a final winding up of its affairs; but such a distinction can in no way affect the merits of this case, because, under the allegations of the petition, each item of the attached bill of particulars was a personal obligation due by the defendant to the plaintiff, which could in no event be affected by any debts which the partnership might owe. On the general subject which we have been discussing, see Goodson v. Oooley, 19 Ga. 599; Pool v. Perdue, 44 Ga. 454 (6); Wadley v. Jones, 55 Ga. 329 (5).

2. It is equally clear that there is no merit in those grounds of the demurrer which attack the petition because of the failure to allege circumstantial details as to some of the transactions out of which the suit grew. Some of these details were supplied by amendment to the petition, others were not necessary to support the petition, and as to others still a valid reason for not setting them out was shown in the wrongful failure of the defendant to allow the plaintiff access to the records containing the information desired.

3. The ground of the amendment to the motion for a new trial, to which reference was had in a preceding portion of this opinion, discloses no error on the part of the trial judge. The request of the jury that the case be withdrawn from their consideration, and their desire for information as to the effect upon the plaintiff's right to sue in equity of a possible verdict for the defendant, were, it must be admitted, most extraordinary. No motion was made for a mistrial, however, and the court did all that well could be done under the circumstances, viz., instructed the jury to return to their room and find the truth of the case as shown by the evidence. We cannot understand by what rule of law or ethics the request made by counsel for the plaintiff, that the court charge the jury that a verdict for the defendant would bar his client's right to sue in equity, can be considered an improper remark; and certainly, in the absence of a request by opposing counsel for specific instructions on the subject, it cannot be said that it was error for the court to fail to charge as indicated in the motion for a new trial.

4. There is no merit in the contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error that the verdict was not sustained by the evidence. It may be conceded, as claimed, that the proof did not correspond with the allegations of the petition as to the nature of some of the transactions between the former partners, and still the verdict would stand, because a portion of the amount sued for was alleged and proven to have been an individual indebtedness, entirely independent of any partnership relations between the plaintiff and the defendant, and the amount of the verdict returned was less than a single item of this individual indebtedness. We see no reason why the verdict should have been set aside.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

PEOPLE'S BANK OF TALBOTTON v. EXCHANGE BANK OF MACON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1904.)

ACTION—DISMISSAL—RIGHT OF PLAINTIFF.

1. The general rule that the plaintiff may voluntarily dismiss his case is applicable in a case which has been referred to an auditor, exceptions to the auditor's report filed and sustained, and a judgment rendered by the Supreme Court reversing the judgment sustaining the exceptions, and in effect declaring that judgment should be entered in conformity to the auditor's report. The right of the plaintiff to voluntarily dismiss exists until the trial judge announces a decision striking or overruling the exceptions and ordering a decree entered in conformity to the report. It is not knowledge of the possible result of a case, but of the actual result, which takes away the right to dismiss.

Error from Superior Court, Talbot County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by the Exchange Bank of Macon against the People's Bank of Talbotton. From a judgment of dismissal, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Persons & McGehee and J. H. Martin, for plaintiff in error. Bacon, Miller & Brunson, J. J. Bull, and Hatcher & Carson, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The Exchange Bank of Macon filed an equitable petition against the People's Bank of Talbotton praying that the defendant be required to transfer on its books certain shares of capital stock which had been transferred to plaintiff by one Estes. The defendant answered that Estes was largely indebted to the defendant, and set up that it had a charter lien upon the stock to secure the payment of the debt. The defendant did not, in its answer, pray for any affirmative relief against the plaintiff either by way of set-off or otherwise. The case was referred to an auditor, who was authorized to pass on all questions, both of law and fact. The auditor heard the case, and filed his report, finding that Estes was largely indebted to the defendant, and that it had a lien on the stock in controversy. The plaintiff filed exceptions of law and fact, and by consent the presiding judge passed upon the case without the intervention of a jury. The court rendered a decree in favor of the plaintiff requiring the defendant to transfer the stock in question. The defendant brought the case to this court, and the judgment was reversed. 116 Ga. 820, 43 S. E. 289. On the first day of the term of the superior court following the judgment of reversal, the remittitur having been duly transmitted, the judgment of the Supreme Court was made the judgment of the superior court. On the following day the case was called, and counsel for plaintiff moved to dismiss the case. Counsel for defendant objected on the ground that it was entitled to a decree in conformity with the judgment of the Supreme Court, which was, in effect, a confirmation of the auditor's report. The court allowed the plaintiff to voluntarily dismiss the case, and to this judgment the defendant excepted.

The Code declares that the plaintiff in any case in any court may dismiss his action, either in vacation or term time. Civ. Code 1895, § 5044. And that a petitioner may dismiss his petition at any time, either in term or vacation, so that he does not thereby prejudice any right of the defendant; but that if claims by way of set-off or otherwise have been set up by the answer, the dismissal of the petition shall not interfere with the defendant's right to a hearing and trial on such claims in that proceeding. Civ. Code 1895, § 4970. It has been held that the plaintiff's right to dismiss cannot be exercised after a verdict, or a finding by the judge, which is equivalent thereto, has been reached, if he has acquired actual knowledge of the verdict or finding, whether the same has been published or not. Merchants' Bank v. Rawls, 7 Ga. 191, 50 Am. Dec. 394; Peoples v. Root, 48 Ga. 592; Cherry v. Building & Loan Association, 55 Ga. 19; Meador v. Bank, 56 Ga. 605 (4); Brunswick Grocery Company v. Railroad Company, 106 Ga. 272, 32 S. W. 92, 71 Am. St. Rep. 249. The principle at the foundation of these decisions is that, after a party has taken the chances of litigation, and knows what is the actual result reached in the suit by the tribunal which is to pass upon it, he cannot, by exercising his right of voluntary dismissal, deprive the opposite party of the victory thus gained. It is knowledge of the actual, not of the possible, result of a case which precludes the exercise of the right of dismissal. When a verdict in favor of the defendant has been reached, but not returned into court, and the plaintiff in some way acquires actual knowledge of the finding, he cannot exercise his right to voluntarily dismiss. The right of voluntary dismissal exists even though the case has been referred to an auditor and is in process of determination by him. Jackson v. Roane, 96 Ga. 40, 23 S. E. 118. It has also been held that it was the right of a plaintiff in ejectment, after a judgment in his favor had been set aside by the Supreme Court, to dismiss his action at any time before the case was tried again. Bleckley v. White, 98 Ga. 594, 25 S. E. 592. When a case has been referred to an auditor, and he has made his report finding in favor of the defendant, and exceptions both of law and fact have been filed by the plaintiff, his right to voluntarily dismiss the case exists until he has actual knowledge of what is the determination of the questions raised by the exceptions by the tribunal authorized by law to pass upon them; and, if the case be brought to the Supreme Court, and under the decision of that court in the then condition of the pleadings the court below would be compelled to give the case a certain direction when it came before him for final decision, the right of voluntary dismissal exists until the judge of the court below has duly announced that a judgment will be rendered carrying into effect the decision of the Supreme Court. It was argued that the judgment of the Supreme Court reversing and remanding the case was equivalent to a verdict. The effect of that judgment was simply to remand the case to the court below to be finally disposed of according to the law as declared by the Supreme Court. The exceptions of law and fact being undisposed of by any order of the superior court, and no decree having been entered in the case, the right of the plaintiff to voluntarily dismiss the case existed until there was an order of the judge, oral or otherwise, directing a decree entered in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, or at least until the judge had announced what would be his decision in the case in the light of the judgment of the Supreme Court. The plaintiff knew what would be the probable result of the case when it reached the superior court, and what was the only legally possible result of the suit; but its right to dismiss existed until it knew the actual result of the case in the superior court. The court having done nothing to attempt to carry into effect the decision of the Supreme Court, there was no error in allowing the plaintiff to voluntarily dismiss the case. Great stress was laid in this court on the hardship resulting from the dismissal of this case and placing the plaintiff in a position where it could again litigate with the defendant the questions passed upon by the auditor, the judge of the superior court, and the Supreme Court. No greater hardship results in this case than in any other case where the plaintiff has been allowed to dismiss his case after a trial and before there has been a termination of the litigation by verdict or judgment, of which the plaintiff had knowledge. Very great hardship may result to the defendant from allowing the plaintiff to exercise its right of dismissal, but the statute, the decisions of the Supreme Court, and the practice of years all authorize it under the limitations above referred to, and after a careful consideration of the present case we can see no reason to take it out of the general rule.

MACON & B. R. CO. v. REVIS.

RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—PRESUMPTIONS—EVIDENCE.

1. As has heretofore been ruled by this court in a number of cases, while the law raises against a railway company a presumption of negligence whenever the fact is made to appear that live stock was killed by the running of its cars, yet this presumption cannot withstand positive and uncontradicted evidence that the company's employes exercised ordinary diligence, both as regards maintaining a lookout for stock and endeavoring to avoid injury to the same when discovered; and relevant testimony in behalf of the company on the part of its servants cannot, if they be unimpeached, arbitrarily be disregarded by court or jury, upon the assumption that it is not, in point of fact, in accord with the truth.

(a) The facts of the present case bring it within these rulings, and the court below erred in not granting the defendant company a new trial.

Error from City Court of La Grange; W. T. Tuggle, pro hac Judge.

Action by C. H. Revis against the Macon & Birmingham Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Longley & Longley, for plaintiff in error.
E. R. Bradfield, Jr., for defendant in error.

TURNER, J. 1. The plaintiff below, in support of his contention that the defendant railway company was liable to him in damages for the negligent killing of his horse, introduced testimony which tended to establish the following state of facts: The horse was killed in a cut some 10 feet deep at a point on the railroad track 590 feet below a crossing "on an upgrade." A few moments before the train by which the horse was killed approached this crossing he was seen "standing about 30 feet from the track," and when the train reached the crossing the horse "jumped on the track at the mouth of the cut," 285 feet below the crossing, and ran in this cut, in front of the train, a distance of 305 feet, before being struck. The horse was killed on a curve, which extended a considerable distance above the crossing, and therefore could not have been seen by the engineer until about the time the train arrived at the crossing, at which time "the danger signal" was blown. The "local train," and perhaps others, had been known to stop within a distance of 590 feet from this crossing, which was near a station; but the train which ran over the horse was "the fast train," which did not stop at that station, and had never been seen to come to a stop within that distance. The railway company undertook to overcome the prima facie case thus made out by the plaintiff, and to this end called as witnesses the engineer and conductor in charge of its train on the occasion above mentioned. The engineer testified: "The train was on schedule time, and running at 35 or 40 miles an hour. I first blew the whistle for the crossing. As the engine turned the curve, I saw the horse standing off about 25 or 30 feet from track. Nothing to indicate his coming toward the track. Just about the time I reached the crossing, the horse walked to the edge of the cut and jumped down on the track. I immediately shut off steam, applied the emergency brakes, and sounded the danger or cattle alarm. It was on a curve to the left. I was looking to the front, and the brakes worked perfectly. I did all in my power to stop the train, using every appliance on the engine. I did not reverse the engine. Engines are no longer reversed since the improved air brakes are used, such as we had on this engine. After the horse jumped down on the track, he ran for some distance, until finally struck by the engine. At the time he was struck the speed had been reduced to something under five miles an hour, and would have been stopped before the second car passed by him. The train never came to a standstill, because I was signaled to go ahead by conductor. If it had been a member of my family, or my wife, on the track, as this horse was, and under the same circumstances, I couldn't have stopped the train. I can't state the exact distance the train run after the horse jumped on the track. A train like the one I had could, in my judgment, be stopped in 150 or 175 yards. We only had two passenger coaches, but a train of six coaches, with good air brakes, can be stopped in as short a space as one with two coaches. The local passenger train has been stopped a number of times within the distance testified about by plaintiff's witnesses, because it was not running as fast, and for the further reason we are always watching for signals, and approach the stations slower." The curve tended to "impede my sight from crossing to where horse was killed. There was a slight upgrade from crossing. There was a dip in the road, and from the crossing to where the horse was killed was slightly upgrade." The testimony of the conductor merely went to corroborate the statement given by the engineer as to the circumstances under which the horse was killed. The further fact was brought out that the fireman on that train at that time was no longer in the employ of the company.

In view of the uncontradicted testimony of the company's engineer, which showed not only that he exercised due diligence in maintaining a lookout for stock, but that he used every possible effort to avoid injury to the plaintiff's horse, we cannot but agree with counsel for the defendant company that a verdict against it was wholly unwarranted. See, in this connection, Georgia R. R. Co. v. Wall, 80 Ga. 202, 7 S. E. 639, and the cases cited in support of the ruling announced in Seaboard Air-Line Ry. v. Walthour, 117 Ga. 427, 43 S. E. 720. No appearance was made in this court in behalf of the prevailing party in the court below, so the theory upon which he relied for a recovery is purely a matter of conjecture. The witnesses introduced in his behalf did not undertake to say, even as matter of opinion, that his horse might sooner have been discovered, or that the train could have been stopped within a shorter distance than that between the crossing and the point at which the animal was overtaken and hurled from the track. Accordingly, the plaintiff's case was essentially weaker than that relied on by the plaintiffs in Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Waxelbaum & Co., 111 Ga. 812, 35 S. E. 645, in which this court held that the testimony introduced by the defendant "was practically uncontradicted, for the mere differences of opinion among the witnesses as to time, distances, the range of vision, etc., did not involve questions of credibility or produce conflict as to the actual facts of the occurrence." There was in this case no dispute or difference of opinion as to the distance between the crossing and the place at which the plaintiff's horse jumped upon the track, or as to the distance the train ran after the engineer discovered the presence of the animal in a situation of peril. On the contrary, the engineer testified, "I can't state the exact distance the train ran after the horse jumped on the track;" and he certainly did not undertake to say that the witnesses in behalf of the plaintiff did not correctly give the distance from the crossing to the place where the horse got upon the track, or were mistaken as to the distance the train ran, after reaching that point, before the horse was overtaken and killed. That the engineer further testified that, in his judgment, a "train like the one" he had could "be stopped in 150 or 175 yards" cannot be regarded as authorizing the conclusion that he testified falsely when he said, in effect, that it was impossible for him to stop the train in time to avoid injury to the animal. He clearly was not undertaking to impeach himself, or to in any way qualify his unequivocal and positive statement that he did everything in his "power to stop the train, using every appliance on the engine," without avail. At best, his estimate of the distance within which a train such as that he had could be stopped was merely the expression of an opinion not supported by the actual physical facts to which he swore. The better view would therefore seem to be, not that he deliberately committed perjury when he testified as to what efforts he made to stop the train, but that the opinion he expressed was, considered in the light of the facts disclosed by him, obviously erroneous, and entitled to no weight whatsoever. Even had this opinion been elicited from another witness, who professed to be an expert on the question as to the distance within which a train of a certain description, running at a specified rate of speed, could be stopped upon a grade similar to that upon which the company's train was running when the plaintiff's horse was killed, it would be a matter of grave doubt whether or not the verdict of the jury could lawfully be permitted to stand. Indeed, this court, in the case of Atlanta & Charlotte Air-Line Ry. Co. v. Gravitt, 93 Ga. 370, 20 S. E. 550, 28 L. R. A. 553, 44 Am. St. Rep. 145 (7), expressly ruled that: "The mere opinion of a locomotive engineer that a heavy passenger train consisting of a locomotive and six cars, running downgrade at forty-five miles an hour, could be stopped within a distance of one hundred yards, is not sufficient to overcome the positive and uncontradicted evidence of the engineer and fireman upon the identical train that all was done which could possibly be done to stop it, and that nevertheless it was not stopped within a distance of over four hundred yards, especially when the evidence of these witnesses was strongly corroborated by others who were experts in such matters." In other words, physical facts, when established by evidence which stands uncontradicted, and is therefore to be taken as in accord with the truth, have a persuasive insistence which cannot be lightly or arbitrarily disregarded.

It may further be noted that the defendant company accounted for the absence of the fireman who was on its train at the time the killing of the plaintiff's horse occurred, the fact being made to appear that this employé was no longer in its service. In view of this showing as to the reason he was not introduced as a witness by the company, it is clear that no inference unfavorable to it regarding the manner in which it conducted its defense could arise. Weinkle v. B. & W. R. R. Co., 107 Ga. 367, 372, 33 S. E. 471 (4); Knox v. State, 112 Ga. 373, 37 S. E. 416 (2); Central Ry. Co. v. Bernstein, 113 Ga. 175, 180, 38 S. E. 394 (5), and citations. Certainly, the mere fact that the fireman was not produced and sworn as a witness cannot be considered as strengthening the plaintiff's case, or as warranting the jury in disregarding the testimony of the company's engineer and conductor.

It is difficult to conceive how a railway company can successfully resist an action for damages brought against it for the killing of live stock if the defense made in the present case can properly be said not to be such as demanded a finding in its favor. The jury, because of personal knowledge, which enabled them to conclude that the company's train might have been stopped within a distance of 590 feet, notwithstanding it was running at the rate of "35 or 40 miles an hour," may have been entirely satisfied that the exercise of due diligence by the engineer would have averted the casualty. But, if so, they necessarily predicated their verdict, not upon the evidence adduced on the trial of the case, but upon what they knew, or thought they knew, concerning the questions of fact upon which they were called on to pass. We cannot undertake to say, as matter of personal knowledge, within what distance such a train as that which killed the plaintiff's horse could, under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence in this case, be brought to a standstill; nor are we at liberty to take judicial cognizance that 590 feet was (or was not) a sufficient distance within which to bring about that result. If, in point of fact, the train of the defendant company could and ought to have been stopped within a shorter distance, the plaintiff should have sought by the introduction of evidence to establish the real truth in this regard. The grant of a new trial—which will be the effect of our judgment in this case—will afford him an ample opportunity to do so.

WALL et al. v. MERCER.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—EVIDENCE—ASSIGNMENT OF ERRORS—VENUE—JOINT TRESPASSERS—INJUNCTION.

1. What purports to be the evidence introduced in this case before the judge on an application for injunction consisting of numerous affidavits and other papers, being set forth in full as exhibits to the bill of exceptions, without any attempt to abbreviate or brief the same, this court will not consider any assignment of error which is dependent upon the evidence.

2. Joint trespassers residing in different counties may be sued for damages in the county of the residence of either; and joint wrongdoers who reside in different counties, who are insolvent and who threaten to commit trespasses, may, in a proper case, be enjoined from the commission of such wrongs in one petition brought in the county of the residence of any one of them.

3. The allegations of the petition were of such a character as to authorize the granting of the injunction which is complained of.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Terrell County; H. C. Sheffield, Judge.

Suit by J. R. Mercer against J. M. Wall and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

W. H. Gurr, H. A. Wilkinson, and Perry & Tipton, for plaintiffs in error. M. C. Edwards and J. R. Irwin, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was an application for an injunction. Mercer filed his petition, addressed to the superior court of Terrell county, against Melton Hay, alleged to be a resident of that county, John M. Wall, whose place of residence was alleged to be unknown, "on account of the fact that he is a bird of passage, alternating between Terrell and Worth counties," and N. Powell, alleged to reside in Terrell county. The petition sets forth that Mercer was the owner of a tract of land containing 40 acres, situated in Terrell county, and that Wall, without any pretense of right, set up claim of title to the same property. The petition alleges in great detail negotiations between Mercer and Wall which it is claimed resulted in the purchase by Mercer from the wife of Wall of a tract of land which embraced the 40 acres in dispute. It was alleged that Hay, Wall, Powell, and other persons not named, had colluded to drive the tenant of Mercer from the property in dispute and take possession of the same; that these parties had actually taken possession of a house located on the tract of land; that they threaten to shoot Mercer's tenant if he attempts to enter the house, keep weapons on the premises, have issued a number of warrants for the tenants, and misuse and maltreat them continuously; that Hay, Wall, and Powell are all insolvent; that they are threatening to gather the crop, although they did not plant or cultivate it, are preventing Mercer's hands from cultivating the crop, and are threatening to destroy the crops growing in the field; that on account of the menaces, threats, and unlawful acts on the part of Hay and Wall, Mercer has already suffered damage, and will suffer irreparable damage in the future, unless the defendants are enjoined from acts of violence and trespass of the character already committed. The prayers of the petition were that Hay, Wall, and Powell, and all others in collusion with them, be restrained from keeping possession of the premises, or attempting to keep petitioner and his tenants out; from gathering the crops made on the premises; from having petitioner's tenants and employes arrested for occupying the premises or gathering the crops thereon; from proceeding in any court to seize the premises, or the crop grown thereon; from interfering in any manner with petitioner, his tenants, employes, or other persons acting for him in the performance of such legal acts in connection with the premises; from doing anything in connection with the property, except by appropriate proceedings in this case; and for general relief. Upon this petition the judge granted an order restraining the defendants from doing the acts therein named, and a rule nisi calling upon them to show cause why an injunction should not be granted. At the hearing the defendant Hay appeared, and showed for cause against the granting of the injunction a plea to the jurisdiction, alleging that he was not a resident of Terrell county, but was at the time the petition was filed a resident of the county of Worth; and also an answer, in which he denied all of the material allegations of the petition, so far as they concerned him, alleging that he was an employe of Wall to temporarily occupy the premises referred to, and that he had no interest at all in the matters at issue between Wall and Mercer. Wall appeared, and showed for cause against the granting of the injunction a plea to the jurisdiction, in which he alleged that he did not reside in Terrell county, but was a resident of Worth county, at the date of the filing of the petition; and also a demurrer, in which it was set up that the petition did not allege such facts as to give the court jurisdiction of his person; that there is no equity in the petition; that it appears that Mrs. Wall is a necessary party to the petition; and various other grounds amplifying these grounds of the demurrer; and also an answer, denying the material allegations of the petition, so far as they alleged wrongful acts on his part. Powell filed no demurrer, plea, or answer. Numerous affidavits were introduced, and after hearing evidence the court passed an order enjoining the defendants from interfering in any manner with the plaintiff, his agents or tenants, in working, gathering, or marketing the crops growing on the land in dispute; from interfering in any manner with the plaintiff in going upon or over the land, or attempting to prevent plaintiff, his agents or servants, from the free use and possession of that part of the land now in his possession, and in cultivation by him; from instituting any legal proceedings other than what might be appropriate in this case to dispossess the plaintiff; and from seizing the crops by any process other than such as might be issued under the authority of an order in this case. That part of the prayer which sought to enjoin the defendants from keeping possession of that part of the premises which was already in their possession was denied, there being nothing in the order to disturb the status of the parties as it existed at the time the petition was filed. The order, interpreted in the light of the pleadings, indicated that the judge had found from the evidence that the plaintiff was in possession of one part of the property, and that the defendants were in possession of another part; and he enjoined the defendants from interfering with the possession of the plaintiff, and refused to enjoin them from keeping possession of that part which they had acquired possession of before the petition was filed. To the granting of this order, Hay and Wall excepted, alleging that the court erred in holding that it had jurisdiction of either of them; that it was error to proceed with the case in the absence of Mrs. Wall, who was a necessary party; that the court erred in holding that there was equity in the petition; in holding that plaintiff was in lawful possession of the land, or had any rights in the crops growing thereon, as it was shown that Wall was in lawful possession of the land and the crops in dispute; in holding that Wall was not in possession of the land; in passing an order which was in its nature mandatory, and having the effect to dispossess the defendants; and that the order itself was uncertain, indefinite, and contradictory.

1. There was no bona fide attempt to brief the evidence. Affidavits and other papers are set out in full, with no attempt at abbreviation. This court cannot treat as a brief of evidence any document which is not briefed in the manner required by law. Price v. High, 108 Ga. 145, 33 S. E. 956; Anslley v. Davidson, 110 Ga. 279, 34 S. E. 611; Collins Park R. Co. v. Ware, 110 Ga. 307, 35 S. E. 121; Buchanan v. McLain, 110 Ga. 479, 35 S. E. 665; Bond v. Winn, 113 Ga. 18, 38 S. E. 328. No question made in the record which is dependent upon the evidence can, therefore, be considered, but it will be presumed that there was sufficient evidence to authorize the judge's findings.

2. It remains, therefore, to be determined whether the order passed was authorized by the pleadings. The order indicates that the judge found from the evidence that the plaintiff was in possession of a certain portion of the land, and the defendants were simply enjoined from interfering with the plaintiff's possession. He also found that the defendants were in possession of the house, and he refused to pass any order having the effect to disturb this possession. There were in the petition averments which were sufficient to show that prior to the filing of the petition the defendants had been guilty of acts amounting to a trespass upon the plaintiff's right of possession, and that they were threatening to commit similar acts in the future. In the light of the fact that the defendants were insolvent, it seems that the petition set forth sufficient reasons for the interposition of a court of equity to restrain the threatened trespass. It is said, though, that, even if this be true, the court had no jurisdiction to enjoin either Hay or Wall, because they were not residents of Terrell county. So far as Hay is concerned, it was distinctly alleged in the petition that he resided in Terrell county; and, while this was denied in his plea to the jurisdiction, the judge must have reached the conclusion that the evidence was not sufficient to establish his claim of nonresidence. The petition did not in distinct terms allege that Wall was a resident of Terrell county. In fact, the averments of the petition might be construed as a failure to allege anything in reference to his residence. But let it be conceded that he is a resident of Worth county. The allegations of the petition are sufficient to show that he and Hay were colluding to disturb the possession of the plaintiff; that, as a result of this collusion, they severally and jointly committed acts of trespass; and that both were threatening to continue in the commission of such acts in the future. The allegations were sufficient to make them joint wrongdoers. For past acts of trespass they were joint trespassers, and, under the Constitution, both could be sued in the county of the residence of either. And where an appeal is made to a court of equity to enjoin the commission of future acts of trespass by them, we see no reason why the superior court of the county of the residence of either might not take jurisdiction to restrain them from the commission of joint wrongs which they were threatening to commit. If this were not true, then, where a large number of insolvents who reside in different counties conspire to commit acts of trespass, it would be incumbent upon the person who was to become the victim of the joint wrong, if actually committed, to file separate applications for injunction in every county where any of the wrongdoers may reside. Such, of course, cannot be the law. This case is clearly distinguishable from Townsend v. Brinson, 117 Ga. 375, 43 S. E. 748. In that case no equitable relief at all was prayed against the resident defendant, and the equitable relief prayed against the nonresident was of such a nature that the resident defendant was not in any manner concerned therein. If at the final hearing in the present case it should be found by the jury that neither Hay nor Wall was a resident of Terrell county, and that they were not in collusion with Powell, no final decree can be entered against either Hay or Wall. And if they should find that Hay was and Wall was not, no decree can be entered against Wall in reference to any matter not connected with the combination entered into between him and Hay and Powell to disturb the possession of Mercer. The allegations of the petition were such as to authorize the judge to pass the order complained of, and no satisfactory reason appears to us why there should be a reversal of the judgment, either in whole or in part. It is true that the judge enjoined the defendants from instituting legal proceedings against the plaintiff, except by appropriate proceedings in the superior court of Terrell county as a court of equity. Of course, if the defendants should make it appear at any time that they should be permitted to institute legal proceedings in other courts, the judge would modify the order so as to permit this to be done. In the meantime the effect of the order will be simply to prevent the defendants from instituting legal proceedings for the purpose of harassing the plaintiff, and a court of equity can legitimately exercise its power of injunction to prevent such wrongs.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring.

CHESTATEE PYRITES CO. v. CAVENDERS CREEK GOLD MIN. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1904.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—RIGHT TO EXERCISE—FOREIGN CORPORATIONS.

1. A corporation chartered under the laws of another state cannot exercise the right of eminent domain in this state without the consent of the Legislature expressly given.
2. Sections 650-657 of the Political Code of 1895, giving to private mining corporations the right of eminent domain, even if constitutional, apply only to corporations chartered within this state.

3. Under the facts of the present case the remedy at law was not as complete as the one in equity.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Lumpkin County; J. J. Kinsey, Judge.

Action by the Chestatee Pyrites Company against the Cavenders Creek Gold Mining Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

H. H. Perry and W. A. Charters, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Underwood, R. H. Baker, and H. H. Dean, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, C. J. The Chestatee Pyrites Company filed an equitable petition against the Cavenders Creek Gold Mining Company. The petition alleged that the plaintiff owned and possessed certain tracts of land through which ran the Chestatee river; that it had developed on said land at great expense a pyrites mine, from which it was actually engaged in taking out ore; that it had purchased the land on both sides of a large water power in the Chestatee river, a nonnavigable stream, owned this water power, and had also purchased the right to overflow the adjoining lands by the erection of a dam in this stream; that it had purchased this water power for the purpose of developing and working its mine; that the Chestatee river is partially formed by four named streams which empty into it above the plaintiff's land and augment the waters of the river which flow over plaintiff's lands. The plaintiff also alleged that all of the water is essential to the proper operation of its mine, but that the defendant, a corporation chartered under the laws of North Carolina, had bought lands above the property of plaintiff for the purpose of operating a gold mine, and had given notice that it would proceed under Pol. Code 1895, § 650 et seq., and Civ. Code 1895, § 4685, to condemn the water in the four tributary streams above mentioned, and divert it from the river by means of ditches and canals to its mine, returning it to the river below the land of plaintiff, and had fixed a date for arbitrators to meet to pass upon the necessity for such condemnation and the amount of damages to the plaintiff. The petition charged that the defendant was a foreign corporation, and had no power or authority under the Code and the acts amendatory thereof to condemn private property for its own use. It further alleged that, even if the Code applied to foreign corporations, the sections under which the proceedings were to be had were unconstitutional; that these sections sought to give the power to condemn for a private use, and not for a use by the public. The answer admitted that the defendant was a corporation organized under the laws of North Carolina, but insisted that the Code sections apply as well to foreign as to domestic corporations. The view we take of the case renders it unnecessary to decide upon the validity of these Code sections.

1. The right of eminent domain is a sovereign right of the state. It is inherent in every sovereignty, and existed before constitutions were adopted. It lies dormant until the Legislature sets it in motion. As the Legislature cannot in every case supervise the condemnation, it may confer the power upon agencies. These agencies may be individuals or corporations, and the Legislature may even confer this power upon foreign corporations or individuals living in another state. The power thus conferred is always to be strictly construed, and will not be permitted to be exercised except where it is affirmatively granted. Its grant is in derogation of common right, and is the exercise of one of the highest of the powers of sovereignty. Where, therefore, a private individual or corporation seeks to take the property of another under the power of eminent domain, affirmative authority for the exercise of the power must be shown. The power may be conferred either by a special act creating the corporation or by general acts relating to all corporations of designated classes. If a foreign corporation undertakes in this state to condemn private property, it must show legislative authority to do so. We have searched the authorities diligently to ascertain if any court has ever decided that a foreign corporation could exercise the right of eminent domain without legislative authority from the state wherein it proposes to exercise the right, and have been unable to find a single case so holding. All the courts seem to hold that this right of eminent domain does not exist as a matter of comity between the states, and all hold, so far as we can find, that a foreign corporation must have affirmative authority from the state in which it proposes to exercise the right. "A railroad company or other quasi public corporation cannot exercise the right of eminent domain in another state than that by which it was created, unless it is expressly or impliedly authorized to do so by the laws of such other state. Such power does not come within the rule of comity." Clark & Mar. Priv. Corp. p. 2734, § 854. Judge Thompson, in his excellent and valuable work on Corporations (vol. 6, § 7932), says: "The power of a private corporation to acquire private property for the public purposes for which it may have been chartered is a power which comes to it alone through the delegation by the state of its sovereign right of eminent domain. The power cannot, therefore, be exercised by a foreign corporation on a mere principle of comity, because it will never be presumed, in the absence of affirmative legislation, that the state delegates any part of its sovereignty to a foreign corporation. It may be stated with confidence in every case that this power cannot be exercised by a corporation created under the laws of one state or country within the limits of another state or country, without the consent of the Legislature of that other state or country affirmatively expressed." We are satisfied to close this part of the opinion with this authority from so eminent an author.

2. The defendant in error claimed, however, that sections 650-657 of the Political Code of 1895 are broad enough to include foreign corporations. We think that they should not be so construed. We think that the Legislature cannot be held to have granted the right of eminent domain—one of the highest of the sovereign rights of the state—to any and every corporation which may be created by any other state or country. These sections must be construed strictly. We cannot believe that the Legislature, by the use of the words "any corporation," intended to confer part of the sovereignty of the state upon every corporation created in any state or country in the world which might be engaged in one of the businesses designated in these sections. As Judge Thompson says in the quotation above: "It will never be presumed, in the absence of affirmative legislation, that the state delegates any part of its sovereignty to a foreign corporation. * * * This power cannot be exercised by a [foreign] corporation * * * without the consent of the Legislature * * * affirmatively expressed." Had the Legislature intended to confer this power upon foreign mining corporations, it would have done so, as it did in conferring similar powers upon foreign telegraph companies in the act of 1889 (Civ. Code 1895, § 2347), where it said, "Any telegraph company chartered by the laws of this or any other state of the United States," etc. This last-cited act and Code section expressly confer the power upon telegraph companies chartered by a sister state, which is an answer to the argument of counsel that the cases of Savannah Ry. Co. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co., 112 Ga. 941, 38 S. E. 353, Id., 113 Ga. 916, 39 S. E. 399, and Id., 115 Ga. 554, 42 S. E. 1, recognized that land in this state may be condemned by a corporation chartered by another state. Our Code declares that "any * * * corporation who may be actually engaged in the business of mining" certain metals or minerals shall have the right to condemn private property. This language seems very broad—broad enough to include both domestic and foreign corporations doing business of the designated kind in any state or country; but, as has been shown, statutes conferring the right of eminent domain must be construed strictly, and courts will never assume, in the absence of affirmative legislation, that it was intended to grant such powers to corporations over which the Legislature had no control. Since the adoption of the Code of 1863, the Legislature has reserved to itself the right to change or modify the charters of corporations of its creation, and to control the conduct of such corporations. It has no such powers with regard to a foreign corporation. In an act governing procedure, or of a remedial nature, such words as are used in these Code sections would probably be held to embrace all corporations, foreign and domestic, for such an act would receive a liberal construction. But acts granting powers in derogation of common right must always be construed strictly, and these words held not to include foreign corporations.

3. It was argued that the plaintiff had a complete remedy at law. After much reflection, we have concluded that the remedy at law was not as complete as the remedy in equity. The remedy at law pointed out by counsel for the defendant in error was for the plaintiff to go before the arbitrators, and there make the questions raised by his petition in this case, and, in the event of an adverse decision, to renew the points on an appeal to the superior court. In the first place, we think that the arbitrators could not entertain a motion to dismiss the condemnation proceedings on the ground that the gold mining company had no authority to institute them. Under the Code the arbitrators' only duties are to pass upon the necessity for the condemnation and the amount of damage to the owner of the property condemned. Even if they could have decided as to the authority of the gold mining company to institute the proceedings, and had decided in favor of such authority, and there had been an appeal to the superior court, the gold mining company could have tendered the amount of damages fixed, and could then have proceeded to dig its ditches and divert the water regardless of the appeal. Equity, on the other hand, immediately stops the illegal proceedings, and prevents any illegal act. We think, therefore, that the remedy at law was not as complete as the one in equity. For the reasons given, we think that the court should have granted the injunction, and that it was error to refuse it.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except CANDLER, J., disqualified.

BANK OF CULLODEN v. BANK OF FORSYTH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

SUPREME COURT—JURISDICTION—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—RETURN DAY.

1. Parties cannot by consent confer jurisdiction upon this court to hear and determine a case at a term prior to that to which the case is by law returnable.

2. The return term fixed by law for ordinary bills of exceptions is the first term of this court which begins after the expiration of 30 days from the filing of the bill of exceptions in the office of the clerk of the trial court.

3. The bill of exceptions in the present case, having been filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court within less than 30 days before the first day of the October term, 1903, was properly placed on the docket of the March term, 1904, notwithstanding the bill of exceptions and record reached the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court more than 20 days before the first day of the October term, 1903, and therefore before the return day for that term.

Action between the Bank of Culloden and the Bank of Forsyth. From a judgment the Bank of Culloden brings error. Motion to transfer denied.

Robt. L. Berner, for plaintiff in error.
Hardeman, Davis, Turner & Jones, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The bill of exceptions in this case was filed in the office of the clerk of the trial court on the 10th day of September, 1903, which was less than 30 days before the first day of the October term, 1903. The bill of exceptions and record reached the office of the clerk of this court on the 11th day of September, 1903, which was more than 20 days before the commencement of the October term, 1903, and therefore before the return day for that term. As the case was brought to this court upon an ordinary writ of error, the clerk entered the case upon the docket of the March term, 1904. Under the ruling of this court in Logan v. Western & Atlantic Railroad Company, 86 Ga. 493, 12 S. E. 586, the clerk had no authority to do other than docket the case as he did. Counsel for both parties now unite in an application to have the case transferred from the docket of the March term, 1904, to the docket of the October term, 1903. As this court has no jurisdiction of the case until the March term arrives, it has no authority to transfer the case as prayed, and neither counsel nor parties can by consent confer upon this court jurisdiction of the case. The motion to transfer must be denied.

Motion denied. All the Justices concur.

WESTERN & A. R. CO. v. ROBINSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—EVIDENCE.

1. When this case was here before, this court decided that the positive and uncontradicted evidence of the servants of the company overcame the presumption of negligence, and that the plaintiff could not recover. On the second trial the evidence was the same, except that the plaintiff introduced expert witnesses who testified that in their opinion the train could have been stopped in a shorter distance than the engineer stated. Under the ruling in the case of Central of Ga. Ry. Co. v. Waxelbaum, 35 S. E. 645, 111 Ga. 812, this expert evidence did not impeach or contradict the fact testified to by the engineer, that he used all the means at his command (stating what he had done), and that he could not stop the train before running over the animal. This is especially so when the experts testified that they would take his testimony as to the fact in preference to their opinion, and when, also, their opinion was based on the hypothesis that every car in the train was equipped with air brakes, and the evidence showed that not more than two-thirds of the cars were so equipped.

SMITH v. FOSTER.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS—WIDOW'S SUPPORT.

1. The mere fact that litigation is pending between a widow and the representative of her deceased husband's estate over the return of appraisers appointed to assign dower will not authorize the granting of a second year's support.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Talbot County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Proceeding by Joanna Foster against E. T. Smith, administrator, for a year's support. Judgment for Foster, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

J. J. Bull, for plaintiff in error. Persons & McGehee, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. The Code declares that, "when an estate is to be kept together for a longer time than twelve months, and there are no debts to pay, and a widow and minor children to be supported out of said estate, they shall have a year's support for each year that such estate may be kept together." Civ. Code 1895, § 3486. It has been held that this provision is applicable in a case where there is a widow and no minor children. Woodbridge v. Woodbridge, 70 Ga. 733. This court has never distinctly decided what is meant by the clause "when an estate is to be kept together." In Hill v. Lewis, 91 Ga. 796, 18 S. E. 63 (2), it was said: "Whatever the statute may mean by the phrase 'when an estate is to be kept together,' the keeping of it together by the mere choice or election of the widow herself cannot be recognized as a basis for allowing her continued support from year to year." As under the law no estate is required to be divided within less than 12 months from the date of the qualification of the legal representative, and a testator may by will provide that his estate shall be kept together for a longer period of time, it might with some force be asserted that it was the intention of the General Assembly in enacting the law under consideration to provide an additional year's support only in those cases where a will required an estate to be kept together for a longer time than twelve months. But in the case of Woodbridge v. Woodbridge, supra, an additional year's support was allowed in a case where there was no will, and the estate had been kept together for three years by the mere failure of the administrator to wind up the same. In the present case the estate has been kept together in the hands of the administrator for more than twelve months, as the result of a controversy growing out of the widow's application for dower. The widow applied for dower, and appraisers were appointed to admeasure it. They failed to make their return to the term of court next succeeding their appointment, and it is claimed that this failure was the fault of the widow, as it was her duty to see that the appraisers made their return in the earliest time required by law. As a result of this failure to make the return at the next succeeding term of the court the administrator was required to keep the estate together in his hands. After the return was made to the second term of the court after the appointment of the appraisers the administrator filed a traverse to the return of the commissioners, making various objections as to the manner of the admeasurement and as to the quantity of land set apart. The sole reason for keeping the estate together is this pending litigation over the widow's application for dower. Without attempting now to determine definitely what is meant by the clause "when an estate is to be kept together," we hold in this case that the mere fact that there is litigation pending over the widow's right to dower will not alone authorize the granting of a second year's support. There is no question raised as to the widow's right to dower, and therefore it will be eventually set apart. When dower is set apart in land the widow is entitled to an accounting for the rents, issues, and profits of the dower land from the date of her husband's death to the date that she enters upon the dower estate. Austell v. Swann, 74 Ga. 278; Johnson v. Moon, 82 Ga. 249, 10 S. E. 193; Johnson v. Gordon, 102 Ga. 354, 30 S. E. 507. In ordinary cases the widow is entitled to a year's support and also to her dower, and, if she takes dower, to no further interest in the real estate. No matter how long the estate may be kept together, if at the time of the winding up of the estate she has elected to take her dower, has had her first year's support, has had her dower assigned to her, and has received the rents, issues, and profits of the land from the date of her husband's death to the date she entered as dowress, she has all that the law ordinarily authorizes. Mere litigation over her right to dower does not give her the right to ask a year's support in addition to that set apart for the first year. It was claimed in the present case that the estate was kept together as a result of the widow's fault in not speeding her application for dower, but we have determined the case without reference to this point. We do not think she would be entitled to a second year's support, even if she was without fault with reference to this matter. The Woodbridge Case should not be extended.

AMERICAN FREEHOLD LAND MORTG. CO. OF LONDON, Limited, v. WALKER.

HOMESTEAD — SALE ON EXECUTION — MORTGAGE BY WIFE—AGENT—ESTOPPEL.

Real estate of a husband, set apart as a homestead, was levied on and sold. The purchaser at the sheriff's sale conveyed the land to the wife, a beneficiary under the homestead. She borrowed $1,000, and secured the same by a deed to the land, which was signed by her husband, acting as her agent. The holder of the security deed brought ejectment against the wife, and, having recovered a verdict, obtained a writ of possession. The husband, for himself and as the head of a family, sought a perpetual injunction against its enforcement. The jury found generally for the plaintiff. Held:

1. While the verdict was right in enjoining any interference with the homestead estate, it was too broad, in that it restrained the creditor from enforcing the writ after the termination of the homestead.

2. Where one, as agent for another, signs a deed conveying property, he is estopped from thereafter asserting against the grantee any adverse right based on a title or interest outstanding in such agent at the time of the execution of the deed.

3. What one induces another to regard as true is to be treated as the truth between them, if the party who acts has been misled to his damage by the conduct or statements of the other.

Error from Superior Court, Taylor County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by A. M. Walker against the American Freehold Land Mortgage Company of London, Limited. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Real estate of A. M. Walker, which had been set apart as a homestead for the benefit of his wife and minor children, was subsequently levied on and sold under a fi. fa. against him. Waters, the purchaser at the sheriff's sale, conveyed the land to Mrs. Alice Walker, the wife of A. M. Walker, and a beneficiary under the homestead. She borrowed from Sherwood $1,000, and secured the same by a deed to the land, which was signed by her husband as her agent. The debt and security were transferred by Sherwood to the American Freehold Land Mortgage Company, which company brought ejectment against Mrs. Walker, and, having recovered a verdict, obtained a writ of possession. A. M. Walker, for himself and as head of the family, sought a perpetual injunction against its enforcement. The jury found generally for the plaintiff, and the mortgage company excepted.

W. E. Simmons, for plaintiff in error. A. M. Colbert and Allen & Tisinger, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. It was conceded on the argument here that a verdict finding that the writ of possession should not be enforced during the continuance of the homestead estate was demanded by the evidence, but we think the plaintiff in error is right in its contention that the verdict was too broad. Under it the mortgage company would be perpetually enjoined from dispossessing A. M. Walker individually, even after the termination of the homestead estate. If the levy was only on the homestead interest, and if Waters got no title at the sheriff's sale, and, if Mrs. Walker acquired no title or a defective title under her deed from Waters, yet her deed to Sherwood purported to convey the fee. This was signed by A. M. Walker as agent for his wife, and, whether she has title or not, forever estopped him from asserting his own title as against the grantee or his assigns. He has the power to sell the reversion (Williams v. O'Neal [Ga.] 45 S. E. 978), and could by estoppel bring about that result. The deed may have been the act of Mrs. Walker, but the recitals of fact and the representations bound the conscience of the agent, and estopped him from using any right or title then outstanding in himself to the prejudice of Sherwood, who loaned the money in the belief that the property belonged to Mrs. Walker. The agent's signature justified the lender in acting on the theory that, whoever else owned it, the agent did not. Even where one attests a deed, there is a presumption that he knows of its contents; and, unless this presumption is removed, he is estopped from asserting, against the grantee therein, an interest based on any right then outstanding in himself. Butt v. Maddox, 7 Ga. 504 (4); Ga. Pac. Ry. Co. v. Strickland, 80 Ga. 776, 6 S. E. 27, 12 Am. St. Rep. 282; Fleming v. Ray, 86 Ga. 533, 12 S. E. 944. As held in Kirk v. Hamilton, 102 U. S. 76, 28 L. Ed. 79, what one induces another to regard as true is the truth as between them, if the party who acts has been misled by the conduct or statements of the other. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5150, 3823, 3609.

STEWART et al. v. GARRETT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 15, 1904.)
CEMETERIES—OWNERSHIP OF LOTS—INTEREST ACQUIRED.

1. One who purchases a lot in a public cemetery for burial purposes, though the right of interment therein be exclusive, does not acquire any title to the soil, but only a mere easement or license, which will not support an action of ejectment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by J. A. Stewart and others against H. W. Garrett. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Reese Crawford and McNeill & Levy, for plaintiffs in error. Charlton E. Battle, for defendant in error.

TURNER, J. This bill of exceptions was founded upon an action of ejectment brought in the superior court of Muscogee county, for a lot in a cemetery in the city of Columbus, known and distinguished in the plan of said cemetery as lot No. 184 in section or extension C of said cemetery, "the said tract or parcel of land being a cemetery lot for burial purposes." The action was founded on the several demises of James A. Stewart and others, also of "the city of Columbus," and also of "the mayor and council of the city of Columbus," these two latter demises being framed to cover the different names by which the municipality was designated in the acts of the General Assembly. To the petition in this case an abstract of title was appended, the particulars of which need not be set out in full. The defendant filed a general demurrer, the substance of which may be stated in the language of the fourth ground thereof as follows: "Because the petition shows upon its face that the land sued for is a cemetery lot contained in the public cemetery in the city of Columbus, known as 'Linwood Cemetery,' and, said tract or parcel of land being, as described in said petition, a cemetery lot for burial purposes, the right and title of the plaintiffs, if any, in such property, is not of such a character as will support an action of ejectment, the right of burial in such cemetery lot being merely a license, or at best an easement, in said property, and ejectment will not lie for the recovery of a license or an easement." The court below sustained the demurrer and dismissed the case. The plaintiffs excepted in due form, and brought the case to this court.

The question is whether an action of ejectment will lie for the recovery of a tract or parcel of land averred to be a cemetery lot for burial purposes. The courts in many of the states have held that the purchaser of a lot in a public cemetery, though under a deed absolute in form, does not take any title to the soil, but that he acquires only a privilege or license to make interments in the lot purchased, exclusively of others, so long as the ground remains a cemetery. See the cases collected in 6 Cyc. Law & Proced. 717. And there would seem to be good reason for holding that, when a cemetery lot is conveyed for burial purposes, it cannot be devoted to any other use, whatever may be the form of the conveyance. In the case of Jacobus v. Congregation of the Children of Israel, 107 Ga. 518, 33 S. E. 853, 73 Am. St. Rep. 141, the same being styled an "equitable petition," this court held that even punitive damages could be recovered for an unlawful interference with a cemetery lot; and Mr. Justice Fish, reasoning upon the case, used this language (page 521, 107 Ga., page 854, 33 S. E., 73 Am. St. Rep. 141): "As a general rule, one who purchases and has conveyed to him a lot in a public cemetery does not acquire the fee to the soil, but only the easement or license of burial therein." The opinion then proceeds to cite an array of authorities to the effect that damages may be recovered from any person who wrongfully trespasses upon, desecrates, or invades the burial lot of another. And, in a proper case, the courts will, by injunction, restrain a trespass upon a burial lot. See 6 Cyc. Law & Proced. 720, and authorities cited.

The case of the New York Bay Cemetery Co. v. Buckmaster, 49 N. J. Law, 449, 9 Atl. 591, cited by counsel for the plaintiffs in error, on examination does not seem to support his view that one who has the right of burial in a cemetery lot can maintain an action of ejectment against another who wrongfully enters thereon. While the deed under consideration in that case recited that the premises were to be had and held for the uses of sepulture only, and for no other uses whatever, the law of New Jersey (P. L. 1850, p. 194) required the cemetery company to grant the fee to the purchasers of lots, and for that reason the court held that an action of ejectment would lie for the recovery of the lot. We have also examined the other cases cited by the able counsel for the plaintiffs in error, but we have not found them sufficient to overcome the great weight of authority which supports the view which we have adopted.

In the present case the parcel of land sought to be recovered being averred to be a cemetery lot for burial purposes, any conveyances upon those terms would carry only a limited use or an easement. Such a use is also sometimes called a mere license. To recover such an easement or license, an action of ejectment will not lie. Adams on Ejectment, *16; Perley on Mortuary Law, pp. 177, 178, 187; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. 717 (note 50); 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 474; Union Petroleum Co. v. Bliven Petroleum Co., 72 Pa. 173; Hancock v. McAvoy, 151 Pa. 460, 25 Atl. 47, 18 L. R. A. 781, 31 Am. St. Rep. 774. If for any public reason the disestablishment of a cemetery is necessary, the police power is adequate. It may be added that, while the action of ejectment has its uses, its quaint fictions and devices do not seem appropriate to the ascertainment of any right in a burial lot. If any fiction is pardonable in a case of this kind, it would be fitter to hold that the fee in these sacred premises belongs to the dead. Within these hallowed precincts no court would desire to send the sheriff with a writ of possession. This instinct of humanity is loyalty to a statute impressed upon all hearts. Its influence is not confined to the weak and ignorant. The plaintive appeal which marks the grave of Shakspeare is said to have been inspired by his fear of a removal of his bones to a charnel house:

"Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
To dig the dust enclosed here."

CALHOUN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

COMMON CHEAT—EVIDENCE.

1. One who makes a contract to purchase of another an article of merchandise, and agrees to pay therefor a sum of money, and, after the contract is completed, agrees that, if the purchase price of the article is not paid at the time stipulated, service or labor to the value of such purchase price will be performed for the other contracting party, is not, upon a failure to pay the purchase price, or perform the service referred to in lieu thereof, indictable under the provisions of the act approved August 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90).

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Sandersville; P. R. Talliaferro, Judge.

Tobe Calhoun was convicted of swindling, and brings error. Reversed.

Evans & Evans, for plaintiff in error. J. E. Hyman and Gus H. Howard, Sol., for the State.

COBB, J. The accused was arraigned in the city court of Sandersville upon an accusation charging him with a violation of the provisions of an act approved August 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 90). Having waived trial by jury, the judge, after hearing evidence, entered a judgment declaring the accused to be guilty. To this judgment the accused excepted upon the ground that, under the uncontradicted evidence, no offense against the laws of this state had been proven. The act under which the accused was tried is as follows:

"Section 1. If any person shall contract with another to perform for him services of any kind with intent to procure money, or other thing of value thereby, and not to perform the service contracted for, to the loss and damage of the hirer; or after having so contracted, shall procure from the hirer money, or other thing of value, with intent not to perform such service, to the loss and damage of the hirer, he shall be deemed a common cheat and swindler, and upon conviction shall be punished as prescribed in section 1039 of the Code [1895].

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, that satisfactory proof of the contract, the procuring thereon of money or other thing of value, the failure to perform the services so contracted for, or failure to return the money so advanced with interest thereon at the time said labor was to be performed, without good and sufficient cause and loss or damage to the hirer, shall be deemed presumptive evidence of the intent referred to in the preceding section."

There was only one witness sworn in the case, and the following is his entire testimony, as it appears in the record: "I am the prosecutor in this case, and on the 26th of August I met the defendant in the road. I had a barrel of fish, which I was selling in bunches. I did not know the defendant at that time, but he asked me to sell him a string of fish, which I told him I would for twenty cents. I sold him the fish for twenty cents. He did not have the money, but I agreed that he might pay it on the next Saturday. He then agreed that, if he did not pay the money on the next Saturday when it was due, that he would work the same out with me on the next Monday following the day when the money was due. He did not pay the money on the next Saturday when it was due, and he did not come on the next Monday to work it out, as he had promised to do. The defendant was in the employ of W. L. Henderson when I made the trade with him, and he was driving his wagon at the time. I would not have sold him the fish, except for the promise made. I have never received my money, nor the fish back. I saw the defendant next day after he had promised to work, and asked him about it, and he gave no excuse for not coming, but said he would come that day, but he didn't." Taking this testimony in its entirety, it establishes that there was a sale of the fish by the prosecutor to the accused for the sum of 20 cents. This was the contract. It does not distinctly appear that the fish were immediately delivered, but it does appear that, after this contract was entered into, the accused agreed that, if he did not pay the money at the time stipulated, he would perform labor or service for the prosecutor to the extent of the purchase price of the fish. There is nothing to indicate that the contract of sale, which called for a bunch of fish, to be paid for with 20 cents in money, was in the least modified or changed. We do not think this transaction falls within either the letter or the spirit of the act above referred to. The act relates to transactions where a person makes a contract with another to perform service with intent to procure money or other thing of value. In the present case there was no contract of this character. There was a contract to pay money for an article, and a subsequent agreement that, if the money was not paid, the purchase price of the article would be paid in service. Criminal laws are to be construed strictly, and, giving the act the strict construction which the law requires, we do not think the transaction detailed in the record comes within the provisions of the act. We have reached this conclusion without reference to whether the act is unconstitutional for any reason. For the purposes of this case, we have treated it as a valid law, but nothing herein said is to be construed as indicating any opinion on the question of the constitutionality of the legislation. Under the view we have taken of the case, there is nothing in the record which requires a decision at this time upon any question relating to the constitutionality of the act. This legislation was probably the result of the decision in Ryan v. State, 45 Ga. 128, which was approved in Ratteree v. State, 77 Ga. 774, and in Holton v. State, 109 Ga. 129, 34 S. E. 358. Whether it is in the power of the General Assembly to change the rule laid down in these cases in the manner indicated in the act of 1903 will be determined when that question is directly raised.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

LOUISVILLE & N. E. CO. v. CODY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1904.)

CARRIERS—LIVE STOCK SHIPMENT—NEGLIGENCE—PLEADING—PETITION.

1. It is not incumbent upon a plaintiff, when he elects to bring an action ex delicto against a railway company for damages arising from a failure on its part to properly perform its duties as a common carrier of live stock, to set forth in detail, by way of an exhibit to his petition or otherwise, the precise terms of the contract of affreightment. But it is necessary that he should specifically allege, when called upon to do so by an appropriate special demurrer, that he actually sustained loss by reason of such failure of duty, and also state the particular facts upon which he relies in support of his contention that the carrier was negligent touching the transportation of the live stock intrusted to its care for shipment.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by W. E. Cody against the Louisville & Nashville Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Goetchins & Chappell, for plaintiff in error. Hatcher & Carson, for defendant in error.

TURNER, J. This case originated under an attachment sued out by W. E. Cody against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company for the value of a mule alleged to have been killed through the negligence of the defendant, the mule being averred to be of the value of $135. The declaration in attachment alleged that the defendant company "received from petitioner" at Murray, Ky., 19 horses and 4 mules, to be transported by it, as a common carrier of freight, to Columbus, Ga.; that the horses and mules were in good order when delivered to the defendant, and by it, in consideration of certain freight to be paid it by petitioner, were to be, with all due care and diligence, and without fault or negligence of its servants and agents, safely carried and delivered to petitioner at Columbus, Ga.; that, notwithstanding the promise and undertaking of the defendant as aforesaid, upon arrival at Birmingham, Ala., of the train upon which these horses and mules were shipped, one of the latter, of the value of $135, was down in the car, trampled to death; that "said mule was knocked down, bruised, and injured through the fault and negligence and want of due care and caution of said defendant, its servants and agents, in the handling of the train of cars in which said mule was being transported from Murray, Ky., to Birmingham, Ala.; and that from said bruises and injuries said mule died"; and that, in order to recover the value of said mule, the plaintiff had sued out an attachment against the defendant, returnable to the superior court. The plaintiff prayed the judgment of the court against the defendant company for the value of the mule and for costs incurred, etc.

The defendant appeared at the first term of the court and demurred to the plaintiff's petition on various grounds. Its demurrer was overruled, and it filed exceptions pendente lite to this ruling of the court. In the further progress of the case, after the introduction of the plaintiff's evidence, the defendant asked a nonsuit, which was refused. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount sued for; a motion for a new trial was filed by the defendant, on numerous grounds, which motion was overruled; and the defendant then sued out a bill of exceptions to this court, assigning error upon the overruling of its demurrer, upon the refusal of the trial court to order a nonsuit, and upon its refusal to grant the defendant a new trial.

After giving due consideration to the first of these assignments of error, we have reached the conclusion that the defendant's demurrer should have been sustained. Accordingly we shall not undertake to deal with either of the other assignments of error, for, as the overruling of the defendant's demurrer was erroneous, all subsequent proceedings in the trial court are properly to be regarded as of no effect. Southern Ry. Co. v. Dyson, 109 Ga. 104, 34 S. E. 997; Morgan v. Giblan, 115 Ga. 148, 41 S. E. 495, and citations.

On the argument before this court, counsel for the plaintiff in error insisted upon only three of the grounds of its demurrer, which were as follows: (1) "The alleged contract on which said cause of action is based is not sufficiently set forth to advise defendant of the terms thereof, nor is a copy of said contract exhibited, as by statute provided"; (2) "It is not therein sufficiently alleged when, where, or in what manner the alleged damage was done to the mule alleged to have died, nor in what particular the defendant was negligent in the carriage of said mule"; and (3) "It does not appear in said declaration that the plaintiff was in any wise injured or damaged or suffered any loss on account of said mule for the alleged negligence of defendant, or its failure to perform its alleged contract of carriage, nor does it appear how or in what manner plaintiff was damaged or suffered any loss on account of the alleged injury to and death of said mule."

The obvious reply to the first of these objections is that the plaintiff, as it was his right to do, elected to bring a suit against the defendant company, sounding in tort, because of its alleged failure of duty as a common carrier rather than to sue for a breach of the contract of affreightment. Southwestern Railroad v. Thornton, 71 Ga. 61; Seals v. Railroad Co., 102 Ga. 817, 29 S. E. 118; L. & N. R. Co. v. Spinks, 104 Ga. 696, 39 S. E. 969; State Mutual Life Ass'n v. Baldwin, 116 Ga. 859, 860, 43 S. E. 262. And this being so, it was not necessary that the plaintiff should set forth the precise terms of such contract, but simply that he should allege, by way of inducement, facts showing that the relation of carrier and shipper existed between the defendant company and himself, and that there had been a failure on its part to perform its duties in the premises. Furthermore, our statute (Civ. Code 1895, § 4963) provides merely that a contract which is declared on shall be incorporated in or attached as an exhibit to a petition only in the event such contract is evidenced by a writing; and the petition filed in the present case does not disclose that the contract therein referred to was, as matter of fact, in writing. The defendant's complaint that there is no "copy of said contract exhibited" is therefore not well taken. The defendant was not justified in filing a "speaking" demurrer, but, if reliance was put on a special contract in writing, it should have been set up and taken advantage of by filing an appropriate plea. Boaz v. Central R. Co., 87 Ga. 465, 13 S. E. 711; Nicoll v. Railway Co., 89 Ga. 260, 15 S. E. 309.

The point raised by the demurrer that the plaintiff did not allege in his petition that he had been injured or damaged, or had suffered any loss, on account of the alleged negligence of the defendant, seems justified by the loose and equivocal allegations of his petition; and, it being directly assailed by a special demurrer based upon this ground, we are compelled to hold that the petition was defective in this respect. See, in this connection, Mathews v. Burch, 103 Ga. 539, 29 S. E. 697; Mayor, etc., of Eastman v. Cameron, 111 Ga. 110, 36 S. E. 462; W. U. Tel. Co. v. Griffith, 111 Ga. 563, 564, 36 S. E. 859.

The declaration was also open to special demurrer on the ground that it did not with sufficient particularity aver wherein the alleged negligence of the defendant consisted, or in what manner the injury to the mule was brought about. By recurring to the foregoing abstract of the declaration, it will be seen that the plaintiff merely alleges that, upon the arrival at Birmingham of the train on which the horses and mules were being transported, one of the mules was down in the car, trampled to death; that "said mule was knocked down, bruised, and injured through the fault and negligence and want of due care and caution of said defendant, its servants and agents, in the handling of the train of cars; * * * and that from said bruises and injuries said mule died." While these allegations, in a very loose and general way, disclose that the plaintiff's complaint is that there was a negligent handling of the train of cars, whereby the injured mule was knocked down and trampled on, they are not such as to put the defendant company upon reasonable notice of the acts of negligence relied on by the plaintiff, so as to enable it to properly prepare and present its defense. W. U. Tel. Co. v. Griffith, supra. In the case of Miller v. Merchants' & Miners' Transportation Co., 115 Ga. 1009, 42 S. E. 335, it appears that Miller sued the transportation company to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by him on account of its negligence. The petition alleged that he was an employé of the defendant; that one of its vessels, while lying at or near a wharf, had two piles of lumber loaded on her deck, one on the port and the other on the starboard side, and on these piles of lumber were loaded a number of cross-ties; that as he was going along between the two piles of lumber, engaged in loading the vessel, it suddenly listed to the starboard, causing one of the cross-ties which had been loaded on the port side to fall upon and injure him, etc.

The petition further alleged that he was free from negligence, "did not know of the condition of the ship which caused it to list, and was then unaware of any improper distribution of the cargo," and that his "injuries were due to the fault and negligence of said company in not properly loading and distributing the cargo of said ship, the latter being defective in construction, and therefore liable to list unless care was observed in loading the same, all of which was unknown to" him, and could not have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable care on his part; and that "said improper loading and defective construction of said ship was known to said defendant, or should have been known by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence." The defendant demurred specially to the petition upon several grounds, two of which were (1) that the declaration did not disclose "in what manner the cargo of said ship was improperly distributed"; and (2) that it was not shown "in said declaration in what manner said ship was defective in construction." The demurrer was sustained upon these two grounds, and, the plaintiff failing to amend, the petition was dismissed by the trial court. In passing upon an exception taken by the plaintiff to this ruling, this court said (page 1011, 115 Ga., page 386, 42 S. E.): "It will be observed that the negligence of the defendant which the plaintiff alleged caused his injuries was the improper loading and distribution of the ship's cargo, and the defective construction of the ship. The defendant, in order to prepare its defense, was entitled to be put on notice of the particular manner in which the plaintiff expected to show that the cargo was improperly distributed, and also the particular defects which plaintiff expected to prove existed in the construction of the ship. The defendant, by an appropriate special demurrer, called for the information to which it was entitled. The plaintiff declined to amend the petition in the respects indicated, and we are of the opinion that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the petition. In Blackstone v. Railway Co., 105 Ga. 381, 31 S. E. 90, it was held: 'Where * * * the cause of injury was alleged to be a pole concerning which the petition, in general terms, only alleged that it was "too near the track," and the defendant, by special demurrer, made the point that the petition did not allege "how near said pole was to the track," the petition ought to have been amended so as to set forth the facts as to this matter more fully and explicitly; and, in the absence of such an amendment, this court will not reverse a judgment sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the action.' " And the court, in the course of the same opinion, cited the case of W. U. Tel. Co. v. Jenkins, 92 Ga. 398, 17 S. E. 620, in which it was held that a declaration filed by the wife of an employé of the company was good as against a general demurrer, though subject to a special demurrer, it being alleged in her declaration that her husband was killed without fault on his part, and wholly through the negligence of the company, his homicide having been caused by the falling of a rotten pole which he had climbed in the performance of his duties, its defective condition being unknown to him.

Following the decisions announced in these cases, we hold that the plaintiff in this case should have averred in his declaration the particular manner in which he expected to show the defendant company improperly handled its train, what caused the injured mule to be knocked down and trampled on, and in what respect the company or its servants had been negligent, and how its want of due care and caution resulted in loss to the plaintiff.

FARGASON v. FORD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

APPEAL—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—LEASE—PARTIES—LANDLORD'S LIEN.

1. An assignment of error, in general terms, that the court erred in granting a nonsuit, sufficiently presents for determination the question whether there was any evidence to sustain the case as laid in the petition.

2. The word "trustee," following a person's name, is merely descriptive personæ.

3. Where a rent contract is made with A., "trustee," as landlord, he may foreclose a lien in his own name for money furnished the tenant by him, as landlord, with which to make the crop upon the rented premises, though the land and such money belong to another person, whom he represented in the transaction.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Dawson; A. M. Raines, Judge.

Action by D. S. Fargason, trustee, against L. C. Ford. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Marlin & Irwin, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Gurr and H. A. Wilkinson, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. The parties to this case executed the following contract:

"Georgia, Terrell County. This agreement between D. S. Fargason Trustee, of the first part and L. C. Ford of the second part, Witnesseth: That the said party of the first part, D. S. Fargason Trustee does hereby lease, rent and let, to the said L. C. Ford, the party of the second part, a certain four horse farm, known as the Gammage place, in the 12th. dist. of Terrell County, for the term of five years, to begin on the 1st. day of Jany. 1902, and the said lease to expire on the 31st. day of Dec. 1906. And the said Fargason, Trustee, agrees to furnish and loan to the said Ford, the sum of $150.00 during the year 1902 with which to enable the said Ford to cultivate said farm during said year. Said sum to be advanced as follows, $50.00 at once, and the balance $100.00 to be advanced along during the year, as might be needed by the said Ford. The said $150.00 to be repaid by said Ford to said Fargason, Trustee, by the first day of Dec. 1902 with interest, at 8%. * * * D. S. Fargason, Trustee. L. C. Ford."

On December 2, 1902, "D. S. Fargason, trustee," foreclosed a lien for money loaned against the crops grown on the rented premises during the year 1902. Ford filed a counter affidavit. Upon the trial of the issue thus made it appeared, from the evidence submitted by the plaintiff, that the title to the land in question was in D. S. Fargason, as trustee for his wife and minor daughter, and that it was their money which he furnished to Ford with which to make a crop. Fargason testified that the land in question belonged to his wife and minor daughter, and he managed it for them; that Ford did not owe him, individually, anything, but the money was owing to him as trustee. The court granted a nonsuit, to which ruling the plaintiff excepted, the assignment of error being as follows: "Plaintiff now comes and excepts to the order granting nonsuit, and assigns the same as error."

1. Upon the call of the case in this court, defendant in error moved to dismiss the bill of exceptions, upon the ground that there was no sufficient assignment of error. This motion was not meritorious, as the assignment of error sufficiently presents for determination the question whether there was any evidence to sustain the case as laid in the foreclosure proceeding. Anderson v. Walker, 114 Ga. 505, 40 S. E. 705; Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 872, 4 S. E. 280.

2. The word "trustee," following the name "D. S. Fargason," was merely descriptive personae. Crusselle v. Chastain, 76 Ga. 840; Irvine v. Wynn, 107 Ga. 402, 33 S. E. 415; State v. Sallade, 111 Ga. 700, 36 S. E. 922.

3. As the word "trustee" after Fargason's name was merely descriptive, the contract was with him in his individual capacity, and the foreclosure proceeding brought by him was in a like capacity. The question, therefore, is, did the fact that he testified that the money furnished by him as landlord belonged to his wife and daughter, whom he represented in the transaction, and that therefore the defendant was not indebted to him in his individual capacity, authorize the granting of a nonsuit? We think not. Under Civ. Code 1895, § 3037, subd. 3, in all cases where the contract is made with an agent in his individual name, though his agency be known, he has a right of action on the contract made for his principal. So, it was held in Spence v. Wilson, 102 Ga. 762, 29 S. E. 713, "Where one rents land from the agent of the owner, the contract being made with the agent in his individual name, the latter may maintain an action on such contract, though the fact of his agency was known by the renter; and accordingly the payment of such rent may be enforced by a distress warrant sued out by the agent in his own name." Under Civ. Code 1895, § 2800, landlords have a lien on crops grown on the rented premises for money furnished their tenants to make the same; and it has been held that, in order for a landlord to have a lien upon his tenant's crop for money or supplies under this section, the landlord must furnish the articles as landlord. Swann v. Morris, 83 Ga. 143, 9 S. E. 767; Brimberry v. Mansfield, 86 Ga. 792, 13 S. E. 132; Rodgers v. Black, 99 Ga. 189, 25 S. E. 23. In the present case Fargason, as landlord, furnished the defendant the money with which to make the crop levied upon, and we think it is clear that he had a lien under section 2800 of the Civil Code. The fact that the land rented and the money furnished belonged to his wife and daughter, whom he represented, makes no difference. The tenant agreed to pay him as landlord, and was bound by his agreement, nor could the tenant deny his title. There is nothing in Swann v. Morris, supra, in conflict with the ruling here made, for there the landlords did not sell or furnish the guano to the tenant, but sold it to him as agents for another, and took a note for the price of the same, payable to their principal, which they subsequently paid, and then sought to foreclose a lien upon the tenant's crop. The point upon which the decision in that case turned was that the landlords did not furnish the guano to the tenant, but the tenant purchased the same from a third person.

BLACKWELL v. STATE.

AFFRAY—EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

1. The use of profane and violent language by two persons, each to the other, although in a public place, is not sufficient, without more, to constitute an affray, under the laws of this state; but the offense is made out by proof of the conduct indicated under the circumstances mentioned indulged in by both parties, and accompanied by such acts as drawing a razor, making a threatening gesture with a plank, and taking hold of each other, by which conduct citizens are terrorized and disturbed; it not appearing that either party was justifiable in all that he did. Hawkins v. State, 13 Ga. 322, 58 Am. Dec. 517.

2. Whether or not the accused was justifiable in the part that he took in the affair was, under the facts of this case, a question for the jury. They found that he was not. There was some evidence to sustain their finding, the trial judge signified his approval of it by refusing to grant a new trial, and this court will not say that his refusal was erroneous.

OWEN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

LARCENY—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

1. There was ample evidence upon which to predicate the charge of the court as to the effect of recent possession of stolen goods. Under the evidence offered by the state, a charge on this subject was demanded, and there is no complaint that the charge as given was not a correct statement of the law.

2. A conviction may be had upon a free and voluntary confession, corroborated only by proof of the corpus delicti. In charging on this subject, the trial judge should impress upon the jury the idea that, while this is the law, such proof does not necessarily demand a conviction, and that, at last, to authorize a verdict of guilty, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused. Wimberly v. State, 81 S. E. 162, 105 Ga. 188, and citations.

3. Where the judge charges the jury, in effect that a verdict of guilty cannot be had upon a confession alone, but that the same must be corroborated, and that it is sufficient corroboration to authorize a conviction when, in addition to proof of a confession, the corpus delicti is shown, concluding his statement with the following language, "Where it is shown that the crime was committed, then you would be authorized to consider the confession"—no error is committed of which the accused can complain.

4. The evidence offered, while not so conclusive as to render mathematically certain the guilt of the accused, was legally sufficient to authorize a verdict of guilty. The jury appears to have been satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused was guilty. The trial judge necessarily approved the verdict, as is shown by his refusal to grant a new trial, and this court will therefore not interfere with his judgment.

1. A legislative act incorporating a town, which provides that named persons shall act as mayor and aldermen until their successors are elected by the people of the town according to the scheme of the act, is not opposed to that provision of the Constitution which declares that "the people of this state have the inherent, sole and exclusive right of regulating their internal government, and the police thereof" (Oiv. Code, § 5734); nor to that provision which declares that "in all elections by the people the electors shall vote by ballot" (Oiv. Code, § 5736). Nor is such act unconstitutional for the reason that the General Assembly "has no elective or appointive power of officers of towns to which they grant charters."

All of the points insisted on are ruled in the headnote, and we do not deem any further elaboration necessary. The case of Americus v. Perry, 114 Ga. 871, 40 S. E. 1004, 57 L. R. HARRIS v. ROAN, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—SECOND BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—EXTRAORDINARY MOTIONS—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL—MANDAMUS TO JUDGE.

1. The general rule is that, when the refusal of a new trial in a criminal case has been affirmed by this court, no second bill of exceptions can be allowed. The only exception to this general rule is such "an extraordinary motion or case" as is specified in section 5487 of the Civil Code of 1895.

2. The extraordinary motions or cases contemplated by the statute are such as do not ordinarily occur in the transaction of human affairs, as when a man has been convicted of murder, and it afterwards appears that the supposed deceased is still alive, or where one is convicted on the testimony of a witness who is subsequently found guilty of perjury in giving that testimony, or where there has been some providential cause, and cases of like character. Cox v. Hillyer, 65 Ga. 57.

3. Alleged newly discovered evidence which is cumulative of that presented on the trial, or which merely tends to impeach a witness examined at the trial, or which establishes a nervous disease or bodily eccentricity which was in existence at the time the crime was committed, and must have been known to the accused at the time of the trial, furnishes no sufficient reason for granting an extraordinary motion for a new trial.

4. The existence of excitement in the public mind, resulting from the commission of the crime, producing fear in the mind of the accused, so as to deter him from furnishing his counsel with information necessary to prepare his defense, even if in any case a sufficient reason to grant a new trial on extraordinary motion, will not be when the time elapsing between the verdict and the final order on the ordinary motion is such that the apprehensions in the mind of the accused must have abated.

5. When an alleged extraordinary motion for a new trial is entirely without merit, it is proper for the judge to decline to entertain the same, and to refuse to grant a rule nisi thereon.

6. This court will not by mandamus compel a judge to certify a bill of exceptions assigning error upon the refusal of the judge to entertain an extraordinary motion for a new trial and grant a rule nisi thereon, when it appears that such motion is without merit. Malone v. Hopkins, 49 Ga. 221; Cox v. Hillyer, 65 Ga. 57; Hanye v. Candler, 25 S. E. 606, 99 Ga. 214; White v. Butt, 27 S. E. 680, 102 Ga. 552; Perry v. State, 30 S. E. 903, 102 Ga. 368.

7. The case of Taylor v. Reese, 33 S. E. 917, 108 Ga. 379, was where the judge refused to certify the first bill of exceptions in the case, which complained of errors at the trial and was sued out in due time thereafter.

The case of Sears v. Candler, 37 S. E. 442, 112 Ga. 381, did not involve any question relating to an extraordinary motion for a new trial, and therefore the present ruling is not in conflict therewith.

MUTUAL LIFE INS. CO. OF NEW YORK v. HAMILTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

NEW TRIAL—HEARING OF MOTION—CONTINUANCE—BRIEF OF EVIDENCE.

1. Where a term order, duly granted, to hear a motion for a new trial in vacation, recites "that it is impossible to make out and complete a brief of the testimony in such case before adjournment of court," and provides "that the movant have until the hearing, whenever it may be, to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence in said case, and the presiding judge may enter his approval thereon at any time, either in term or vacation, and if the hearing of the motion shall be in vacation, and the brief of evidence has not been filed in the clerk's office before the date of the hearing, said brief of evidence may be filed in the clerk's office at any time within ten days after the motion is heard and determined," and the hearing is regularly continued several times, by consent, during vacation, each order of continuance preserving all the rights of the movant under the original term order, and upon the last day set for a hearing in vacation no hearing is had, and no further order granted, by reason of the absence of the presiding judge, the motion goes over to the next term, at which it stands for a hearing, upon which the movant may present the brief of evidence for approval, and, after it has been approved, have the same filed.

Applying the rule above announced to the facts of this case, the court erred in dismissing the motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by Perry Hamilton against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jas. H. Gilbert and H. V. Hargett, for plaintiff in error. Hatcher & Carson, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. On May 15th, during the May term, 1902, of the superior court of Muscogee county, the case of Perry Hamilton, administratrix of W. T. Hamilton, against the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York was tried, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff. On May 16th, during the term, the defendant filed its motion for a new trial; and on the same day the court granted an order rectifying and providing that, as it was "impossible to make out and complete a brief of the testimony in said case before adjournment of court, it is ordered by the court that said motion be heard and determined on the 17th day of June, in vacation, in judge's chambers at Columbus, Ga., * * * and that movant may amend said motion at any time before final hearing." The order further provided "that movant have until the hearing, whenever it may be, to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence in said case, and the presiding judge may enter his approval thereon at any time, either in term or vacation, and if the hearing of the motion shall be in vacation, and the brief of evidence has not been filed in the clerk's office before the date of hearing, said brief of evidence may be filed in the clerk's office at any time within ten days after the motion is heard and determined." On June 17th the motion was continued to be heard on June 28th, by an order to that effect, which contained the following provision: "* * * ordered that the plaintiff be allowed until the 28th day of June, 1902, to file his brief of the testimony and amended grounds for a new trial, and, if not filed at that time, then movant is entitled to all the privileges heretofore granted in the original motion to file any time before the hearing of the motion." On June 28th the motion was continued, by consent, to be heard on August 2d, the order providing "that the movant have until that day, inclusive, to make out and file a brief of the evidence had at the trial of said case, and have all other and further rights, etc., as though said motion were heard and determined at the regular May term of said court." On August 2d the motion was continued by consent, to be heard on August 12th, the order for the continuance providing "that the movant have until that day, inclusive, to make out and file an amended motion for new trial, and a brief of the evidence had at the trial of said case, and have all other and further rights, etc., as though said motion were heard and determined at the regular May term of said court, without any injury to movant, and with all rights first accorded movant in his motion for new trial." On August 12th the movant appeared at the time and place set for the hearing by the last-mentioned order, with a prepared brief of the evidence; but neither the presiding judge, nor the respondent or her counsel, was present. Nothing more was done in reference to the motion until the following November term of the court. When, during this term, the motion for a new trial was called in its order, respondent moved to dismiss it "for failure of movant in preparing and filing and having approved the brief of evidence in said case on or before 12th August, 1902, it not having on said day obtained an order extending said time within which a brief of the evidence could be approved and filed in said motion"; alleging "that the May term, 1902, was adjourned after the expiration of the 12th August, 1902, as to said motion, and that movant cannot now file its brief of the evidence in said case." Upon the motion to dismiss the court passed the following order: "Upon call of the above case, the respondent moved to dismiss the motion for new trial upon the ground that no brief of evidence had been filed in the clerk's office or approved by the court in said case. It appeared by orders regularly granted that said case was tried at May term, 1902, and a motion for a new trial filed and an order granted extending the time for hearing until 17th June, when an order was granted extending time for hearing until 28th June, when another order was granted to August 2d, when another order was granted extending time until 12th August, 1902. Each order giving the right to prepare and file his brief of evidence, it appearing that the time of filing and preparing a brief of evidence had expired, and that no brief of evidence was filed, it is ordered and adjudged that the motion be, and is hereby, dismissed," etc. To this order of dismissal the movant excepted.

It is clear, we think, that the original term order of May 16th gave the movant in the motion for a new trial until the final hearing thereof to prepare, have approved, and to file a brief of evidence. The reason recited in that order for hearing the motion in vacation was that it was "impossible to make out and complete a brief of the testimony in said case before adjournment of court." After expressly giving the movant until the hearing, whenever it might be, to prepare and present for approval a brief of the evidence, and providing that the judge might enter his approval thereon at any time, either in term or vacation, the order provided that if the hearing should be in vacation, and the brief of evidence had not been filed before the hearing, then it might be filed within 10 days after the motion had been heard and determined; thus showing that it was not contemplated that the brief of evidence should be filed until it had been approved. It appears from each of the orders continuing the motion for a new trial, from the motion of the respondent to dismiss it, and from the order of the court dismissing the same, that the court and counsel for both sides recognized that, under the original term order and the orders of continuance, the movant in the motion for a new trial had until August 12, 1902, to prepare, present for approval, and to file a brief of the evidence in the case. The movant did not, in any of the orders for continuance of the motion for a new trial, consent to a limitation of its right, under the original term order, to have a brief of the evidence approved and filed upon the final hearing, but such right was expressly reserved in each of such orders of continuance. As the motion was not heard on August 12th—the last day, in vacation, set for the hearing—and, through no fault of the movant, no order was then passed in reference to the motion, it went over, by operation of law, to the succeeding November term. Civ. Code 1895, § 5485. When called in its order, the movant was ready with a brief of evidence, which its counsel presented to the judge for approval, and asked leave to file the same. The court declined to approve it or to permit it to be filed, but dismissed the motion for a new trial, because, as the court held, the time for preparing and filing the brief had expired on the 12th of August. For the reasons above stated, we think the court erred in this ruling, and the judgment below must therefore be reversed.

J. W. Wise, for plaintiff in error. A. O. Blalock, Sol., for the State.

LAMAR, J. Glass was prosecuted in the city court of Fayetteville for a misdemeanor. The affidavit charged him with the offense of "gaming." The accusation based thereon charged that he "played and bet for money and other things of value at a game of seven-up, and other games played with cards." The defendant demurred on the ground that the accusation did not follow the affidavit, in that it covered matters other than those contained therein. On the authority of Dickson v. State, 62 Ga. 588, Brown v. State, 109 Ga. 572, 34 S. E. 1031, and Williams v. State, 107 Ga. 693, 33 S. E. 641, the judge properly overruled the demurrer. If the af-affidavit had charged the defendant with playing "seven-up," the defendant could not have been put on trial for playing at any other game or for gaming generally. Blake v. State, 112 Ga. 537, 37 S. E. 870. But where the affidavit sets out that the defendant was guilty of the general offense of gaming, the accusation can allege that he was guilty of any specific act included within the definition. The accusation cannot be broader than the affidavit, but, as the greater includes the less, if the affidavit is general, the accusation can be specific.

TIPTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—VENUE—ALIBI—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—APPEAL—NEW TRIAL.

1. An indictment must allege a certain time within the statute of limitations, but on the trial the date may be established by circumstantial evidence.

2. Ordinarily, when a month is referred to, it will be understood to be of the current year, unless from the connection it appears that another is intended.

3. The indictment charged that the offense was committed on August 25, 1903, and on the trial thereafter during the same year the prosecutor testified that the offense was committed on August 25th, without stating the year. The defendant sought to prove an alibi, and offered evidence as to where he was on August 25, 1903. It being evident that both the state and the accused understood that the proof went to establish the commission of the act on the day charged in the indictment, a new trial will not be granted on the ground that the evidence left uncertain the time when the offense was committed.

4. Proof that the prosecutor lived in Walker county, and that he was assaulted while in his residence, sufficiently established the venue.

5. It was for the jury to determine whether the positive identification of the defendant as the perpetrator of the crime was met by the proof offered to establish an alibi.

6. Where one was charged with an assault with intent to murder A., and it appeared that the defendant had fired into a house in which A., B., C., and D. were living; that one shot came near B. and another within 18 inches of A.—there was evidence to support a conviction of an assault with intent to murder A.

7. This court cannot grant a new trial on the ground that the punishment was excessive, even though the defendant was found guilty with a recommendation to mercy.

8. The newly discovered evidence was merely cumulative of that previously offered in support of the defense of alibi. Besides, there was no showing as to the character and credibility of the new witnesses. Civ. Code 1895, § 5481.

9. There being no error of law assigned other than that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence, and the evidence being sufficient to support the verdict, this court will not interfere with the discretion of the judge in refusing a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Walker County; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Fayette Tipton was convicted of assault with intent to kill, and brings error. Affirmed.

Lumpkin & Rosser and John W. Bale, for plaintiff in error. Moses Wright, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LAMAR, J. An indictment must allege a certain time within the statute of limitations when the offense was committed. Bailey v. State, 65 Ga. 410. If the day and month are given and the year is omitted, it is insufficient. Hence a charge that an offense was committed on "the 3d of June instant" was held to be defective in Com. v. Hutton, 5 Gray, 89, 66 Am. Dec. 352; People v. Gregory, 30 Mich. 371; White v. State, 93 Ga. 48, 19 S. E. 49 (4). While the allegations in the indictment must be specific, the time may be established by circumstantial evidence, and the present case is within the rule laid down in Tillson v. Bowley, 8 Greenl. (Me.) 163, followed in Marston v. Jenness, 12 N. H. 144, that "when a month is referred to, it will be understood to be of the current year, unless from the connection it appears that another is intended." Contra, Lehritter v. State, 42 Ind. 383. The indictment was found on August 26, 1903, and alleged that the assault with intent to murder was committed on August 25, 1903. The trial took place in September, but during the same term at which the indictment was found. The witnesses for the state testified that the "shooting occurred at 9:15 p. m. on August 25th." The defendant endeavored to establish an alibi, and offered much evidence to show that on August 25, 1903, at 9:15 p. m., he was at a church, about four miles distant. The state offered other evidence in rebuttal. From this it appears that both sides understood that August 25, 1903, was the time referred to by the witnesses for the state; and, there being no request to charge on this subject, or as to the statute of limitations, and the only complaint being that the verdict is contrary to law and evidence, we do not feel authorized to grant a new trial upon the ground that the year was not established with sufficient certainty.

It is now well settled that the failure to establish the venue can be taken advantage of on the general ground that the verdict is contrary to law, even though no question on that subject was raised in the lower court, and no specific assignment of error to call the state's counsel's attention to the fact that a reversal will be asked on that ground. But these rulings will not be extended. The record will be searched, and if it appears, even by circumstantial evidence, that the crime was committed within the jurisdiction of the court, a new trial will not be granted, even though no witness specifically stated that the offense was committed within the county. Here there was enough to establish the venue. It appeared that the prosecutor lived in

¶ 1. See Indictment and Information, vol. 27, Cent. Dig. § 247.

Walker county, and that he and his family were fired on while in his residence.

The defendant sought to establish an alibi, and also claimed that the offense, if any, was not assault with intent to murder T. B. Arnold, but his wife. It appeared that 10 or 12 shots were fired into the house in which the prosecutor, his wife, and family were living. The prosecutor positively and explicitly identified the defendant, and it was for the jury to pass upon the conflict occasioned by this evidence and that of a witness who swore that at the time of the shooting he saw the defendant at a church four miles distant. It was also for the jury to say whether the assault was with intent to murder the wife or the husband. There was evidence that one ball came within 3 inches of the wife, and another within 18 inches of the husband. While the case is close under the evidence, there was sufficient to sustain the verdict, and, there being no error of law complained of, and no assignment of error on the charge of the court, we must decline to interfere with the refusal of the judge to grant a new trial.

The newly discovered evidence of other persons who were at the church was cumulative, and, besides, there was no showing by the defendant that he did not know, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have discovered, the existence of such evidence.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

EQUITABLE MORTG. CO. v. McWATERS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

NEW TRIAL—DISMISSAL OF MOTION—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—EXECUTION—CLAIM BY ADMINISTRATOR.

1. The motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial brought in question only matters which rested in the sound discretion of the trial judge, and it was not shown that that discretion was abused.

2. The evidence objected to by the plaintiff, even if inadmissible, related to a matter which was not in issue on the trial, and the failure to rule it out was not cause for the grant of a new trial.

3. The charges complained of in the motion embodied correct principles of law, and were applicable to the facts of the case on trial.

4. It appeared that some of the heirs for whose benefit the claim by the administrator was filed were concluded by a judgment rendered adversely to them on a claim which they had previously filed to the same land, and on the trial of which they could have set up the contentions they now seek to establish. McWaters v. Equitable Mortgage Co., 42 S. E. 52, 115 Ga. 723. The share of these heirs in the land was one undivided half. The other heirs, not having been parties to that or any like suit for the land in controversy, were not estopped. As to them, the evidence fully warranted, if it did not demand, a finding that the possession of the defendant in fi. fa. was permissive only, and that the property was not subject. After a verdict finding the entire property not subject, it was therefore not error for the trial court to grant a new trial as to the undivided half interest claimed by the heirs first mentioned, and refuse it as to the others. Direction is given that upon the next trial of the controversy between the plaintiff in execution and the administrator as to the share of the heirs who are concluded by the former judgment, the jury be instructed, upon proof of the facts before mentioned, to return a verdict finding that share subject.

MACK v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1904.)

STEALING RIDE ON TRAIN—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ACCUSATION.

1. If one should openly enter and remain in a car with no intent to pay his fare, he would not be guilty under the provisions of the act of December 21, 1897 (Van Epps' Code Supp. § 6662).

2. If he should conceal himself in a car for some purpose other than that of avoiding the payment of his fare, he would not be guilty under this act.

3. But if he should conceal himself on a train or in a car for the purpose of avoiding the payment of fare, he would be guilty of attempting to steal a ride, if removed before the journey began; or of actually stealing a ride, if he remained in the car until after the journey had commenced.

4. An accusation charging M. with the offense of a misdemeanor, in that he "fraudulently concealed himself in a car of a railroad company for the purpose of avoiding the payment of fare and stealing a ride," was sufficient to withstand a general demurrer.

Error from City Court of Vienna; D. L. Henderson, Judge.

Bart Mack was convicted of stealing a ride on a train, and brings error. Affirmed.

Crum & Jones, for plaintiff in error. E. F. Strozier, Sol., and Whipple & McKenzie, for the State.

LAMAR, J. If one should openly enter and remain in a car with no intent to pay his fare, he would not be guilty under the provisions of the act of December 21, 1897 (Van Epps' Code Supp. § 6662). Or if he should conceal himself in a car for some purpose other than that of avoiding the payment of his fare, he would not be guilty thereunder. But if he should conceal himself on a train, or in a car, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of fare, he would be guilty of "attempting to steal" a ride, if removed before the journey began; or of "stealing a ride," if not discovered until after the journey had actually begun. The accusation charged the defendant with a "misdemeanor," in that he did "falsely and fraudulently conceal himself from the conductor and train authorities, by hiding in a box car * * * upon a train of the Georgia Southern & Florida Railroad Company, for the purpose of avoiding the payment of fare and stealing a ride thereon." The judge properly overruled a general demurrer to this accusation. The defendant was not charged with the offense of merely concealing himself, but with the offense of a misdemeanor, manifested by concealing himself in a car for the purpose of avoiding the payment of fare. The act and the intent were those prohibited by the statute, and the accusation was sufficient.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concur.

HENDRICK et al. v. DANIEL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1904.)

WITNESSES — COMPETENCY — TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT—EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL.

1. Under Civ. Code, § 5269, par. 1, in an action of ejectment, the opposite party to the grantee of a deed from a deceased person is not competent to testify in his own behalf to conversations and transactions with such deceased person affecting adversely the title conveyed by the deed; and under paragraph 5 the agent of such a party is likewise incompetent.

2. It is not error to exclude evidence as to matters about which there is no dispute.

3. This court will not consider a ground of a motion for a new trial, complaining of the refusal of the court to allow counsel to ask a witness a stated question, where it does not appear what answer to the question was expected.

Error from Superior Court, Heard County; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by John W. Daniel against Hugh L. Hendrick and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

D. B. Whitaker, R. W. Freeman, and W. C. Wright, for plaintiffs in error. S. Holderness and Frank S. Loftin, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. Suit was brought by John W. Daniel against Hugh L. Hendrick to recover certain lands described in the petition. Daniel claimed under two deeds from Jephtha H. Daniel, Sr., dated, respectively, January 1, 1898, and April 23, 1898, conveying the land in dispute. At the return term the defendant answered that he was in possession of the land only as agent for his wife, Helen Hendrick, and at that term she was made a party defendant. In their plea they admitted Mrs. Hendrick's possession, and denied the plaintiff's title, or that he had any right to the possession or the rents and profits of the land. They further averred that in the fall of 1889 Jephtha H. Daniel, the grantor in the deeds to the plaintiff, who was the father of both the plaintiff and Mrs. Hendrick, put Mrs. Hendrick in possession of the land, and expressed the desire that she should have it as a gift or advancement from him; that after this declaration, with the express understanding that the lands were a gift from Jephtha H. Daniel to his daughter Mrs. Hendrick, she, by and through her husband, Hugh L. Hendrick, went into possession, and has so remained ever since; and that her possession has been continuous and exclusive for a space of more than seven years in the lifetime of Jephtha H. Daniel, without the payment of any rent for the land, the seven years having elapsed before the making of the alleged deeds from Jephtha H. Daniel to the plaintiff. It was therefore claimed that Mrs. Hendrick was seised of the land in fee before the making of the deeds set out in the plaintiff's abstract of title. The plea also set up that, after going into possession of the land under this parol gift, Mrs. Hendrick, acting through her husband as her agent, made substantial and valuable improvements on the property, which were enumerated. At the trial, evidence was introduced on both sides. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the premises sued for, and mesne profits. The defendants made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and they excepted.

1. While the motion for a new trial, as amended, contains numerous grounds, the case is really controlled by a single question, viz., whether the court below erred in excluding testimony as to transactions and communications between Mrs. Hendrick and her husband and agent, on the one side, and Jephtha H. Daniel, under whom both the plaintiff and Mrs. Hendrick claimed, and who had died prior to the bringing of the suit, on the other. This evidence was excluded as coming within the prohibitions, respectively, of Civ. Code, § 5269, pars. 1, 5, the court holding, in effect, that John W. Daniel, the plaintiff, was an assignee or transferee of his deceased father, and therefore Mrs. Hendrick could not testify in her own favor against his title, and that her husband, who was admitted to have been her agent in all the transactions relating to the land, was likewise, by reason of his agency, incompetent to testify as to such transactions. The question squarely presented, therefore, is, where suit is instituted to recover possession of land by a grantee in a warranty deed, can the opposite party or his agent testify to conversations or transactions with the deceased grantor, the nature of which is to show an adverse title? This, in turn, renders necessary a discussion as to whether a grantee of land is included in the words "assignee" or "transferee," as used in the Code section to which reference has been made. This court is thoroughly committed to the proposition that the act of 1889, and the subsequent acts amendatory thereof, the provisions of which have been embodied in Civ. Code, § 5269, are to be literally construed, and that nothing will be added to or taken from them by judicial construction. The original act (Acts 1889, p. 85, No. 496) provided only for cases "where any suit is instituted or defended by a person insane at the time of trial, or by the personal representative of a deceased person." In the case of Woodson v. Jones, 92 Ga. 662, 19 S. E. 60, which was decided November 6, 1893, this court held that under the act of 1889 "the maker of a negotiable promissory note is a competent witness in his own favor to prove payment thereof to the payee before the note was transferred, although the payee has since died; the action being by the indorsee of the note, and the personal representative of the payee not being a party thereto on either side." In the opinion the present Chief Justice, referring to former decisions to the effect that the terms of the act of 1889 would not be extended by construction, but would be construed to the letter, quoted from the act to the effect that "there shall be no other exceptions allowed under this paragraph, by any court, than those herein set forth." The General Assembly, which was then in session, seeing the deficiency in the act of 1889 as illustrated by the case cited, immediately thereafter, on December 9, 1893, amended it by providing that it should extend to cases where "any suit is instituted or defended, * * * by the endorsee, assignee, transferee or by the personal representative of a deceased person." Acts 1893, p. 53, No. 211.

The literal meaning of the word "endorsee" is easily ascertained by reference to its etymology. "Endorsement" applies to such written entries as may be made on the back of notes, checks, etc., and may transfer title to the paper on which it is made. The literal meaning of the word "assignment" is much broader. In its most general sense it applies to the transfer of interest in all classes of property, real, personal, or mixed. Bouvier gives as the definition of the verb "assign," to make or set over to another, and of "assignment," a transfer or making over to another of the whole of any property, real or personal, in possession or in action, or of any estate or right therein; a transfer by writing, as distinguished from one by delivery. Black's Law Dictionary (page 97) defines the word as "the act by which one person transfers to another, or causes to vest in that other, the whole of the right, interest, or property which he has in any realty or personalty, in possession or in action, or any share, interest, or subsidiary estate therein. * * * In a narrower sense, the transfer or making over of the estate, right, or title which one has in lands and tenements." The same authority defines the verb "assign," as used in conveyancing, as follows: "To make or set over to another; to transfer, as to assign property, or some interest therein." It seems clear that, technically speaking, the word "assignment" refers to a transfer of interest in land alone, and that to apply it to a transfer of a note or similar paper is to give it a broad, rather than a technical, meaning. Literally, it most assuredly covers a conveyance of land by deed. The word "transfer," in its literal meaning, is broader than "assignment," and all the authorities agree in a definition which, in effect, covers any act by which the owner of anything delivers or conveys it to another with the intent to pass his rights therein. In like general terms, a transferee is one to whom a transfer is made. Following the former decisions of this court, therefore, and giving to the words "assignee" and "transferee," as used in the Code, a literal construction, we are forced to the conclusion that they cover the grantee in a conveyance of land. These words are the broadest that could possibly have been used. A literal construction of either necessarily includes a vendee, grantee, or donee. That such was the meaning intended to be given them by the lawmaking power we think can easily be established by an application of any or all of the well-known rules for the construction of statutes. The act of 1889 and the amending act of 1893 are both remedial statutes. The evil sought to be cured was that the living took advantage of the dead, the sane of the insane, by giving testimony, the power to contradict which was buried in the tomb or obscured by dethroned reason. By the decision of this court in the case of Woodson v. Jones, supra, it was brought to the attention of the General Assembly that the act of 1889 failed of its full purpose, and it was accordingly amended by the act of 1893. To use a homely metaphor, by inserting in the law as it stood the word "endorsee" the Legislature healed the particular malady pointed out by the decision in the case cited, and then, to guard against a relapse, or the possibility of a similar attack in the future, it inoculated the patient with the words "assignee" and "transferee." The mischief as it existed prior to the passage of the act of 1889 was plain. That act did not accomplish its full purpose, and so in 1893 the General Assembly amended it so as to cover all possible cases where the same mischief threatened, and where estates, real, personal, or mixed, of deceased or insane persons, might otherwise be obtained or damaged by allowing parties to suits affecting such estates to testify to communications and transactions with such deceased or insane persons. With the full nature and extent of the evil clearly apparent, we cannot believe that the General Assembly intended to protect the estate of a deceased indorsee of a note against the testimony of the living maker, at the same time allowing it to be wronged by nullifying his warranty deed to a tract of land. On what theory it can be supposed that the General Assembly sought to protect the purchaser of a note, and leave unprotected the grantee of a piece of real estate, we are at a loss to conceive.

The case of Elliott v. Shaw, 32 Ohio St. 431, cited by counsel for the plaintiff in error, we do not think is at all in point. That case held simply that, under an Ohio statute rendering incompetent as a witness the adverse party in interest to the grantee of a deceased person, the maker of a note would not be incompetent to testify in his own behalf against the assignee of the deceased payee; and the main reason given for the decision was that the lawmaking power clearly intended to restrict the statute being construed to the adverse party in a suit by or against the grantee in a conveyance of realty. Applying to our own law the well-defined rules of construction, and having in view the purpose of the act of 1889, and the evil sought to be remedied, we are clear that it was the intention of the act of 1893 to include and protect all indorsees, all assignees, and all transferees, of all kinds of property, real, personal, and mixed. It follows that the court below did not err in excluding the testimony under discussion, set out in the motion for a new trial.

2, 3. The other grounds of the motion disclose no error requiring the grant of a new trial. One of these grounds complains of the refusal to allow counsel to ask a named witness a specified question, but does not state what answer to the question was expected, and hence it cannot be considered. Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. 382, 43 S. E. 712. Others complain of the rejection of evidence as to matters about which there was no dispute between the parties. A careful examination of the brief of the evidence shows that there is no merit in the contention that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence. There was abundant evidence to sustain the verdict, and for no reason set out in the motion did the court below err in refusing to grant a new trial.

ACTION ON CONTRACT — PLEADING — AMENDMENT — INSTRUCTIONS — NEW TRIAL.

1. The original plea set up the defense of failure of consideration; and, whether or not this defense was at first pleaded with sufficient particularity, the subsequent amendments, which were allowed without objection, cured any defect of this nature in the original, and rendered it good as against the demurrers which were filed.

2. The request to charge was properly refused, because the effect of such an instruction would have been to authorize the jury to disregard the plain terms of the contract sued on, and to base their verdict on an understanding between the defendant and the plaintiff's agent which was not expressed in the written agreement.

3. The ground of the motion for a new trial complaining of the refusal of the court to allow counsel to ask a named witness a question therein set out cannot be considered, because it does not appear from the motion what the witness would have answered. Hendrick v. Daniel, 46 S. E. 438, and citations. The evidence of the defendant made out a complete defense to the action against him. The jury believed it, and rendered a verdict in his favor, which was approved by the trial judge, and we will not disturb it.

USURY—EVIDENCE.

1. The evidence being insufficient to support the verdict, the court erred in overruling the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Monroe County; E. J. Reagan, Judge.

Action by the Equitable Mortgage Company against M. M. Watson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

For former opinion, see 43 S. E. 49.

Payne & Tye, J. A. Noyes, and Cabaniss & Willingham, for plaintiff in error. Robt. L. Berner, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. The Equitable Mortgage Company sued Mrs. Watson on a promissory note for the sum of $2,472.50 principal, besides interest and attorney's fees, and prayed for a general judgment, and for a special lien upon a certain tract of land which it alleged had been conveyed to it as security for the debt. The defendant filed several pleas, in two of which she alleged that the debt was infected with usury, and therefore the security deed was void, and the plaintiff was not entitled to the special lien prayed for. Upon a former trial the defendant abandoned all her alleged defenses except that of usury, admitted a prima facie case for the plaintiff, and assumed the burden of showing that the debt which the deed was given to secure was infected with usury. Upon that trial the jury found a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the principal and interest of its debt, but found in favor of the defendant upon the plea of usury, and against the special lien claimed by the plaintiff. There was a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the case was brought to this court, where the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial was reversed; this court holding that "there was no evidence to authorize the finding against the special lien prayed for by the plaintiff." Equitable Mortgage Co. v. Watson, 116 Ga. 679, 43 S. E. 49. In rendering the judgment of reversal, this court gave direction that such judgment should not have the effect of setting aside the verdict in so far as it found in favor of the plaintiff for the principal and interest of its debt, and that the new trial should be had upon two issues only, viz., whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to the special lien prayed for; and, if so, should the judgment include attorney's fees? Page 685, 116 Ga., 43 S. E. 49. When the case again came on for trial in the lower court, counsel representing the parties agreed in open court to submit to the jury only the issue as to whether or not the plaintiff was entitled to the special lien prayed for, and to leave to the court the determination of the question in reference to attorney's fees. The jury found against the special lien. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was overruled, and it excepted.

The defendant admitted a prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff, and assumed the burden of showing that the deed under which the plaintiff claimed the special lien was void because of the existence of usury therein. In our opinion, she failed to establish her plea of usury, and therefore the verdict finding against the special lien is without evidence to support it. When the case was here before, this court held that "while, to support a plea of usury filed for the purpose of invalidating a deed given to secure a debt, the evidence need not establish the usury with the particularity required when it is sought to recover back or set off the usury, still the evidence must show with certainty that the transaction was tainted with usury." It also held: "In a given case, where the lender might reserve a portion of the loan without infecting the transaction with usury, it is incumbent on one who alleges usury to show the exact amount reserved." See first and second headnotes to the case. Three things were then established: First, that this was a case in which the lender might have reserved a portion of the loan without infecting the transaction with usury; second, that it was incumbent upon the defendant to establish with certainty that the transaction was tainted with usury; and, third, that it was incumbent on her to show the exact amount of the loan reserved, as under the facts of the case it was legally possible for the lender to reserve a portion of the loan without making the transaction usurious, which takes the case out of the well-settled general rule that, in order to successfully attack a deed as usurious, it is only necessary to show the bare fact that it is tainted with usury, without showing the exact amount thereof. Mr. Justice Cobb, who then delivered the opinion of the court, stated the documentary evidence introduced by the plaintiff, and the testimony of Alonzo Richardson, who testified in behalf of the plaintiff, and concluded that this evidence authorized a finding in favor of the plaintiff, and that, if there was nothing to contradict this evidence, such a finding was demanded. The evidence which supports the plaintiff's case in the present record is substantially the same as that with which Mr. Justice Cobb, speaking for the court, was then dealing. The same documentary evidence was introduced upon this trial, and Richardson again testified substantially as he did before, except that upon this last trial he testified that, of the $2,300 received from the mortgage company upon the note, the Atlanta Trust & Banking Company received $172.50, and L. L. Ray $115, as commissions for procuring the loan for the defendant.

In what respect, then, does the case as now made differ from the case as then made? Then the defendant relied mainly upon the testimony of her husband to show usury in the deed, which testimony this court held to be insufficient for such purpose. Now, her husband's testimony does not appear in the case, and she relies mainly upon her own depositions. The most cursory examination of the brief of her testimony contained in the record shows that she did not and could not know the facts which she undertook to prove by her testimony. It is true that when asked, upon direct examination, to "state whether or not any money was reserved by the Equitable Mortgage Company," she answered: "It was all kept back, except $29, and what was paid in settlement of first loan. It was all reserved, except the amount used to pay off the first loan, and $29 in cash delivered to me by my husband." But if she, as contended by her counsel, meant by this to say that the Equitable Mortgage Company kept back all the sum represented by the principal of the note, except the amount used to pay off the old loan and the $29 delivered to her by her husband, her answers to the cross-interrogatories, irrespective of other circumstances in the case to which we shall presently allude, show clearly and conclusively that she did not and could not know this. She answered the cross-interrogatories as follows: "The money was borrowed for the purpose of paying off an existing loan on the land, in order to get the benefit of a lower rate of interest and to improve the farm. I suppose the old loan was paid out of the money, as this was the purpose of the loan. My husband received the money for the purpose stated. He attended to all my business. I was sick in bed at the time. I did not handle the money. My husband attended to it for me at my direction. I only handled $29 which my husband brought me: I looked to the loan company to send me the remainder of the money, over and above what it took to pay off the existing loan. The other loan was satisfied. I don't know of any other amount but the $29 that was received by me or my husband on said loan. The other was kept back, and I looked to the lender for it. I don't know what was done with it, other than I have stated. I know it was kept back, because it was never sent to us. They kept back the difference between what was due on the old loan and the new. It was my understanding that I was to get, to the best of my recollection, $475 in money, after paying off the first loan, when I signed the notes. My husband looked after the borrowing and paying out of the money for me. I received $29 through my husband. I did not see any money paid my husband. He gave me only $29. I only know he paid off the old loan, and gave me $29 in cash. I know this from what my husband told me, and from the fact we never received any further notice from first loan. It is true I was examined before by interrogations, and the question was asked me, 'How much money was turned over to you, if any at all?' and I answered it: 'I don't remember. I don't think I got a cent. If I got any at all, it was a very small amount.' I think I added I received $29. My recollection is that I testified as I do now. I don't remember whether I stated in my former interrogatories how much money was kept back. I know how much was kept back, because I only received $29. I knew these facts when the other interrogatories were executed as well as I do now. I have talked to no one about interrogatories. No explanation has been given me as to why it is necessary to take my interrogatories again." We do not think it needs any argument to demonstrate that these answers of the witness show that she did not, of her own knowledge, know the fact which she undertook to establish by her testimony. And this character of hearsay evidence, though admitted, has no probative value. Clafin v. Ballance, 91 Ga. 412, 18 S. E. 309; Eastlick v. Southern R. Co., 116 Ga. 48, 42 S. E. 499; Suttles v. Sewell, 117 Ga. 216, 43 S. E. 486.

But there is other and undisputed evidence in the case which shows that she could not personally know what amount of money the Equitable Mortgage Company actually loaned her. From this evidence it appears that she did not deal directly with the mortgage company, but in obtaining the money she dealt through a chain of agents. The documentary evidence shows that she constituted the Atlanta Trust & Banking Company her agent to procure a loan for her of $2,300 for five years, at 6 per cent. interest, payable annually, to be secured by a mortgage on or a deed to her farm, to be made to such person or corporation as the trust company might procure to advance the money; that L. L. Ray was her agent in dealing with the trust company, and was duly authorized by her to receive the money procured by the trust company from the mortgage company. Here were two agents of hers interposed between her and the mortgage company. Her third agent is shown by her testimony to have been her husband. So it appears from the evidence that her husband represented her in her dealings with Ray, Ray represented her in her dealings with the trust company, and the trust company represented her in her dealings with the mortgage company. Dealing through this string of agents, and, so far as the evidence discloses, having direct communication with only one of them—her husband—how was she to know how much money was received from the mortgage company? She knew how much money was received by herself from her husband. But her testimony shows that she did not know, of her own knowledge, how much he received from Ray, nor how much Ray received from the trust company, nor how much the trust company received from the mortgage company. What she actually received from her husband was not the question; but the vital question was, what did her agent the trust company receive from the mortgage company? Even if she had shown how much money her husband received from Ray, and also how much Ray received from the trust company, she would have failed to carry the burden which she assumed, unless she went further, and showed how much the trust company received from the mortgage company. If the amount received from the mortgage company by the trust company, shown by the evidence and admitted to have been the duly authorized agent of the defendant, was not such as to render the loan usurious, then the security deed was not tainted with usury. The evidence offered by the plaintiff shows what this amount was, and that it was not such as to render the loan usurious, and so this court decided when the case was here before. The evidence for the defendant wholly fails to overcome this, for the reason that it fails to show what amount she received from the lender in exchange for the note and the mortgage given to secure it.

We might well end this opinion here, but the able and ingenious counsel for the defendant in error has earnestly insisted that there is a circumstance, deducible from the evidence in the case, which shows that the $29 in cash which the defendant testified she received from her husband was in fact all of the amount loaned to her by the mortgage company, except the sum used in settling the old loan upon the property. We will state the circumstances upon which the counsel relies. The defendant introduced a certificate of deposit issued by the trust company, reciting that the mortgage company had deposited with the trust company the sum of $2,012.50, payable only after a certificate on the back thereof should be signed by Mrs. Watson, to the order of L. L. Ray, agent of Mrs. Watson, and upon a return of the certificate of deposit, properly indorsed. She also introduced the old note, with interest coupons attached thereto, which was taken up with proceeds of the new loan. Richardson, the plaintiff's witness, as we have said, testified that, from the $2,300 which the mortgage company turned over to the trust company for Mrs. Watson, the trust company received $172.50 as commissions, and Ray received $115 as commissions. The counsel contends that when the sum of $287.50, the aggregate amount of these commissions, is added to the amount of the principal and interest that was due upon the old loan at the time it was paid off, and the total is subtracted from the amount of the certificate of deposit, there is left exactly $29, the amount which Mrs. Watson testified she received from her husband in cash, and that this coincidence between her testimony as to the amount which her husband turned over to her, and the amount which would have been left if the commissions were paid out of the $2,012.50 deposited to Mrs. Watson's credit with the trust company, shows that the mortgage company only loaned to her $2,012.50. When the note representing the old loan was taken up, one of the coupons attached thereto was past due; and as both the note and the coupon, from its maturity, bore interest at 8 per cent. per annum, in making his calculation the counsel added together the principal of the note and the principal of the coupon, and then calculated the interest upon the aggregate sum from February 1, 1890, the date of the maturity of the coupon, to May 5, 1890, the date when the old note was paid off. But in making the calculation he computed the interest for a period of three months and five days, and, so computed, the mathematical result at which he arrived is correct. But as we understand it, the period of time for which the interest should have been calculated is three months and four days; and, if the calculation is made for this period, the difference between the amount of the certificate of deposit and the sum of the commissions and the amount due on the old loan will be $29.36, instead of the exact amount which Mrs. Watson testified her husband paid her, viz., $29. As, during the course of her examination, Mrs. Watson testified eight different times that the amount of cash which she received was $29, never once intimating that that was not the precise amount which she received from her husband, and in three of these instances stated that it was "only" $29, the force of the argument drawn from the alleged coincidence to which the counsel calls our attention is considerably weakened, if the interest is calculated for the correct period. But even admitting that the period for which the counsel calculated the interest was the correct one, we do not think much importance is to be attached to the result of his figures. At best, it raises a mere suspicion that the defendant's contention may be true, but does not prove that it is true. Let us consider for a moment the process of reasoning which must be pursued in order to reach the conclusion that the evidence shows "with certainty that the transaction was tainted with usury," and shows "the exact amount reserved" by the lender, for this is what this court held the evidence must show in order to sustain the defendant's plea in this case. Mrs. Watson, without knowing the amount received from the mortgage company by her agent the trust company, without knowing the amount turned over by the trust company to her other agent, Ray, and without even knowing what amount her husband received for her from Ray, testifies that her husband turned over to her only $29. Inasmuch as this happens to be the exact amount in cash which she ought to have received, if the mortgage company had only turned over to her agent the trust company the $2,012.50 represented by the certificate of deposit, and from this the trust company and Ray had, respectively, deducted the commissions which Richardson testified they received, and the attorneys representing the holder of the old loan had received in settlement of the same neither more nor less than the exact amount due when the settlement was made, therefore Mrs. Watson has successfully carried the burden which she assumed, by proving "with certainty" that the transaction between the mortgage company and herself "was tainted with usury," and by showing "the exact amount reserved" from the loan by the lender. In our opinion, this reasoning is fallacious. The argument here indicated proceeds upon the theory that, because certain proved facts will harmonize perfectly with certain assumed facts, therefore the assumed facts must have occurred. It assumes that the $287.50 of commissions received by the trust company and Ray were taken from the $2,012.50 represented by the certificate of deposit, in the face of Richardson's uncontradicted testimony that they were taken from $2,300 loaned by the mortgage company to Mrs. Watson, leaving the exact amount of the certificate of deposit, and in face of the fact that the trust company issued a certificate of deposit in favor of Mrs. Watson for $2,012.50. It assumes that the amount paid in settlement of the old loan was neither more nor less than the sum due thereon when the settlement was effected. It assumes that the $29 received by Mrs. Watson from her husband was all the cash which he received from Ray; that Ray received only $2,012.50 from the trust company, and the trust company only received this sum from the mortgage company; and because these assumed facts will harmonize perfectly with the proved facts, viz., that the trust company and Ray received in commissions $287.50, that Mrs. Watson got only $29 from her husband, that the certificate of deposit was for $2,012.50, and the amount due on the old loan was a certain sum, therefore Mrs. Watson has shown with certainty that the transaction was tainted with usury. When the case was here before, Mr. Justice Cobb said: "It is said, though, that under the documentary evidence it appears that the trust company received from the plaintiff only $2,012.50. It is true that the documentary evidence shows that this amount was received by the trust company, but that evidence does not show that this was all that was received, and Richardson swears positively that $2,300 was received. If $2,300 was received by the trust company, the transaction is not usurious. It therefore becomes necessary to determine whether there is any evidence on this point, contradicting Richardson, which would authorize a finding for the defendant." He concluded that there was nothing in the evidence offered by the defendant which contradicted Richardson's testimony. Then the strongest evidence for the defendant was that of her husband, who testified that he thought the lender reserved about $475 at the time the loan was negotiated. Now the case in favor of the plaintiff is practically the same as it was then, and the only material change in the case for the defendant is the substitution of her testimony for that of her husband; and her testimony shows that, of her own knowledge, she knew nothing about the amount reserved by the lender. So, as much as we dislike to set aside verdicts upon mere questions of fact, we are constrained to again do so in this case. While it is very desirable that there should be an end of litigation, a court should never hesitate to set aside a verdict which is unsupported by evidence merely because such verdict is but a repetition of previous verdicts in the same case which have been set aside for a like reason.

FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. OF MARYLAND v. NISBET, Clerk of Superior Court, et al.

HARMLESS ERROR—PLEADING—AMENDMENT—STARE DECISIS—RECEIVER—ACTION ON BOND—EVIDENCE—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. Where a plaintiff, in whom the legal right of action existed, brought suit for the use of others, who were not named in the petition, but merely indicated therein by reference to a designated decree of the court, and the defendant demurred to the petition upon the ground that the names of the usees did not appear therein, and no copy of the decree referred to was attached thereto, the overruling of the demurrer, if erroneous, was rendered harmless, when the plaintiff during the trial amended the petition by inserting therein the names of the usees.

2. As the petition stated a cause of action in the plaintiff against the defendants, an objection to such an amendment upon the ground that there was not enough in the petition to amend by was without merit.

3. The unanimous decision of this court upon a question of law arising upon a given state of facts is, until reviewed and overruled, a precedent which must be followed in any subsequent case in which the same question is raised upon the same state of facts.

(a) The present case being a suit upon a receiver's bond, by the obligee therein against the principal and surety, and the surety having set up the same defense as that made by the receiver in the case of Tindall v. Nisbet, 39 S. E. 450, 113 Ga. 1114, 55 L. R. A. 225, and the facts depended upon to support it being the same as those upon which the receiver relied in that case, it follows that the decision then rendered by this court in the contempt proceeding against the receiver controls the main question presented in the case now in hand.

4. Where evidence is offered and objected to, if it is competent for any purpose it is not erroneous to admit it.

5. There was no error in striking, upon demurrer, so much of an amendment to an answer as was based upon a wholly untenable theory, even though the demurrer did not attack the amendment upon this precise ground.

6. As there was nothing in the defense set up which could prevent any of the usees from entering a retraxit and withdrawing from the case, it was not erroneous to allow one of them to do so.

7. Assignments of error alleging that, for specified reasons, the court erred in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, so far as a named usee was concerned, are without merit when there was nothing in the defense set up which could have prevented a recovery by the plaintiff for the benefit of this usee.

If any of these assignments of error was intended to raise the question whether this particular usee was estopped from recovering against the surety upon the receiver's bond, it is sufficient to say that the surety did not plead estoppel against such usee.

8. There was no error in directing a verdict for the plaintiff for the full amount sued for, and, if there was error in directing that the verdict should provide that such amount should be credited with the portion thereof to which the usee who had entered the retraxit would otherwise have been entitled, it was error of which the surety upon the receiver's bond could not complain.

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; B. D. Evans, Judge.

Action by R. A. Nisbet, clerk of the Bibb superior court, and others, against the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Guerry & Hall, for plaintiff in error. Bacon, Miller & Brunson, C. P. Steed, Harde-man, Davis, Turner & Jones, John P. Ross, John I. Hall, Anderson & Grace, and Dessau, Harris & Harris, for defendants in error.

FISH, P. J. In the view which we take of this case, it is not necessary to determine all the questions raised in the court below, and presented here by the bill of exceptions, nor to state all the facts which are contained in the voluminous record. A full statement of the facts leading up to the present litigation will be found in the report which precedes the opinion in the case of Tindall v. Nisbet, 113 Ga. 1114, 39 S. E. 450, 55 L. R. A. 225. The main and controlling question in the case can be reached and decided without passing upon some of the minor questions made in the trial court, and by leaving unconsidered a considerable portion of the evidence for the plaintiff which was admitted over objections of the defendant, who appears as the plaintiff in error here; the consideration thereof being rendered unnecessary by an agreed statement of facts which was introduced in evidence. The facts shown by the record which we deem necessary to an understanding of the decision we now make are as follows: On January 9, 1894, H. C. Tindall was duly appointed permanent receiver for the Macon Hardware Company. In the order of appointment, he was required to make and file in the office of the clerk of the superior court of Bibb county a good and sufficient bond, in the sum of $25,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties as receiver under the order, and such other orders as might be passed in the case; the bond to be approved by such clerk. The order of appointment further provided that the receiver should deposit all moneys coming into his hands in four banks located in the city of Macon, viz., the Exchange Bank, the American National Bank, the Central Georgia Bank, and the Macon Savings Bank; the deposits to be divided among these banks, as near as might be, in the proportion that the amount due by the Macon Hardware Company to each bank bore to the whole sum done by it to all of them, provided that the banks would pay interest upon such deposits, if left for the space of six months, at the rate of five per cent. per annum, and that no checks should be drawn against such deposits, except in the name of the receiver, and countersigned by the judge presiding of the court, except that checks drawn for expenses might be drawn without being so countersigned, but all such checks should specify for what expenses they were drawn. The terms of this order as to the manner in which checks should be drawn against the deposits were reiterated by orders subsequently passed by different judges presiding in the case. Tindall executed this bond, the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland (hereinafter called the Fidelity Company) becoming the surety thereon. On the 25th of March, 1901, Nisbet, as clerk of the superior court of Bibb county, and the obligee in this bond, brought suit thereon against the obligors therein, alleging that Tindall, as receiver, had in his hands, in the administration of his trust, the sum of $26,596.23, and that of this amount he had failed to account for the sum of $6,021.17, which had been adjudged and decreed by the superior court of Bibb county to be in his hands, and that he had failed and refused to account for or to pay this latter sum, although required so to do by the orders and decrees of the court. No answer appears to have been filed by Tindall. In its answer the Fidelity Company denied the right and authority of the plaintiff to bring the suit, denied that the court had lawfully decreed that the plaintiff was entitled to recover any funds in the hands of the receiver, and denied that there were any such funds in the hands of the receiver at the date of the alleged decree of the court, and at the time of the filing of the suit against the receiver.

The answer further averred that there had been no accounting properly required of the receiver for the alleged fund, and that there had been no adjudication upon any proper proceedings of any amount or balance as against the receiver, and for such reason no suit could be legally brought against the Fidelity Company upon the bond on account of any alleged default of the receiver. It also denied that there had been any breach of the bond. It further averred that the receiver deposited the funds which came into the hands of the Exchange Bank, the American National Bank, the Central Georgia Bank, and the Macon Savings Bank, all of the city of Macon, dividing his deposits amongst said banks, as near as might be, in the proportions which the amount due by the Macon Hardware Company bore to the whole sum due by it to all of such banks, at interest at 5 per cent. per annum, etc.; that the order of the court expressly provided and commanded that no check should be drawn against such deposits, except in the name of Tindall as receiver, and countersigned by the presiding judge of the court; that the sum of money sued for was composed of portions of the money deposited in such banks, and loaned to them under these provisions of the order of the court, and that none of said sum was ever drawn out or collected of these banks by the court, or by the receiver upon checks signed by him and countersigned by the presiding judge of the court; and that the entire sum sued for was still in the hands of these banks, and still owing to the court, and to the receiver as such, and to the parties at interest in said cause, subject to be checked out or collected under order of the court, as provided in the order of the court. It alleged that the sum sued for, after being deposited in these banks under the order of the court, went into their custody for the court, and for the benefit of the parties at interest, and at the same time went out of the custody of the receiver, and that neither said sum, nor any part thereof, had since then come into the custody of the receiver, as such, and that while said sum was in the custody of these banks the defendant, Fidelity Company, owed the court or the parties at interest no duty concerning the same upon its bond or otherwise; that the banks had never had the legal power to dispose of the same, or any part thereof, or to pay up the loans made to them, or any part thereof, except under order of the court, or upon checks of the receiver countersigned by the presiding judge of the court, and that, so far as the sum sued for was concerned, these banks had not paid out the same, or any part thereof, under any order of the court, or upon any check of the receiver countersigned by the judge; that each of the banks was a party to the cause in which the receiver was appointed, as well as a depository of the court as to said sum, and, as such party and depository, had both constructive and actual notice of the orders of the court relative to such fund, and was bound thereby and liable to pay over the sum sued for as might be required by the court.

By an amendment to its original answer, the Fidelity Company alleged that the money for which the suit was brought was deposited with and loaned to the Exchange Bank, the American National Bank, and the Central Georgia Bank, pursuant to the orders of Bibb superior court, and upon the terms of such orders; that this money had never been withdrawn or collected from said banks pursuant to the orders of said court, but these banks still had and were liable for it, and were bound to refund it as the court might direct, the amount thereof for which each bank was alleged to be liable being named; that, under the orders of the court, these banks became depositaries of the court, and became liable to pay to the court, or the receiver, or the creditors of the Macon Hardware Company, or to the clerk of the court, or to any person or persons the court might designate, the balance of the money deposited with them by the receiver, which they had never paid over to the court, or to any person authorized to receive such money; and that each of these banks should be required to pay the amount due by it, with interest, into court or to the parties entitled thereto, viz., the usees of the plaintiff. There was a prayer that, to this end, each of these banks should be made a party to this particular case, should be served with a copy of the proceedings, and be required to pay over said sum to the court or its order. This amendment was allowed, subject to demurrer, and each of these banks required to show cause why the prayers of the amendment should not be granted. Subsequently each of these banks demurred to this amendment, and the demurrers were sustained to so much of the amendment as sought to make these banks parties defendant to the case, and the Fidelity Company excepted.

At the trial the Fidelity Company demurred orally to the plaintiff's petition, and moved to dismiss it, upon the ground that no usee was named therein, and because no copy of the decree referred to in the petition was attached, and because it did not appear in the petition, or in any exhibit attached thereto, who the usees were. The court overruled this demurrer, and the Fidelity Company excepted. Subsequently the court allowed the plaintiff to amend the petition by inserting the names of various parties as usees, among them being the American National Bank and the Central Georgia Bank, and to this ruling the Fidelity Company excepted. After this amendment was allowed, the Central Georgia Bank filed a disclaimer of any interest in any recovery that might be had in the case, and asked to be dismissed as a usee plaintiff from the case, and entered "a retraxit on so being dismissed from said case." The court granted the application, over the objection of the Fidelity Company, which thereupon excepted to this ruling.

At the close of the evidence "the plaintiff moved the court to direct a verdict for the plaintiff for all of the usees whose names had been inserted by amendment, including the American National Bank, but not including the Central Georgia Bank." The Fidelity Company resisted this motion, and moved the court to direct a verdict in its favor "in so far as the American National Bank was concerned." "The court granted the motion of the plaintiff, and overruled the motion of the Fidelity Company and directed a verdict for the plaintiff for the principal and interest against the Fidelity Company, less the amount the Central Georgia Bank would be entitled to." The case is here on writ of error sued out by the Fidelity Company.

1. The right of action for a breach of the bond was in the plaintiff, Nisbet, as clerk of the superior court of Bibb county; and he could have brought the suit without naming any usee at all, or, so far as the defendants were concerned, he could have sued for the use of any person or persons whom he might designate to take the proceeds of the action, provided, in so doing, he did not cut the defendants off from any defense which they would otherwise have. Burke v. Steel, 40 Ga. 217; Buffington v. Blackwell, 52 Ga. 129; Gilmore v. Bangs, 55 Ga. 403; Cross v. Johnson, 65 Ga. 717; Davis v. Baker, 71 Ga. 33; Richmond & Danville R. Co. v. Bedell, 88 Ga. 591, 15 S. E. 676; Terrell v. Stevenson, 97 Ga. 570, 25 S. E. 352; Joiner v. Singletary, 106 Ga. 257, 32 S. E. 90; Norcross Manufacturing Co. v. Summerour, 114 Ga. 156, 39 S. E. 870. But as the plaintiff brought his suit for the use of certain judgment creditors of the Macon Hardware Company, who were not identified in the petition otherwise than by reference to a designated decree of the court, we are inclined to think it would have been proper to have sustained the demurrer, unless the plaintiff either amended his petition by setting forth the names of the usees, or by striking therefrom all reference to them. A defendant might have a defense which he could set up against a usee, but could not urge against the person in whom the legal right to sue existed; and, where the plaintiff sues for the use of another, it would seem the defendant is entitled to know who the usee is, and good pleading requires that he should not be compelled to look beyond the petition in order to ascertain this. But if there were any errors in overruling the demurrer, it was cured when the plaintiff subsequently amended his petition by setting forth the names of the usees. The contention that he could not do this over the objection of the defendant Fidelity Company is without merit. The error assigned in the bill of exceptions is that there was not enough in the petition to amend by. There were a plaintiff, defendants, and a cause of action. No more was needed to enable the plaintiff to amend his petition by naming the parties whom he chose to designate as usees. As a matter of fact, however, the amendment merely made perfectly plain, on the face of the petition, the names of the usees, who were already indicated therein by reference to a designated decree of the court.

2. During the progress of the trial the parties to the case entered into the following agreement: "It is agreed that the sum of $6,021.27, the principal amount in dispute in this case, is represented by checks to that amount drawn and signed by H. C. Tindall as receiver of the Macon Hardware Company upon the Exchange Bank, the Central Georgia Bank, and the American National Bank, without being countersigned by the presiding judge of the court, and without any special order being granted allowing the drawing of said checks, and that all of said checks were paid by said banks (the Exchange Bank to the sum of $2,901.53; the Central Georgia Bank, $2,644.30; and the American National Bank, the sum of —) and that none of these checks had upon them any statement in reference to expenses; that said checks were paid by the several banks, and charged to the account of the receiver in said bank; that said checks were drawn by the said Tindall, and that he appropriated the money so drawn to his own use, and has never accounted for the same; and that the contention of the plaintiff was that the money so drawn was funds deposited in said banks by Tindall as receiver, while the contention of the Fidelity Company was that the money so drawn was not such fund, because, under the law and orders of the court, the money so drawn was not such fund, but was the moneys of the banks." This was agreed to unqualifiedly by all of the parties except the American National Bank, which did not object to any agreement made as to the other banks, but required proof as to itself, on the ground that it denied that it was a depository. The Fidelity Company thereupon introduced evidence for the purpose of showing that Tindall, as receiver, had drawn certain checks, which were not for expenses, and were not countersigned by the presiding judge, nor specially allowed by order of the court, upon said bank, which were paid by the bank, and the amount so drawn from such bank by him. The consideration and determination of this case are greatly simplified by this agreement made in open court. In view of the admissions made by the Fidelity Company in this agreement, some of the questions raised in the court below and brought to this court for decision become immaterial. Here is an agreement which, in the light of the decision rendered by this court in Tindall v. Nisbet, 113 Ga. 1114, 39 S. E. 450, 55 L. R. A. 225, absolutely settles the main and controlling question made in the case. That question was whether the money which Tindall, as receiver, drew from the Exchange Bank, the Central Georgia Bank, and the American National Bank—three of the banks in which he had been required, by order of the court, to deposit the receivership funds—upon checks signed by him as receiver, but not countersigned by the judge of the court, nor allowed by any special order of the court, and not for expenses, was part of the trust fund committed to his keeping, or merely funds of these banks paid out by them to Tindall, not as receiver, but as a private individual. This was the great subject of dispute in the case, the Fidelity Company having set up the defense that as the orders of the court provided that no money, except for expenses, should be drawn by the receiver from the funds deposited in bank, without the check for such money being countersigned by the judge, and as the banks had either actual or constructive notice of these orders, the money which Tindall obtained from them upon checks drawn by him as receiver, not for expenses, and not countersigned by the judge, was no part of the receivership funds, and therefore, although Tindall appropriated it to his own use, and failed to account for it, he committed no breach of his bond as receiver in so doing, and hence his surety on such bond was not liable. This very question, except as to the effect of its decision upon the liability of the surety on the receiver's bond, was made by Tindall in the above-cited case, and was there decided adversely to him and to the contention of the Fidelity Company in the present case. It was there expressly decided: "If a receiver has been directed by the court to deposit a fund arising from the sale of property of the debtor in banks, subject to be withdrawn only on his check when the same has been countersigned by the judge presiding in the court which appointed him, and, in violation of his duty and in disregard of the order of the court, the receiver obtains such funds from the bank, on checks not countersigned, and appropriates the same to his own use, then, regardless of the question whether or not the bank is liable for such wrongful payment, such receiver is in direct contempt of the court, whose officer he is, and he may be attached and punished for contempt in disregarding the orders of the court, and also for a failure or refusal, when so ordered, to pay into court the fund so misappropriated."

3. It will be seen at once that the decision was by no means confined to the question whether or not Tindall could be attached and punished for contempt in disobeying the orders of the court in reference to the manner in which the money should be withdrawn by him from the banks, but it expressly determined that he could also be attached and punished for contempt for his failure or refusal, when so ordered, to pay into court the funds which he had withdrawn from the banks, upon checks not countersigned by the judge, and appropriated to his own use. This latter question was the main one in the case, for the trial judge had "made the rule absolute, requiring [Tindall] to pay at once to the clerk the sum [of $6,021.17], and ordered that he be committed to jail for contempt of court, and remain in custody until he can show that he has purged himself of the contempt by repaying the fund adjudged to have been misappropriated by him, and that he has been sufficiently punished, or by showing that he has been sufficiently punished, and is unable, by reason of his poverty, to repay said amount." 113 Ga. 1126. So it is perfectly clear that in that case it was decided, both by the trial court and by this court, that the money which Tindall withdrew from the banks upon checks signed by himself as receiver, and not countersigned by the judge, and not for expenses, was a portion of the receivership funds. He could not have been punished for contempt of the court because he failed to pay into court money which he had obtained from these banks, unless such money, when received by him from the banks, was received in his capacity as receiver of the Macon Hardware Company, and was receivership funds. It matters not whether the surety on the receiver's bond is or is not bound by the judgment rendered in that case. We may grant the contention of the Fidelity Company, so ably and forcibly presented here by its learned counsel, that it is not bound by that judgment, and has the right now to make the same question which the receiver then made, and to invoke a ruling by this court, upon identically the same facts, directly opposed to the one which was then rendered. Still the fact remains that this court then unanimously decided, on the very facts established by the agreement of the parties in this case, as a matter of law, that the funds which Tindall withdrew from these banks, upon checks signed by him as receiver, but not countersigned by the judge, were receivership funds, which he could be required to pay into court, and that, upon his failure to do so when so ordered by the court, he could be attached and imprisoned for contempt. It seems almost superfluous to say that when this court has, by a unanimous decision, decided the legal result of a given state of facts, it has established a precedent which, until the decision is reviewed and overruled, is bound to control any subsequent case in which the same question is presented on the same state of facts. If the legal effect of the facts established in Tindall's case was that he had misappropriated trust funds committed by the court to his keeping as receiver, the legal effect of these same facts, admitted by the surety, in the present case, is that Tindall misappropriated such funds.

4. The bill of exceptions recites that "the decree of February 22, 1901, was offered in evidence, and the Fidelity Company objected to the same, and offered then and there to show that the same was void because rendered by consent, as contended by it; that the said decree was not accompanied by the record in the case, or any part thereof. And the court * * * overruled said objection, and denied the Fidelity Company said privilege." "The Fidelity Company at the same time objected further, specifically to that part of the decree that fixed the amount of the liability of Tindall on the ground that there were no pleadings to justify any findings, and because he had not been called upon to show cause or to make any account, the Fidelity Company claiming that for such reasons that part of the decree was not binding upon it; and the court overruled this objection also." Each of these rulings of the court is assigned for error. The plaintiff also offered in evidence the petition, the rule nisi, and the rule absolute in the contempt proceedings against Tindall. "The Fidelity Company objected on the ground that neither the petition, the rule nisi, nor the rule absolute was pleaded or referred to as fixing the liability of Mr. Tindall or the Fidelity Company, and the court overruled the objection, and allowed them all in evidence." This ruling is also assigned for error. We judge, from the record, that all of this documentary evidence was introduced before the introduction of the agreed statement of facts. It was certainly admissible in evidence for one purpose, if for no other, and the facts agreed upon render it unnecessary for us to decide whether or not it was admissible, as offered, for any other. It was admissible to prove the demand by the court upon its receiver for the principal sum for which the plaintiff sued. The decree, after finding that the receiver was chargeable with a stated amount, and distributing a certain sum therefrom, adjudged that there was left in his hands $6,106.26, which he was required to pay over at once to the clerk of the court. The rule absolute in the contempt proceedings adjudged that the receiver was in contempt of court, and that, from the evidence, he was properly chargeable with the sum of $6,021.17, for which he had failed and refused to account, and required him to at once pay said sum to the clerk of the court. Whatever may have been the scope of the purpose of the plaintiff in offering these documents in evidence, and whatever merit, if any, there may have been in the objections urged by the Fidelity Company to them at the time they were offered, it is quite evident to us that, in connection with the agreed statement of facts, they were admissible in evidence in so far as they established the fact that Tindall had been duly required by the court to pay over to the clerk of the court the amount of the receivership funds which he had wrongfully withdrawn from the banks and appropriated to his own use. They did, as we have just seen, establish this fact. If it were necessary for the plaintiff, in order to establish the breach of the bond, to prove any fact in addition to those contained in the agreed statement, it was this, and this alone. After this agreed statement of facts was introduced, it mattered not under what pleadings or upon what evidence the court had found that Tindall had misappropriated funds committed to his keeping as receiver, and the amount of such funds for which he was liable. Independently of the court's findings upon this subject, the admitted facts established the misappropriation of such funds by Tindall, the amount of such misappropriation, and the fact that he had never accounted for the same. The decree of February 22, 1901, was also admissible for another purpose. It was certainly admissible for the purpose of showing the respective amounts due by the Macon Hardware Company to the plaintiff's usees. Clearly, as to this matter, it made no difference whether the decree was rendered by consent or not, as both the hardware company and these usees, its judgment creditors, were bound by it.

5. The court committed no error of which the Fidelity Company can legally complain in striking so much of the amendment to its answer as sought to have the Exchange Bank, the Central Georgia Bank, and the American National Bank made parties defendant to the case. It is immaterial whether this portion of the amendment was or was not subject to the demurrers respectively filed by these banks, as the Fidelity Company was not hurt by the action of the court thereon. We may say, however, in passing, that it was clearly subject to the demurrer of the Exchange Bank, which was in no sense a party to the case, not being one of the plaintiff's usees. The theory of the amendment was wholly untenable. It was the same as that of the original answer, with which we have dealt in discussing the main and controlling question in the case. The theory upon which the surety company based its defense, both in the original answer and this amendment, was that there had been no misappropriation of the receivership funds by its principal, because the money which Tindall withdrew from these banks in violation of the orders of the court, and applied to his own use, was not drawn from the funds deposited in the banks by him as receiver, but was money belonging to these banks, which they had advanced to him, and for which he was responsible to them alone, and that the funds for the recovery of which this suit was brought by the obligee in the bond were still on deposit in these banks, and they could be compelled to pay them into court. The purpose of the amendment was to have these three banks made parties defendant, in order that they might be compelled to pay into court money which they still held on deposit for the receiver. Now, we have seen that this court, upon facts the same as those presented in the present case, has decided that the receivership funds involved in this case have been withdrawn from these banks by the receiver, and misappropriated by him. We have seen, also, that it makes no difference whether the surety on the receiver's bond was or was not bound by this ruling, as the decision of this court upon a question of law arising upon a given state of facts declares the law applicable to the same state of facts in any subsequent case. It necessarily follows that these banks could not be held liable upon the theory that the funds alleged to have been misappropriated by the receiver are still in their hands.

6. From what we have said in reference to the theory of the defense set up by the Fidelity Company, it follows that the court committed no error in allowing the Central Georgia Bank to enter a retraxit as to any interest in the sum for which the plaintiff sued, and to be dismissed as a usee plaintiff from the case. The theory that this bank still had on deposit a portion of the funds for the recovery of which the suit was brought, or that the money which it had paid out on checks drawn by the receiver in violation of the orders of the court had not gone in extinguishment of the amount due to the receiver upon his deposit account, was, as we have seen, untenable. Counsel for the plaintiff in error, in their brief, contend that the court erred in this ruling, because the Fidelity Company had pleaded, "in effect, set-off, and prayed for relief." We do not think that it had pleaded set-off, or anything in the nature of set-off, against this bank, or against any other of the plaintiff's usees. But even granting that there was anything in its pleas which could be given such a construction, it is apparent from its own showing that there was nothing upon which it could base such a plea. It had no claim of its own upon which to found a plea of set-off, for it had expended no money whatever in settlement of its liability upon the receiver's bond, and, until it had done so, it certainly could have no claim against the bank. Whether the Fidelity Company, after making good the loss occasioned by the malfeasance of its principal, would have any lawful claim against the banks which honored the improperly drawn checks of the receiver, is a question which does not arise in this case. Nor did the Fidelity Company's principal, Tindall, have any claim against this bank upon which the surety upon his bond could base a plea of set-off, for, under the decision in Tindall v. Nisbet, supra, the payment of his checks by the bank went in extinguishment of the bank's liability to the receiver; otherwise it could not have been held that the money which the bank paid on these checks to Tindall was receivership funds, for the misappropriation of which he was in contempt of court.

7. There are several assignments of error in the bill of exceptions upon the rulings of the court on the motions in reference to the direction of a verdict. It is unnecessary to deal here with those which are predicated upon the erroneous theory set up in the de defendant's pleas, which we have already fully discussed. One of the assignments is that the court erred in directing a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, so far as the American National Bank was concerned, because the payment by this bank of the sum deposited with it by the receiver, upon the checks drawn by him in violation of the orders of the court, "was illegal and wrongful on the part of said bank, and the said bank, having thus illegally and wrongfully parted with such sum, had no right to retain or not account for the same, and at the same time recover an amount of the Fidelity Company upon its bond, thus recovering from said company, in effect, an amount of money it had illegally and wrongfully disposed of in manner aforesaid, without the Fidelity Company's knowledge of the same; the said company being entirely without notice and without fault as to said transaction." If this exception is intended to raise the question whether or not this bank was, as a usee plaintiff, estopped from recovering against the Fidelity Company, it is sufficient to say that the latter did not plead estoppel against the bank. It was nowhere alleged in the answer, or any of the amendments thereto, that this bank, or any other usee, was estopped from recovering against the Fidelity Company. It would take a very strained construction of the answer, as amended, to find the doctrine of estoppel even hinted at therein. The Fidelity Company took the broad and untenable position that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in behalf of any of the usees, because the money for which he sued was still on deposit in this and two other named banks, and was lawfully subject to the receiver's checks or to the orders of the court. It fought the usees en masse, and not in detail. None of its pleas was directed against the specific interest of any particular usee, but its whole defense was based upon the theory that it was not liable at all, but the three banks were. It did allege that the action of the banks in paying the checks in controversy was wrongful and illegal, but it pleaded this, not by way of estoppel against the banks named as usees, but for the declared purpose of compelling the banks which had paid these checks to pay the amount of the receiver's alleged misappropriation into court, or to the judgment creditors of the Macon Hardware Company, and for this purpose it vainly sought to have these banks made parties defendant to the cause.

8. Another assignment of error is: "Because the court erred in directing the verdict as follows: For the plaintiff for the full amount sued for, principal and interest, for all of said usees, notwithstanding the Central Georgia Bank had, under order of the court, entered a retransit in so far as its right of recovery was concerned, and for the credit of said unknown amount upon the verdict and judgment after the same should be ascertained." The court committed no error in directing a verdict for the full amount sued for, and if there was error in directing that the amount of the interest in such verdict which the Central Georgia Bank would have been entitled to, if it had not withdrawn from the case, should be credited on the verdict and judgment, it was error in favor of the Fidelity Company and against the plaintiff. In our opinion, the plaintiff had the right to recover the full amount for which he sued. He did not sue for specific amounts in favor of the respective usees, but for one entire sum for all of them; and, notwithstanding the retransit by this bank, he was entitled to recover the whole amount involved in the breach of the bond, if the same was not more than enough to settle the established claims of the remaining usees against the Macon Hardware Company. Had the plaintiff sued without making any usees, he clearly would have been entitled to recover the full amount misappropriated by the receiver, in order that he might bring it into court for distribution; and, if the established claims against the Macon Hardware Company were not sufficient to exhaust the sum recovered, the balance would go back to such company. As he did sue simply for certain named judgment creditors of the hardware company, the fact that one of such usees disclaimed any interest in a recovery by the plaintiff simply inured to the benefit of the remaining usees, if their claims were sufficient to absorb the sum recovered. In such an event, there would be simply more to divide among the remaining usees. As it is clear from the evidence that the amount for which the plaintiff sued was not sufficient to pay the usees remaining after the retransit by the Central Georgia Bank, the Fidelity Company was not injured, but benefited, by the verdict and judgment directed. If the amount to be credited upon the judgment cannot be legally ascertained, the Fidelity Company is not hurt, for, until it is ascertained and credited on the judgment, the judgment cannot be enforced. We apprehend, however, that it can be mathematically and accurately ascertained by a calculation based upon the decree of February 22, 1901, and the judgment in this case.

MURPHY v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—ACCUSATION—NEW TRIAL.

1. Under the act establishing the city court of Fayetteville, which act provides (Laws 1902, p. 133, No. 189, § 81) that "the defendants in criminal cases in said city court shall be tried on a written accusation, setting forth plainly the offense charged, founded upon the affidavit of the prosecutor," etc., the affidavit on which the accusation against the plaintiff in error was founded was sufficient. See Brown v. State, 34 S. E. 1031, 109 Ga. 570, 572, and cases cited; Glass v. State (this day decided) 46 S. E. 435.

guilty, and the judge having on a motion for a new trial approved their finding, this court declines to order a new trial.

RAILROADS—TRESPASSER ON TRAIN—EVIDENCE.

1. When this case was here before (83 S. E. 996, 108 Ga. 807), it was decided that the evidence did not authorize a recovery by the plaintiff. After a careful reading of the record in that case and the one now before us, we find no substantial difference as to the main fact relied upon in the court below for a recovery. The impeachment of the defendant's conductor, relied upon in this case, was not as to the fact which it was necessary for the plaintiff to establish, but as to his habits. There was no evidence which would have authorized a finding that the conductor either kicked the boy off of the train, or so frightened him that he jumped off.

COLEMAN v. NELMS, Sheriff.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 12, 1904.)

HABEAS CORPUS—CONVICTION OF VAGRANCY—BOND—RIGHT TO JURY.

1. The plaintiff in error having been tried and found guilty by a jury on an accusation charging her with being a vagrant, under the act of August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 46), it will be presumed, on a habeas corpus sued out by her, that, before the court passed sentence upon her, she was allowed an opportunity to give bond for her future industry and good conduct for one year, or would have been allowed such opportunity if she had asked for it.

2. The matter of giving a bond under the act mentioned, after verdict, is a proceeding entirely before the court, and requires no action by the jury. See Morton v. Nelms, 45 S. E. 616, 118 Ga. 786.

3. The verdict of a jury having been rendered, as above indicated, even if sentence was improperly passed upon the accused without affording her an opportunity to give bond for future good behavior, she would not be entitled to be discharged upon habeas corpus, but should be held in the custody of the sheriff to await proper sentence in the event she failed to give such bond. MILLER v. GILLISPIE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 22, 1902.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—TITLE IN WIFE—
PRESCRIPTION—FRAUD—EVIDENCE—DEF-POSITIONS—USE IN ANOTHER SUIT.

1. When a wife claims, in a contest against the creditors of her husband, to have purchased and improved real estate, there is a presumption against the bona fides of the transaction, which she cannot overcome except by clear and full proof that the property and improvements were paid for by her with money derived from some source other than her husband.

2. Fraud is to be legally inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case, when they are such as to lead a reasonable man to the conclusion that the property was purchased and improved by the husband with intent to hinder, delay, or defraud existing or future creditors.

3. When, in such case, the transaction is attacked by a subsequent creditor upon the ground of actual fraud, the fact that the transfer or conveyance is not upon a consideration deemed valuable in law may be treated as evidence of the fraud, and need not be alleged in the bill.

4. In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, depositions taken in one suit cannot be used in another, unless the parties are the same, or are in privity, and the subject-matter of the suits is also the same.

5. A deposition taken by the defendant in a suit brought by one creditor to set aside a fraudulent conveyance cannot be used by the defendant in another suit brought by another creditor to impeach the same conveyance, unless by agreement.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Webster County; W. G. Bennett, Judge.

Bill by Rachel F. Miller against J. M. Gillispie and Mary Gillispie. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

C. C. Higginbotham, Edward A. Brannon, Robert C. Linn, and J. M. Hoover, for appellant. Mollohan, McClintic & Mathews, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, J. Assuming that the court properly overruled the demurrer to the bill in this cause, the sole question is whether the lower court properly held that certain real estate owned by Mary E. Gillispie, and situated in the town of Addison, Webster county, was purchased for her by her husband, who is insolvent, in fraud of his creditors, or by her with money so fraudulently furnished by him. Mrs. Gillispie seeks to overcome the presumption which legally arises against her by showing that the lot was bought by her with money of her own, money given to her by her father, money loaned to her by her father, money borrowed by her from her brother-in-law, and money made by her in keeping boarders, selling milk and butter, etc. The two adjoining lots cost $425. The first was conveyed to her by Benjamin Hamrick and wife by deed dated August 18, 1894, in consideration of $200, of which $100 was paid in cash, and the balance, due in one year, secured by a lien reserved in the deed. The other lot was conveyed to her by the same parties by deed dated October 16, 1897, in consideration of $225, the deed reciting the receipt of the purchase money. On the first lot so purchased there has been erected a dwelling house. The contract price for it was $625, exclusive of the painting, which cost $75, and the chimneys and flues, costing $75. Other improvements were put upon the property, including a cellar, costing, as stated by Mrs. Gillispie, $62; a barn, costing $65; a well, costing $40; a pump, $15; and a fence, $15. The total cost of the property and improvements was about $1,397. Mrs. Gillispie says she obtained the money with which this property was bought and improved in the following amounts and from the following sources: Money she had when married, June, 1894, $50; gift from her father, $20; from David Morton note, $20; from David Morton, borrowed money, $10; loan made to her by Delbert Gillispie, $150, for which note was given December 18, 1894; loan made to her by Benjamin Hamrick, $200, for $100 of which a note was given, dated February 4, 1895, and for the residue of which no note was taken; loan made to her by her father, I. W. Skidmore, $400, for which she gave her note, dated June 24, 1895; keeping boarders in the year 1896, $308.10; keeping boarders in the year 1897, $106.10; boarding Delbert Gillispie for three years and eight months at $10 per month, $440; boarding Cherry Woodsell, $80; boarding Rosa Gillispie, $50; milk and butter sold, $50; gift from her father, $100—making a total of $1,984.20. In support of her contentions and testimony, I. W. Skidmore says he furnished her the money which she claims he furnished. Delbert Gillispie testifies that he loaned her said sum of $150, and Benjamin Hamrick testifies that he loaned her the $200 which she says she borrowed from him. She repaid him $100 with the last $100 she received from her father, Skidmore. It is not denied that she kept boarders, although it is not admitted that she received from that source the amount she claims to have made thereby, nor that the profit realized was so large as she claims it was. Moreover, it is contended that her table was largely supplied from the store of her husband, although she says she had a good garden and kept cows. An effort is made to show that her father's circumstances were not such as to have warranted such liberality on his part toward his daughter. While he owns real estate assessed as containing 358 acres, valued at $1,306, it appears that the principal part of it is wild land, and only about 75 acres of it are cultivated. In the year 1890 he was assessed with personal property amounting to $574, including 2 horses valued at $90, 12 head of cattle valued at $163, and 31 head of sheep valued at $39. For the years 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, and 1899 his personal property valuations for the purpose of taxation were, respectively, $456, $636, $389, $238, $223, $232, $279, $229, and $191. While some of the assessors say he mentioned the fact that he had loaned his daughter $400, he was never assessed with it, for the reason that he explained that it was not to be repaid unless he should need it. Other witnesses testify to his having borrowed, or attempted to borrow, small amounts of money at various times; while others testify to his having loaned money at various times in small amounts, to his having paid his bills promptly, and to his always having had money about him. It appears that he has been a thrifty and economical man, and he swears he considers himself worth seven or eight thousand dollars. The improbability of Delbert Gillispie's having loaned the defendant any money is insisted upon for the reason that he was clerk in a store at a salary of about $15 per month, with an allowance of $10 per month for board, and had no money, or very little, at the beginning of his services in January, 1893. In 1895 he was assessed with only $20 worth of personal property; in 1896 with $100, of which $55 was listed under the head of "Money, credits, and investments"; in 1897 with $90, of which $50 was listed under said head; in 1898 with $200, of which $150 was listed under said heading. He says he had about $50 when he came there, besides $15 or $20 due him from another person, which he collected; that he sold a watch for $10 or $12; that he taught a school of penmanship, from which he realized $25 or $30; and that he made as much as $50 from the sale of books, rings, and other articles not kept in the store by his employers. But on March 7, 1894, he had a settlement with his employers, which showed a balance due him of $42.34, as shown by the books, and on the 18th day of December, 1894, he claims to have made this loan, and to have had in money at that time about $277, from which to make it. The ability of Hamrick to make his loan of $200 seems to be conceded.

Other facts bearing upon the question of the bona fides of the transaction between Mrs. Gillispie and her husband necessitate the traversing of a good deal of ground. In 1892 the firm of D. M. Miller & Co., engaged in timber and mercantile business, was composed of D. M. Miller and J. M. Gillispie. Afterwards, and before the dissolution of the copartnership, J. M. Gillispie and his codefendant, Mary E. Gillispie, intermarried. The business of the firm was conducted by Miller and Gillispie. They had a store at Cowen, Webster county, under the personal supervision of Miller, and another at Addison, under the personal control of Gillispie. Delbert Gillispie was a clerk in the store at Addison. He was a brother of J. M. Gillispie, and after the marriage of the latter boarded with him, as did also the wife of Delbert Gillispie part of the time. On the 27th day of January, 1896, the firm was dissolved by the death of Miller. After that event the plaintiff herein, Rachel F. Miller, the widow of D. M. Miller, and J. M. Gillispie, formed another copartnership under the firm name of J. M. Gillispie & Co., and continued the business until in March, 1897, when the new firm was dissolved. The dissolution agreement provided that Gillispie should take the stock of goods and store accounts of the firm, pay all debts of the firm due or to become due, and secure to the plaintiff the payment of one-half of the surplus. An invoice showed the assets at that time to be about $7,600 of which the stock amounted to $4,200 and the accounts to $3,400. Gillispie continued the business at Addison until in January, 1898, when he made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, whose claims amounted to several thousand dollars in excess to the amount realized from his assets. He admits that the business of the firm as first composed was profitable, and that the new firm made a little money during the first year, but nothing the second year; and he claims the business after the retirement of Mrs. Miller was crippled by reason of G. A. Lynch, administrator of D. M. Miller, deceased, and agent of Mrs. Miller, having taken from him accounts amounting to about $2,500, in addition to some money paid him. Lynch admits having received $689.73 from Gillispie, and says he thinks he received accounts and evidences of debt in addition thereto, but does not remember the amount. His settlement as administrator shows heavy liabilities against D. M. Miller, nearly all of which appear to have been for merchandise, but how much of it grew out of his partnership with Gillispie does not appear.

The debt which is sought to be collected by this suit was originally contracted by the firm of D. M. Miller & Co. One note was for $200 dated October 28, 1895, and payable to the order of C. C. Miller. The other was for $100 dated December 14, 1895, and payable to the same person. On the 25th day of April, 1896, the firm of J. M. Gillispie & Co. took up the two notes and gave in lieu thereof their own note for $300 payable to C. C. Miller. This note was part of the firm indebtedness assumed by Gillispie in the dissolution agreement. In May, 1898, F. J. Hively, to whom the note had been assigned, recovered a judgment against Gillispie and Mrs. Miller as partners, and afterwards enforced payment thereof in a chancery suit by the sale of a lot belonging to Mrs. Miller, the plaintiff in this suit.

During the time covered by the purchase of the lots by Mrs. Gillispie and the making of the improvements thereon, as hereinbefore set out, she had dealings in the store of Miller & Co., Gillispie & Co., and J. M. Gillispie, relating directly to her transactions in reference to the purchase and improvement of this property. Part of the purchase money of the lots was paid by J. M. Gillispie to Hamrick, but Mrs. Gillispie and he say she furnished the money, and he acted as her agent. She claims to have had an account at the store, carried on a separate book, which has not been produced, and that she paid her grocery account at the store, but says it amounted to but very little—$50 or $60 in 1896, and $35 or $40 in 1897. She admits that the $625, the contract price for building the house, was paid to Brooks Watson, the contractor, partly in merchandise from the store of D. M. Miller & Co. and partly in money. Watson's store account, including part of the lumber, as having been received from "Harris Boys," and charged as $216.17 amounts to $398.52. At the end of it, under date of June 30, 1895, appears the entry, "Cr. By Mary Gillispie, $398.52," closing the account of Watson. She says she paid that amount in cash to her husband in settlement of Watson's account at the store out of the $400 received from her father about June 24, 1895, but she took no receipt for anything she claims to have paid him. In another place she says of the Watson account: "I paid it to Mr. Gillispie. Part of it was paid in cash and part of it was paid in Delbert Gillispie's board." At another place she says $200 was paid in cash to the Harris boys, and that Watson "got part of the rest of it out of D. M. Miller & Co.'s store in goods, and the balance of it I paid in money." Again, she says, in reference to the $200 paid for the lumber, "I can't answer as to the exact amount, but I paid all that they got out of the store, and, if they were paid any money, Mr. Gillispie paid it, and I paid it back to him." While Mrs. Gillispie says her husband had nothing to do with her business of keeping boarders, she admits that he collected a part of the money from her boarders, but says he paid it over to her. Mr. Little, who did the painting, took part of his pay out of the store, and Mrs. Gillispie says she settled his store account. The same explanation is made as to the payment of Mr. Dilley, who dug the well. Mrs. Gillispie admits that the first $100 paid on the lots was handed to Mr. Hamrick by her husband, but says it was her money.

There is some evidence bearing directly upon the question of good faith toward creditors on the part of the defendants. Minnie Gillispie lived with the defendants while they were building the house and for a short time before. She testifies that she heard J. M. Gillispie say to his wife they were going to buy the lot, and that he asked his wife to pay $50 on it, and said, if she would do so, he would pay the balance. She further says Mr. Gillispie wanted the deed made to her, fearing something might happen, as it was while they were in the store, and there was a possibility of their breaking up, and leaving them without a home. Mrs. O. E. Lynch says she resided at Addison at the time the Gillispies were married, and that they boarded with her for a short time after they were married, and that at the time Mrs. Gillispie had $60. She says Mrs. Gillispie told her she had paid $50 on the lot first purchased, and that Mr. Gillispie had told witness he would pay the remainder on the lot. She further says: "He said he was going to buy and build them a home, and he intended to put it in her name, and that they was in business, and she didn't know what might happen, and that, if anything happened him, it would leave a home for her and her family." Mrs. Lynch also says that in December, 1896, she was at the dwelling house of the Gillispies, and "went to dress their baby, and their articles of clothing were in the trunk. His wife requested me to get them out. I went to get the clothing, and saw something tied up in a piece of zephyr cloth, and, being very heavy, to the looks of it, I opened it, and saw what it contained, and it was gold." She says there was very nearly a quart of it, and she had heard Gillispie say he intended to keep what gold he got. She also says she heard him say that, if Watson were not always in his debt, he would dismiss him from building the house.

The foregoing statement shows that the first lot was purchased, and the transaction sought to be impeached here was begun, before the debt here sought to be collected was originally contracted. Nearly $400 had been paid on the contract for the construction of the house prior to the giving of the notes representing the original debt. This payment was made June 30, 1895, and the first note given to C. C. Miller bears date October 28, 1895, and the other one December 14, 1895. The testimony shows that the improvements, or at least the house, were completed early in the year 1896, not long after the debt was contracted. The note for one-half of the purchase money of the first lot became due August 18, 1895, but just when it was paid does not appear. The deed for the second lot was dated October 16, 1897, and Benjamin Hamrick's receipt for the entire purchase-money of the two lots is dated October 22, 1897. It seems to be established by the evidence that the improvements were not completed until after the debt was contracted. If Gillispie furnished any of the money, it was a gift to his wife, and stands upon the footing of a voluntary conveyance to her, for it is not pretended that she purchased anything from him. As to part of the gift or voluntary settlement, the plaintiff must be treated as a subsequent creditor and as to the balance as an existing creditor. But, if it be established that the gift was made with intent to defraud the creditors of Gillispie, either existing or subsequent, then it is wholly unimportant whether the plaintiff was a creditor at the time of the perpetration of the fraud or became a creditor afterwards. This is well settled in Lockhard v. Beckely, 10 W. Va. 87, where it is held that: "If it be shown that there was mala fides or fraud in fact in the transaction, whether the actual fraudulent intent relates to existing creditors or is directed exclusively against subsequent creditors, the effect is precisely the same, and subsequent creditors may, upon the strength of such fraud, successfully impeach the conveyance." Nor is the distinction laid down in the books between fraudulent conveyances and voluntary conveyances very important here, for in the same case it is held that a conveyance or transfer may be fraudulent and voluntary at the same time. "A voluntary conveyance, as to subsequent creditors, is not void merely on the ground that it was voluntary, and the party indebted at the time it was made; yet upon the question whether it is fraudulent in fact it is proper to consider the circumstances of its being voluntary, and the party indebted at the time; and, if additional circumstances connected with these two be sufficient to show fraud in fact, it is void as to subsequent creditors." So the only inquiry here is whether, upon all the evidence and the circumstances disclosed, there was fraud in fact within the meaning of the principles of law relating to fraudulent conveyances.

During the period covered by the purchase and improvement of these two lots, J. M. Gillispie undoubtedly handled considerable amounts of money, and had the opportunity to secrete in his trunk, in fraud of his creditors and of his copartner, a considerable sum of money in gold, as stated by Mrs. Lynch; probably not so much as she testifies to, but she says she did not measure or count it. From his own testimony it appears that the firm of D. M. Miller & Co. carried on a considerable business, having assets at the time of the death of Miller amounting to about $12,000 and owing debts amounting to $8,900. Gillispie had been in the firm then for about four years. At that time he claims to have been worth about $800. It is not probable that he had been worth more than that at any other time of his connection with the firm. He said the firm had only six or seven hundred dollars over and above its indebtedness in the latter part of the year 1893, when the store was burned out. This may be urged as a reason why it devolved upon his wife to borrow money and provide a home, but it does not eliminate the fact that her husband was handling considerable amounts of money, and could easily have diverted enough of it to make that provision. The crucial question is whether he did it. It would be difficult to hold, in the face of the evidence, that the father of Mrs. Gillispie did not give and loan her the money which he says he did. The same is true as to what she claims to have borrowed from Hamrick. As to the loan made from Delbert Gillispie, there is less certainty as to his ability to make it, but he swears he did so, and produces the note. But in this connection it must be remembered that Mr. Skidmore did not apply this money himself to the purchase and improvement of the property, nor did Mr. Hamrick or Delbert Gillispie. Nor in the case of Mr. Hamrick is it clear that his transactions were had with Mrs. Gillispie personally, for she says that the $100 paid Hamrick on the purchase money was handed to him by Mr. Gillispie, although it was her money. Hamrick himself speaks in general terms. Little, the man who did the painting, only mentions $5 as having been paid to him in cash by Mrs. Gillispie. As to how much she paid in person to any of the contractors, she is silent, although she says she paid part of it in cash. Granting that she borrowed all the money she says she borrowed, it does not follow necessarily that she put that money into the property, nor does it exclude the inference that it was paid for by her husband. It only shows she had some money which she could have paid on the property. But her husband had in his hands money with which he could have paid all on the property. She did very little of the actual paying. He did practically all of it. As to the money derived from keeping boarders, and sale of milk and butter, the evidence is uncertain and inconclusive both as to the amount thus made and as to whether the profits belonged to the wife. Somebody had to cultivate the garden, the family had to be clothed as well as fed, and the groceries came from the store, and only the defendants testify that Mrs. Gillispie paid for them. There is not even a book to corroborate them. Feed had to be furnished for the cows, and that, no doubt, came from the store.

That the firm of D. M. Miller & Co., was carrying a considerable indebtedness during the period covering these transactions is certain. Two witnesses testify directly to the declaration of an intention on the part of both Mr. and Mrs. Gillispie to purchase the first lot with the money of J. M. Gillispie, except as to $50 of it, and have it conveyed to Mrs. Gillispie for the express purpose of providing a home for themselves against a possible reverse in business. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, the law would make this actual fraud against the creditors of the husband. These statements are denied by the defendants, but the circumstance of practically all of this business having been transacted by J. M. Gillispie, much of the work and materials having been paid for out of the store, and the absence of the account which Mrs. Gillispie claims to have had with the store, all tend to establish the execution of the purpose which these two witnesses say the defendants declared in their presence. There must be added to this the fact that a business admittedly solvent in January, 1896, passed under the management of J. M. Gillispie, and made money for another year, and became wholly insolvent and indebted to the extent of thousands of dollars in excess of its assets in January, 1898, unattended by any great sudden loss, as by fire, flood, or other inevitable circumstance.

To overcome the presumption of fraud arising from the evidence and the facts shown, the wife must establish her purchase of the property with means derived from sources other than her husband by full and clear proof. Stockdale v. Harris, 23 W. Va. 499; McMasters v. Edgar, 22 W. Va. 673; Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 122; Core v. Cunningham, 27 W. Va. 206; Herzog v. Weller, 24 W. Va. 203; Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. 780, 6 Am. St. Rep. 664; Spence v. Smith, 34 W. Va. 697, 12 S. E. 828; Martin v. Warner, 34 W. Va. 182, 12 S. E. 477. "In a contest between the creditors of the husband and his wife, owing to the great facility which the married relation affords for the commission of fraud, there is, as there should be, a presumption against the bona fides of the transaction, which the wife must overcome by clear and satisfactory evidence." Crowder v. Garber (Va.) 34 S. E. 470. This court has declared the same rule in different language in Walker's Adm'x v. Peck, 39 W. Va. 325, 19 S. E. 411; Wood v. Harmison, 41 W. Va. 376, 23 S. E. 560.

Enough has been said to indicate clearly that the evidence adduced by Mrs. Gillispie in support of her contentions does not measure up to this requirement. Another familiar principle peculiarly applicable to this case is that "fraud is to be legally inferred from the facts and circumstances of the case when those facts and circumstances are of such a character as to lead a reasonable man to the conclusion that the conveyance was made with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud existing or future creditors." Lockhard v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87; Livesay v. Beard, 22 W. Va. 585; Sturm v. Chalfant, 88 W. Va. 249, 18 S. E. 451. The evidence of actual payment by Mrs. Gillispie is narrowed down, as has been shown, to the testimony of herself and her husband, and numerous cases are found in the Reports in which such evidence is held insufficient as against facts and circumstances giving rise to the inference of fraud. The rule was devised to cover just such cases. But for it creditors would not often be able to impeach a fraudulent conveyance.

The defendants, by cross-assignment of error, say the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the bill; but it is sufficient. It sets forth clearly and fully the indebtedness of the defendant J. M. Gillispie, shows the recovery of the judgment against Gillispie and Mrs. Miller, and the enforcement of the payment of it out of the real estate of Mrs. Miller in the chancery suit; and with it are filed as exhibits a transcript from the justice's docket showing the issuance and return of an execution unsatisfied, a copy of the decree ordering a sale of the real estate of Mrs. Miller, and reciting the assignment of J. M. Gillispie, and a copy of the decree confirming the sale thereof. It further alleges that J. M. Gillispie paid the purchase money of the lots, and had them conveyed to his wife with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors; and that he procured the improvements to be put upon the property, and paid for them with his own money, with the like intent. The prayer is that the lots may be held liable for the plaintiff's debt, and sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of it. There is no allegation of the insolvency of J. M. Gillispie, but the fact appears from the exhibits. That is sufficient. The exhibits are parts of the bill. Sadler v. Taylor, 49 W. Va. 104, 38 S. E. 583.

It is also contended that the bill should have marked the distinction between a fraudulent conveyance contemplated by section 1 of chapter 74 of the Code of 1899 and a voluntary conveyance as contemplated by the second clause of section 2 of said chapter. As has been shown, the bill sufficiently charges fraud, and the fact that the transfer is not upon a consideration deemed valuable in law may be treated merely as a fact tending to establish fraud. The bill may properly treat it as matter of evidence, and omit any mention of it.

Prior to this suit another had been brought against the defendants by the Horner-Gaylord Company to impeach the same transaction on the ground of fraud, and in that suit the depositions of Mary E. Gillispie, J. M. Gillispie, and Delbert Gillispie were taken and filed. These depositions seem to have been filed by the defendants in this suit as exhibits with their depositions taken herein. "The rule is that depositions taken in one suit cannot be used in another suit unless the parties are the same or are in privity and the subject involved in the suit is also the same." 6 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 579. It excludes the depositions in the former suit, for neither the parties nor the subject-matter are wholly the same. Another principle having the like effect, asserted in Brown v. Johnson, 13 Grat. 644, is that "a man who cannot be prejudiced by a deposition or proceeding in a suit shall never receive any advantage from it." In Brown v. Johnson—an action against one obligor on a joint bond—an attempt was made by the defendant to use a deposition taken in another action by the plaintiff on the same bond against another obligor, and the court held that under no circumstances could it be competent evidence. See, also, Payne v. Coles, 1 Munf. 373, and Chapman v. Chapman, Id. 398. The plaintiff could not have used these depositions against the defendants except by agreement, or, in a limited sense, for purposes of contradiction. But the exception must be treated as waived by failure to insist upon it in the court below. This rule of waiver extends to all exceptions save those going to the competency of the witness, as to which, indeed, no exception is necessary. Hill v. Proctor, 10 W. Va. 78; Vanscoy v. Stinchcomb, 29 W. Va. 271, 11 S. E. 927; Fant v. Miller, 17 Grat. 187.

For the reasons given, the decree complained of must be reversed, the appellant must be decreed her debt and costs as a charge upon the property in question, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the principles herein stated and the rules and principles of equity.

On Rehearing.

This case was decided and the foregoing opinion filed November 22, 1902, and afterwards a rehearing was allowed. The briefs for appellees filed upon the reargument as well as upon the first hearing are unusually long, but their contents may be reduced to a few propositions. One is that the rule which casts upon the wife who claims, in a contest against the creditors of her husband, to have purchased and improved real estate, the burden of proving that the property and improvements were paid for by her with money derived from some source other than her husband, ought to be abolished, because the statute now authorizes a married woman to carry on business in her own name, and to acquire and hold property free from her husband's control and from liability for his debts. In this connection it is urged that this rule has been abolished in Virginia by the decision in Catlett v. Alsop, 40 S. E. 34, or that the principles there declared, if followed out, will produce such result. That case seems to liberalize the rules of law to some extent in such contests, but it does not hold that this particular rule, which has been so long the well-settled law in all jurisdictions, is to be overturned. It holds that an insolvent husband may be employed by his wife in the management and conduct of her business, and that his earnings in her employment may be devoted to the support of his family as far as may be necessary for that purpose, and his creditors are only entitled to subject to the payment of their debts the excess. This court long ago enunciated and applied substantially the same proposition in Boguess v. Richards, 39 W. Va. 567, 20 S. E. 599, 28 L. R. A. 537, 45 Am. St. Rep. 938. That is a matter entirely foreign to any question arising in this case. In establishing the presumption of fraud as to transactions between husband and wife working prejudice to the rights of the creditors of the former, the courts do not assign as reason therefor the common-law disabilities of the wife. They base it upon the close relationship of the parties, and the facilities which that relationship affords for the perpetration of fraud. That relationship is in no manner altered by the married woman's statute. If that statute has any effect in this connection, it is to increase, rather than to diminish, the facility for the perpetration of such fraud. There is greater latitude under it for the wife to set up claims to property and to hold property than there was at common law. It is urged, however, that this rule has the effect of trenching upon the rights of married women under this statute, and of partially thwarting the purpose of the Legislature in passing the statute. Married women had property rights before the passage of this law, which were as sacred as their new rights. Had the courts deemed this rule prejudicial and injurious to their rights in the sense of depriving them of anything which belongs to them, it never would have had any existence in the jurisprudence of this country. The same principle is applied by the courts everywhere to persons standing in a close confidential relation, such as father and son, brother and brother, brother and sister, and all others closely related by blood or affinity. Why? Because of the relationship; and, the relationship of husband and wife, being closer than that of any others, the principle is more rigidly applied as between them. See Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. 780, 6 Am. St. Rep. 664; Spence v. Smith, 34 W. Va. 697, 12 S. E. 828; Knight v. Capito, 23 W. Va. 639; Douglass v. Douglass, 41 W. Va. 13, 23 S. E. 671; Himan v. Thorn, 32 W. Va. 507, 9 S. E. 980; Reilly v. Barr, 34 W. Va. 95, 11 S. E. 750; Hutchinson v. Bolts, 35 W. Va. 754, 14 S. E. 267; Butler v. Thompson, 45 W. Va. 660, 31 S. E. 960, 72 Am. St. Rep. 838; Bierne v. Ray, 37 W. Va. 571, 16 S. E. 804; Ballard v. Chewning, 49 W. Va. 508, 39 S. E. 170. The rule exists ex necessitate. But for it the statute against fraudulent conveyances could not be made effective.

That part of the opinion which recites that somebody had to cultivate the garden, and the family had to be clothed as well as fed, and feed furnished for the cows, has been adverted to in the later briefs as evidence of the application of a false principle. It was not apprehended that this would be construed to mean anything other than an indication of the weakness of the claim that Mrs. Gillispie had realized a large amount of money from keeping boarders with which to pay for the property and improvements. How could she have paid her share of all the expenses of keeping the boarding house, and turned in on the purchase of the property and its improvements all the money taken in from her boarding house business? Are we to accept the absurd proposition that every dollar of the income was profit, allowing nothing for expenses? Can a married woman's business be carried on without expense any more than that of any other person? In her statement of the amount of money derived from her business of keeping boarders she allows practically nothing for the expenses, and the statements of the former opinion referred to were intended merely to direct attention to this fact.

The statement in the former opinion that certain depositions taken in another suit, and made exhibits with depositions taken in this suit, do not appear in the printed record, is erroneous. They are in that record, and were read and considered under the impression that they were depositions taken in this case. This error is the result of the unusual and peculiar manner in which they are inserted in the printed record. But it signifies nothing. In going back over the record, they are found to have been marked and considered as carefully as any of the others. Further examination of this record serves to strengthen, rather than to weaken, the conclusion announced in the former opinion. That conclusion was that the evidence offered to show that Mrs. Gillispie paid for the property with her own money was insufficient to overcome the presumption against the good faith of the transaction, as it appeared that practically all the money was actually handled and delivered, by way of payment, by J. M. Gillispie, and not Mary E. Gillispie, and, further, that J. M. Gillispie was at that time handling other money than that which Mrs. Gillispie claims to have paid into his hands. The truth of this inference is established to a moral certainty by certain facts found in the record and marked on the former examination of it, but, as the result of inadvertence, not stated in the opinion. It appears from Ledger No. 1 of the books of D. M. Miller & Co., as testified to by G. A. Lynch from the book itself, that J. M. Gillispie was allowed as expenses, from the firm, on the 23d day of August, 1894, $274.92; on January 15 or 17, 1895, $480.08; on August 29th (year not given), $207.18; on January 13, 1896, $141.71—making a total of $1,103.89. This amount, which seems to have been withdrawn from the firm by him without anything upon the books to show for what purpose the money was expended, or upon what accounts it was taken out, was used for some purpose by J. M. Gillispie, from time to time, while the purchases of property and payments of the costs of improvements thereon were in progress. Hence the record shows more than mere opportunity on the part of J. M. Gillispie to obtain the money with which to buy this property for his wife. It shows that he did actually withdraw, from the firm assets, a considerable amount of money at that time, which is wholly unaccounted for by him, and cannot be accounted for upon any theory except that of his having paid it, instead of Mrs. Gillispie's money, for the property and the improvements thereon. This circumstance strongly supports the conclusion that the property was paid for with the husband's money, and greatly weakens the contention of Mrs. Gillispie that it was paid for with her money.

Another contention is that, as the house in question was completed late in the year 1895, or early in the year 1896, and the assignment of the husband did not occur until in the year 1898, he was solvent at the time of the purchase and improvement of the property, and might have made a valid gift to his wife. This is not the theory of the defense. Both husband and wife testified that the purchase was made by her with her own money. However, it affirmatively appears that the husband's financial condition was such as to render his inability to make such a gift to his wife without prejudice to the right of his creditors perfectly apparent. It is not a case of a wealthy man, or a well-to-do man, having good reason to believe himself able to make a substantial gift to his wife without injuring his creditors, and therefore to act in good faith in doing so. Such gift, to be valid, cannot be made under any other conditions. Hume v. Condon, 44 W. Va. 553, 30 S. E. 56.

Finally, it is urged that the court should find that Mrs. Gillispie had invested a considerable amount of her own money in the property and its improvements, and become vested with the legal title, whereby the property has become her separate estate, and that the amount of her interest in it should be fixed, and then the amount expended in the purchase and improvements by her should be protected and secured to her by the decree; in other words, that an apportionment of the value of the property be made between the wife and the husband's creditors, as in the cases of Humphrey v. Spencer, 36 W. Va. 11, 14 S. E. 410, and Bogges v. Richards, 39 W. Va. 576, 20 S. E. 599, 26 L. R. A. 537, 45 Am. St. Rep. 938. As this is a case of actual fraud on the part of the husband, participated in by the wife, the principle invoked does not apply. Humphrey v. Spencer expressly decides that such apportionment can be made only in cases in which there is no actual fraud. The law applicable here is that declared in Lockhart v. Beckley, 10 W. Va. 87; Rose v. Brown, 11 W. Va. 137; Bank v. Wilson, 25 W. Va. 242; and Burt v. Timmons, 29 W. Va. 441, 2 S. E. 780, 6 Am. St. Rep. 664—all of which hold that the wife's property is to be charged with the amount of the husband's money which went into the improvements, although that may amount to the entire proceeds of the sale of the property.

As it clearly appears that money of the husband in excess of the amount of this debt and the costs of this suit was used in the purchase and improvement of the property, the order directed in the former opinion should be entered.

(54 W. Va. 272)

FAIRMONT PLUMBING CO. v. CARR.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1903.)

PLUMBING CONTRACT—CONSTRUCTION— REJECTION.

1. A contract for putting in the plumbing and heating works of a house provides for partial payments for the work, and provides that "the final payment shall be made when the work is completed satisfactory to owner and architect." This gives the owner or architect absolute right of rejection of the work for defect or incompleteness, and his reasons for rejection cannot be ignored, if in good faith and not fraudulent.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County; John W. Mason, Judge.

Action by the Fairmont Plumbing Company against Lydia E. Carr. Decree for plaintiff for less than the amount claimed, and it appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Leeds, for appellant. W. S. Haymond, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. The Fairmont Plumbing Company and L. E. Carr entered into a written contract by which said company contracted to construct and complete a plumbing system and hot-water heating plant in a certain house belonging to said Carr, in Fairmont, for a certain price. Said Carr paid part of the sums agreed, but refused to pay the balance claimed by the company because of alleged failure of the company to complete the work according to the contract; and the company filed a mechanic's lien, and brought a chancery suit to enforce it, for the balance claimed under the contract and for some extra work. A decree allowed the company $32.87 for some "extra," but denied relief for the balance of extras, and denied any relief for the balance claimed for work under the contract, without prejudice to another suit, and the company appeals.

I will not argue the case upon the volume of depositions of conflicting evidence. As in other cases several times stated, the design in requiring of this court written opinions is not to detail evidence going to establish facts, but to state ultimate facts, so far as necessary to make intelligible the principles of law ruling the case. The judge of the circuit court found that the execution of the contract was delayed, to the damage of the defendant, and also that the work was never completed as demanded by the contract, and its execution defective. We cannot, upon conflicting evidence, reverse this finding. I regard the finding correct. But if this were not so, there is a legal principle which would affirm the decree. The contract provides for partial payments during the execution of the work, and then says, "The final payment shall be made when the work is completed satisfactory to owner and architect." The owner and architect condemned the work as incomplete and defective, and complained of delay. They both expressed dissatisfaction with it repeatedly. The architect refused to give an order for final payment; and both owner and architect, under oath as witnesses, continue to express dissatisfaction, and say that the work was delayed, to the loss of the defendant, ill-executed, and incomplete. It does not appear that this dissatisfaction of owner and architect was fraudulent or collusive, but, I think, well grounded. Under the clause of the contract just stated, upon authorities given in Barrett v. Coal Company, 51 W. Va. 416, 41 S. E. 220, 90 Am. St. Rep. 802, the decision of the circuit must stand.

Decree affirmed.

On Rehearing.

(Feb. 2, 1904.)

A petition for rehearing calls for an extension of the above opinion. That the principle, stated in it is sound, as regards sale or manufacture of chattel articles, as machines, clothing, portraits, and the like, is not contested; but it is said the clause of the contract, "The final payment shall be made when the work is completed satisfactory to owner and architect," cannot apply to construction of a building or fixtures therein. It is said that mere chattels can be kept by the seller or manufacturer, or returned, whereas in the other case the owner of the house gets the work without pay. It is a sufficient answer to say: There is the contract. The parties have made it themselves applicable to the construction of these fixtures. The court cannot disapply it to this subject when the parties have by their own act applied it. Those words are in this very contract. Can a court strike them out? Can a court take from Mrs. Carr a sedate clause made for the purpose of protecting her from an imposition very common—bad construction? Is it a hard case? It may be, but the builder, to get the contract, took the risk of saying, "Give me the contract, and I will execute it to the satisfaction of yourself and the architect." This clause means something. It means more than the law would say if it were not in the contract. Then whether the work was completed according to the contract would be a question for the decision of the law, but this contract leaves it to the owner and architect.

Now to the authorities: Whilst somewhat variant, the weight of them supports this view. In 6 Cyc. 88, we find it stated that it has been held by eminent courts that in special building contracts the builder cannot recover anything unless he has performed the work according to the contract, but that the later rule is not to allow the owner to keep the work and not pay anything, but recovery of the real worth of the work done may be had by showing substantial performance; but this is added: "The doctrine, however, of 'substantial performance,' does not apply when the omissions or departures from the contract are intentional, or so substantial as not to be capable of remedy, so that an allowance out of the price would not give the owner what he contracted for, or where the contract must be performed to the satisfaction of the owner or architect." Note that the last clause makes such a contract as we have in hand an exception from the rule of "substantial performance." Why? Because so the parties wrote their contract, and courts cannot make a new or different one. This contract is in this respect not different from those where payment is to be made upon the certificate of an architect, engineer, or other person, that the work has been done according to contract, unless this contract is stronger in favor of the owner of the building, as perhaps it is, since it leaves it to the mere satisfaction of the owner and architect. In Wharton on Contracts, § 594, we find this: "Building contracts often contain the provision that the owner shall not be liable to the builder until the work has been approved by the architect employed; and this provision, when the builder takes the work subject to it, and when the architect acts as an independent arbiter between the parties, will be strictly enforced. The owner has no right to complain, since the architect was selected by him, and charged by him with this very power. The builder has no right to complain, since he took the work on this very condition. No matter how arbitrary may be the action of the architect in refusing to give the certificate required by the contract, yet, if he persist in his refusal, the builder cannot recover on the contract price. It is otherwise when the architect, in collusion with the owner, refuses to give the certificate, in which case the owner and the architect may together be liable in an action for conspiracy, or the owner may be made liable on the contract, being estopped by his own fraud from setting up the refusal of the architect to certify." In Clark on Contracts, 66, we find: "Again, a promise may depend upon the act of the promisor or of some third person. For instance, it may be made a condition precedent to one party's liability under the contract that he shall approve of, or be satisfied with, the other party's performance; and in such a case, by the weight of authority, he cannot be compelled to accept the other party's performance, and perform his part, unless he is satisfied. Examples of such a condition occur in contracts for the manufacture and sale of goods, or for services, where the buyer's or master's liability to pay is made to depend on his being satisfied with the goods or the services. Other examples are in the case of promises to pay for the construction of a building or of a railroad, or for any other construction work, conditional upon the approval and certificate of the architect, engineer, or other third person. In such cases payment cannot be enforced without such approval unless there is fraud, or such gross mistake as to necessarily imply bad faith." Hammon on Contracts, § 466, says: "Conditions precedent may be regarded as vital or suspensory. A vital condition precedent is one whose nonperformance discharges the contract. A suspensory condition precedent is illustrated where a promise is made to depend upon the act of a third person, as in the case of a promise in a building contract to pay for the work upon receiving a certificate of approval from the architect. * * * 'In all these cases,' says Sir William Anson, 'it would appear that an action brought before the fulfillment of the condition would be brought prematurely; and though neither the nonfulfillment of the condition, nor the action brought before it was fulfilled, would discharge the contract, the condition suspends, according to its terms, the right to the performance of the promise.'" Chitty on Contracts, 833, says: "If a railway company agree to pay a certain price for work, which is to be done to the satisfaction of their engineer, or if a building agreement contain the usual clause that the party will pay upon receiving the architect's certificate that the work has been done to his satisfaction, the fact of the work having been done to his satisfaction in the one case, and the obtaining a proper certificate in the other, is a condition precedent to the right to receive payment." Addison on Contracts, 576, and Beach on Contracts, § 105, are to same effect. Such is the law as the text-writers construe the cases. Turn to some authoritative cases. Sweeney v. United States, 109 U. S. 618, 3 Sup. Ct. 844, 27 L. Ed. 1053: A man contracted with the government to build a wall around a cemetery; the contract saying that, when inspected by an engineer, and he "shall have certified that it is in all respects as contracted for, it shall be received and become the property of the United States." Held, that if there is no fraud, nor such gross mistake as would necessarily imply bad faith, nor failure to exercise honest judgment, the engineer's certificate is a condition precedent to payment." The same doctrine held in Martinsburg & Potomac R. Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 5 Sup. Ct. 1035, 29 L. Ed. 255. See Chicago, etc., v. Price, 138 U. S. 185, 11 Sup. Ct. 290, 34 L. Ed. 917. A man agreed to put in a building an elevator "warranted satisfactory in every respect." The lower court instructed that if it was reasonably fit, and if the defendant ought to have been satisfied with it, the plaintiff could recover; but the Supreme Court held that the contract meant that the elevator was to be satisfactory to the defendant, "and, while it could not be rejected for mere caprice, yet a bona fide objection by him to its working was a sufficient defense." Singerly v. Thayer, 108 Pa. 291, 2 Atl. 230, 56 Am. Rep. 207. Same in Kennedy v. Poor, 151 Pa. 472, 25 Atl. 119. So Gladius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145, 10 Am. Rep. 449. In Hennessy v. Metzger, 152 Ill. 505, 38 N. E. 1058, 43 Am. St. Rep. 267, we find it held that where a building contract provides that the architect shall pass upon the work, and certify upon the payment to be made, his decision is a precedent condition to require payment, and action does not lie in its absence. In Kane v. Stone Co., 39 Ohio St. 1, upon a contract to build a house "subject to the approval of an architect," it was held that "if such architect, acting in good faith, fails and refuses to approve the work in any form, the general rule is that the contractor cannot recover." In Pormann v. Walsh, 97 Wis. 356, 72 N. W. 881, 65 Am. St. Rep. 125, was a building contract, by which the contractor agreed to perform the work to the "satisfaction of the architect and to the satisfaction of the owner"—just this case. It was held to be "binding on the contractor, and that the owner might withhold his approval or satisfaction with the work so as to defeat a recovery of payment, provided he does not do so unfairly or capriciously." In Bradner v. Roffsell, 57 N. J. Law, 412, 31 Atl. 387, was a building contract requiring payment upon a certificate of an architect that "the work is done in strict accordance with drawings and specifications, and that he considers the payment properly due." The trial court charged the jury that the architect's certificate could be dispensed with only by proof that it was withheld by fraud on his part, and that "it would be prima facie evidence of fraud if the architect withheld his certificate without any substantial reason." The Supreme Court held this charge erroneous, because the use of the word "substantial" tended to substitute the judgment of the jury for the decision of the architect. The court also said: "In Chism v. Schipper [51 N. J. Law, 1, 16 Atl. 816, 2 L. R. A. 544, 14 Am. St. Rep. 668] the chief justice carefully pointed out the need of the watchful supervision over the determination of juries on this question, and declared that the architect's conduct could not be impeached for want of knowledge, or because his judgments do not agree with those of others. To instruct a jury that they may find fraud from the withholding of such a certificate without a substantial reason is to permit them to determine what are substantial reasons, and if, in their judgment, there are none, then, though the architect's judgment may be honestly otherwise, to convict him of fraud." See where the adverse proposition leads. A man is going to build a house, or put in heating and plumbing apparatus. He is incapable of judging the work, and the contractor agrees to submit the work to the judgment of an architect, and that the final payment shall only be called for when that architect approves it. The architect does not approve it. Then a jury, or the judges on the circuit and supreme benches, who cannot fitly judge the work when they hear the evidence or read the record, are to say that there was in fact substantial compliance with the contract; that the architect ought to have given his certificate. What becomes of the usual, necessary provision that the architect shall judge the work—a provision carefully inserted to protect the owner against the imposition, so often practiced, of bad construction? What becomes of the utility of the contract? What the use of a solemn contract? In Butler v. Tucker, 24 Wend. 447, a man agreed to get stone for a building "to the entire satisfaction of the other party and third persons." The court held that he must "allege and prove that the work was done to the satisfaction of the arbiters." The opinion said: "The plaintiff not only agreed to furnish and deliver granite of a particular description, and execute the work in a specified manner, but he also stipulated that the whole should be done and completed to the entire satisfaction of the building committee. It is not enough for him to say that he has performed the agreement in other respects, without also alleging that he has done it to the satisfaction of the arbiters agreed on between the parties. Worsley v. Wood, 6 T. R. 710; Delaware & H. Canal v. Dubois, 15 Wend. 89; Morgan v. Birnie, 9 Bing. 672; U. States v. Robeson, 9 Pet. 319 [9 L. Ed. 142]; 1 Chit. Pl. 812." Chism v. Schipper (N. J. Law) 16 Atl. 316, 2 L. R. A. 544, 14 Am. St. Rep. 668, 674, recognizes the doctrine that, when such certificate is required by the contract, it must be furnished, in the absence of fraud.

There being no difference in this respect between contracts touching chattels and building contracts, I feel authorized to repeat the statement in the original opinion—that, in the application of the clause that the work should be satisfactory to the architect, the cases of Barrett v. Coal Co., 51 W. Va. 416, 41 S. E. 220, 90 Am. St. Rep. 802, and Osborne v. Francis, 38 W. Va. 312, 18 S. E. 591, 45 Am. St. Rep. 859, are binding authority. I will add that I cannot see any logical difference, in principle, between the case before us and the case where the certificate or decision of an engineer is made by the contract final and conclusive as to the completion of the work, or its character, or even its quantity. He is made the arbiter in both cases. In Condon v. Railroad Co., 14 Grat. 302, the contract provided that an engineer should inspect the work, and "determine when the contract is complied with according to its fair interpretation, * * * and his decision shall be conclusive between the parties." It was held that such a contract was valid, and the decision of the engineer conclusive, and that his final estimate was a condition precedent to recovery. I think that case especially is authority in this case, as it covered the character of the work. A number of cases lay down this principle. Kidwell v. Railroad Co., 11 Grat. 676; B. & O. R. Co. v. Polly, 14 Grat. 447; Chicago R. Co. v. Price, 138 U. S. 185, 11 Sup. Ct. 290, 34 L. Ed. 917; Kilberg v. U. S., 97 U. S. 398, 24 L. Ed. 1106.

There are some cases adverse to the position taken in this opinion, but not many or sound. Some seeming to be such on first blush are not when scrutinized. I now refer to some cases cited for the plumbing company. In Pope Iron Co. v. Best, 14 Mo. App. 502, the contract guaranteed "the furnace to work satisfactorily." The court said that did not mean that it would work to satisfaction of the defendant, but to work reasonably well. A great difference. The contract was satisfied if the furnace worked well in the opinion of the jury. That is only the usual contract. This contract says the satisfaction of the defendant and architect must be attained, not that of a jury. Shupe v. Collender (Conn.) 15 Atl. 405, 1 L. R. A. 389, has no application. It only holds that, where a purchaser of an article is not satisfied, this does not disable him from keeping it and recouping the price for defect under the warrant. Hawkins v. Graham (Mass.) 21 N. E. 812, 14 Am. St. Rep. 422, does not fit this case. The contract said that the heating apparatus should be of first-class workmanship, and in "the event of the system proving satisfactory," to be paid for, not saying proving satisfactory to the plaintiff; and, further, it added the words "or the work demonstrated." The court said this offered an alternative; that is, it let in proof of the sufficiency, and did not limit to the defendant's approval. Carroll v. Welch, 26 Tex. 147, involved no clause such as does this case; nor did Nelson Co. v. Mitchell, 38 Mo. App. 321, nor Fleischmann v. Miller, Id. 177. Chism v. Schipper, 51 N. J. Law, 1, 16 Atl. 316, 2 L. R. A. 544, 14 Am. St. Rep. 668, fully recognizes the force of the clause in question as above stated, but holds that a fraudulent withholding of approval defeats it, which we do not deny. Bannister v. Patty's Ex'rs, 35 Wis. 215, holds that a contract for cut-stone work in a house, providing that no payment should be made until the superintendent should give a certificate that it was to his satisfaction, was valid, and required the certificate to be refused by fraud or collusion. True, it is said that if the certificate is withheld by mistake there may be recovery. The mistake meant is not defined. This is obiter, and it is not so actually decided. This dictum is based on Hudson v. McCartney, 33 Wis. 331. Turning to this case, it is found to strongly support the view taken in this opinion. The contract for erection of a house provided for payment as the work went on, to the full satisfaction of the superintendent. Held, that there could be no recovery without such certificate, unless withheld by "fraud or bad faith or clear evidence of mistake." "If fraud in the superintendent or other arbiter can ever be established by proof that the work was in fact properly performed, it can only be in cases where his refusal to certify is shown to have been grossly and palpably perverse, oppressive, and unjust—so much so that the inference of bad faith would at once arise when the facts are known. Having stipulated to submit to a skilled arbiter, when the question whether his work conforms to the contract arises, the party cannot, in general, substitute the judgment of a jury upon that question." The court said: "Neither do we think the case was one where the jury should have been permitted to go into evidence of the manner in which the work was executed, for the purpose of impeaching the decision of the superintendent," and that such evidence could not establish fraud in the superintendent. That is, his mere error of judgment would not do. The court intimated that fraud in the superintendent could only be shown by collusion with the owner, or by procurement by the owner. "It is not upon every claim made by the mechanical workman that he has complied with his contract, or upon every controversy between him and the arbiter, that the power of deciding is to be taken away from the latter, and the question carried into a court, to be determined by a jury of inexperienced men, or by the judge alone. If this were otherwise, and if, upon every difference between the superintendent and the party contracting to do the work, the former is deprived of all authority to decide, then such stipulations entered into between parties become utterly useless. But such is not the view which has uniformly been taken by the courts, by which such stipulations have been held valid to secure to the party in whose favor they are made the advantage of having the work inspected, and its character determined with reference to the requirements, by a person of skill and ability to form a correct judgment in such matters. 'Every man is the master of a contract he may choose to make, and it is of the highest importance that every contract should be construed according to the intention of the contracting parties. And it is important in a case of this description that the person for whom the work has been done should not be called upon to pay for it until some competent person shall have certified that the work has been properly done according to the contract and specifications.' Per Erie, C. J., in Clarke v. Watson, supra [18 O. B. (N. S.) 278]. It is manifest that this important object will be defeated, and the protection of a skilled superintendent lost, if, in every case of disagreement or dissent on the part of the contractor, the opinion of a jury is to be substituted. Having deliberated ly and of his own free will made choice of a person as fit and competent to decide, and by whose determination he has agreed to abide, it is but reasonable and proper that the contractor should be held to the performance of his agreement." Wyckoff v. Meyers, 44 N. Y. 143, holds that, when the certificate is given, it binds the owner of the building, in the absence of fraud. It is authority for the contention of this opinion. Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 173, 72 Am. Dec. 442, also cited for the appellant, according to the syllabus in 72 Am. Dec. 442, says that, when a contract requires "complete performance or the production of an architect's certificate of performance," there can be no recovery, "unless such performance is proved or such certificate produced." Of course, because by the contract either answers. But the case in the state report (17 N. Y. 173) shows that the syllabus is not at all as given in 72 Am. Dec.; the contract was not as there given. It is a strong case for the position I have taken. Buildings were to be built "to the entire satisfaction of architects," and balance of payment "when all the work shall be completed and certified by the architects." The opinion says: "Assuming that the contracts had been so far performed as to justify the plaintiff in treating them as substantially executed, as I incline to think they were, yet the final payment for the work was to be made when it was completed, and a certificate of the architects to that effect obtained. The parties have seen fit to make the production of such a certificate a condition precedent to the payments. The plaintiff is as much bound by this part of his contract as any other. It is not enough for him to bring his action, and say that he has completed the work. He has agreed that the architects should decide whether the work is completed or not. He cannot now withdraw the decision of this question from them, and refer it to a legal tribunal." The court held that occupation of the buildings was not a waiver of strict performance, and that "a party is entitled to retain, without compensation, the benefit of partial performance, where, from the nature of the contract, he must receive such benefits in advance of full performance, and is by the contract under no obligation to pay until performance is complete." I would add that the contractor annexes his work to the reality of his own wrongful act, as judged by his chosen arbiter. Likely the balance will not more than cover the defect. He is in default. Plano Co. v. Ellis, 68 Mich. 101, 35 N. W. 841, cited for appellant, is also against him. It holds that the clause to "satisfaction" gives absolute decision to the purchaser of the chattel. It says that Wood Reaping Co. v. Smith, 50 Mich. 565, 15 N. W. 906, 45 Am. Rep. 57, governs the case, and that holds that where, by a contract to buy a harvesting machine, it was to work to the satisfaction of the purchaser, it gave absolute right to him to reject the machine, and "his reasons for doing so cannot be investigated." U. S. v. Robeson, 9 Pet. 319, 9 L. Ed. 142, is also against the appellant. Wyckoff v. Meyers, 44 N. Y. 143, was a case of refusal of a certificate in bad faith—that is, fraud—by the architect. Carroll v. Welch, 26 Tex. 147, has nothing on the subject. Fleischmann v. Miller, 38 Mo. App. 177, and Nelson Co. v. Mitchell, Id. 321, have no reference to such a clause as the one involved in this case.

Thus it appears that only fraud can excuse the plaintiff from meeting the satisfaction of Mrs. Carr and the architect. There is no proof of fraud. The evidence shows that the architect and Mrs. Carr's son acted bona fide. The contract demanded that the heating apparatus should give 70 degrees in zero weather. It was tested when the thermometer was 2 or 3 degrees above zero, and it furnished heat only up to 48 or 50 degrees. Complaint was made of insufficient heat by the tenants. The storerooms and barber shop and upper rooms were worthless without adequate heat. The fine, new house would be greatly damaged by this defect. The company would not test the heat, though requested to do so, but seem to admit this defect by their conduct. The architect and the son of the defendant swear to this defect. If it exists, as the circuit court has found, the balance claimed by the company, $327.51, would not satisfy this defect alone, perhaps. There were other defects, not necessary to be stated, but going to show that dissatisfaction on the part of the architect was bona fide. The courts say that dissatisfaction in such case is a question of fact. If it exists, reasonable or not, if honest, that is enough. Its accuracy in judgment cannot be inquired into. This is because the contract makes the architect the judge, and so his decision does not come from fraud. It is good. That judge cannot be deposed and substituted by a jury of incompetent men. That the heating apparatus is defective I think pretty clearly appears. But on a mass of evidence pro and con the circuit judge has passed, and has found that the architect acted in good faith. The good faith we must treat as fixed, and that, under such a contract, is the solvent of the case.

(102 Va. 429)

VIRGINIA FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. v. RICHMOND MICA CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 10, 1904.)

INSURANCE—STIPULATIONS OF POLICY—WAIVER—REPRESENTATIONS OF AGENT—AGENT'S AUTHORITY—ESTOPPEL TO DENY.

1. Where the agent of an insurance company, who had always represented the company in its relations with assured, informed him when he made application for a renewal of the policy for the ensuing year that it was not necessary to make any change in the provisions of the policy on account of the execution of a contract to sell the premises to another, and the fact that the other had been put in possession, and thereupon assured, who had requested a change in accordance with the facts, paid the premium, and accepted the policy in its previous form, the company was estopped from asserting a forfeiture under a clause of the policy providing that it should be void in case assured's interest in the premises was other than unconditional ownership, although the policy provided that no officer, agent, or other representative of the company should have power to waive any provision of the policy, except certain specified ones, which they could waive only in a specified manner.

2. In order that an insurance company may successfully assert that its agent has exceeded his powers in waiving conditions of a policy, the assured must have actual notice of the limitations placed on the agent's powers, either by having his attention called to the stipulation of the policy containing such limitation, or otherwise. The constructive notice afforded by the circumstance that the policy contains the limitation is insufficient.

Error to Circuit Court of City of Richmond.

Action by the Richmond Mica Company against the Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Company. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Leake & Carter, for plaintiff in error. Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson and Lewis C. Williams, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This was a proceeding by motion in the circuit court of the city of Richmond by the defendant in error, the Richmond Mica Company, against the plaintiff in error, the Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Company, upon a fire insurance policy, to recover the sum of $1,500, loss occasioned the plaintiff from the destruction by fire of certain of the property covered by the policy.

The policy contains, among others, the following provisions:

(1) "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void * * * if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership; or if the subject of insurance be a building on ground not owned by the insured in fee simple."

(2) "This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions, together with such other provisions, agreements, or conditions, as may be endorsed hereon or added hereto, and no officer, agent, or other representative of this company, shall have power to waive any provision or condition of this policy except such as by the terms of this policy may be the subject of agreement endorsed hereon or added hereto, and as to such provisions or conditions, no officer, agent or representative shall have such power, or be deemed or held to have waived such provisions or conditions unless such waiver, if any, shall be written upon or attached hereto, nor shall any privilege or permission affecting the insurance under this policy exist or be claimed by the insured unless so written or attached."

Plaintiff in error denies liability for the loss on the ground that at the date of the policy the interest of the assured in the property was other than the unconditional and sole ownership, and that the building destroyed was not located on ground owned by the assured in fee simple, and that there had been no waiver of the forfeiture which accrued from the breach of the condition of the policy in the manner and upon the terms prescribed in the second provision, and the entire policy was therefore void and of no effect.

There was a demurrer to the evidence, which the trial court overruled, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff for the damages provisionally assessed by the jury, and the case is here on writ of error to that judgment.

It is conceded that, if the insurance company is liable at all, the amount of the recovery is correct; but, as remarked, the company denies liability in toto, for the reason stated.

It appeared in evidence that R. A. Lancaster, Jr., was the general agent of the insurance company for the city of Richmond; that during a series of years he had received the premiums and written insurance upon the property in question for the defendant in error in the company of his principal; that these policies were renewed from year to year, it being the practice of the agent before the expiration of a former policy to write insurance upon the property for the ensuing year, to deliver the policy to L. M. Williams, the secretary and treasurer of the assured, and collect the premiums from him. There was no written application for any of this insurance, and no information with respect to the property was demanded of the assured. Lancaster solicited the risk, wrote the insurance, received the premiums, and, in fine, was alone known to the assured throughout the transaction.

In accordance with custom, in the latter part of the year 1902 Lancaster approached Williams for the purpose of renewing the insurance for the year 1903, when he was informed by Williams that the Richmond Mica Company had contracted, in writing, to sell the property to one Mersereau, and had placed him in possession of it; that Mersereau had paid part of the purchase price, but owed a balance on the property of $3,402.43, which, when paid, or secured to be paid, would entitle him to a conveyance. Having thus voluntarily made a full and fair disclosure of the state of the title of his principal, Williams requested Lancaster to write the insurance so as to meet the exigencies of the case. Whereupon Lancaster assured him that it was not necessary to alter the policy as it had been prepared by him; that, when the title to the property was transferred to Mersereau, it would be time enough to make the change. Acting upon that information and assurance, the premium was paid, and the policy accepted as filled up by Lancaster.

The status quo of all parties was maintained until May 30, 1903, when the property was destroyed by fire. In its proof of loss, the assured having again called attention to its contract with Mersereau, the insurance company denied liability, and tendered the amount of the premium to Williams, who promptly declined to receive it.

On a similar state of facts, this court has so often decided that the conduct of the agent estops the insurance company from asserting the forfeiture relied on that it may be stated as established law in this jurisdiction.

In the case of The Georgia Home Insurance Co. v. Kinnier, 23 Grat. 88, it was held that when a policy of insurance contained a condition that the policy should be vitiated if the premises became vacant by the removal of the owner or occupant for a period of more than 20 days without immediate notice to the company, and written consent, it was competent for the insurer or its lawful agent to waive this condition, and if, at the time the agent of the company received the premium of insurance and delivered the policy, he had knowledge of the vacation of the property, and did not then avoid the policy, but treated it as valid and subsisting, such conduct of the agent was a waiver of the condition, and a breach of it could not be relied on by the company to defeat a recovery upon the policy. In the case of McLean v. Insurance Co., 29 Grat. 372, the above case is cited as authority for the proposition that conditions in a policy which are for the benefit of the insurer, the breach of which may operate a forfeiture, may be waived by the insurer or his lawful agent. The rules there laid down with respect to the doctrine of waiver and estoppel in such cases are followed and approved in Insurance Co. v. Weill, 28 Grat. 389, 26 Am. Rep. 364; Insurance Co. v. West, 76 Va. 578, 44 Am. Rep. 177; Insurance Co. v. Telger, 90 Va. 277, 18 S. E. 195; Basley v. Insurance Co., 91 Va. 169, 21 S. E. 235; Insurance Co. v. Pankey, 91 Va. 259, 21 N. E. 487; Insurance Co. v. Rodefer, 92 Va. 747, 24 S. E. 393, 53 Am. St. Rep. 846; Insurance Co. v. Ward, 95 Va. 231, 28 S. E. 209; Farmers' Ass'n v. Williams, 95 Va. 248, 28 S. E. 214; Insurance Co. v. Goode, 95 Va. 751, 30 S. E. 366; Insurance Co. v. Nalla, 101 Va. —, 44 S. E. 896.

In many of those cases the policies were "standard policies," identical in form with the one under consideration.

In Lynchburg Fire Insurance Co. v. West, 76 Va. 578, 44 Am. Rep. 177, the court recognizes the general rule that parol testimony is inadmissible to vary or contradict written instruments, but holds that exceptions exist where the assured is misled by declarations of the insurer or his agent; where the insurer insists on forfeitures of his own creation; where the insurer or his agent, in preparing an application or policy, fails to follow correct descriptions given by the assured; or where one uses his superior knowledge or influence to mislead the other as to the true import of the contract. Parol testimony is admissible in such instances, it is said, not to contradict the writing, but by way of equitable estoppel to prevent its use. It was also held in that case that the agent's knowledge of the real condition of the risk is imputable to the principal, and estops him from setting up any warranty inconsistent therewith.

Thus, in Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Co. v. Goode, 95 Va. 751; 30 S. E. 366, the court held that what passed between an agent and the assured while filling out an insurance policy is admissible when offered, not to contradict the policy, but to show that a representation therein ought not to operate as an estoppel upon the assured.

In Mutual Fire Insurance Co. v. Ward, 95 Va. 231, 28 S. E. 200, the court says at page 237, 95 Va., page 211, 28 S. E.: "That knowledge of a general agent, who has power to receive and accept proposals for risks, subject to the approval and ratification of his principal, to issue and deliver policies, and renew and cancel the same, will bind the company, was decided by this court in the case of Georgia Home Insurance Co. v. Kinnler, 28 Grat. 96. * * * Facts communicated to the agent exercising powers thus enumerated, though uncommunicated to his principal, were held in the case of Lynchburg Fire Insurance Co. v. West, supra, to bind the company; there being no evidence to show that special limitations upon the power of the agent were known to the assured, or were plainly to be inferred by him from the nature of the agent's employment."

In Farmers', etc., Association v. Williams, 95 Va. 248, 28 S. E. 214, the following statement of the rule is quoted with approval from the opinion of Judge Cooley in the case of Aetna Insurance Co. v. Olmstead, 21 Mich. 253, 4 Am. Rep. 483: "Where an agent, who, at the time and place, is the sole representative of the principal, assumes to know what information the principal requires, and, after being furnished with all the facts, drafts a paper which he declares satisfactory, induces the other party to sign it, receives and retains the premium money, and then delivers a contract which the other party is led to believe, and has a right to believe, gives him the indemnity for which he paid his money, we do not think the insurer can be heard in repudiation of the indemnity on the ground of his agent's unskillfulness, carelessness, or fraud. If this can be done, it is easy to see that the community is at the mercy of these insurance agents, who will have little difficulty, in a large proportion of the cases, in giving a worthless policy for the money they receive."

The following language from the leading case of Lynchburg Fire Insurance Co. v. West, supra, which was also quoted with approval by this court in the case last named, is so apposite to the case in judgment that it may with propriety be repeated:

"If the defendants were misled, it was by their own agent, and not by the plaintiff. The latter honestly gave the agent all the information that was required of him. He relied upon the agent to see that the business was correctly done, according to the requirements of the company. Called upon to make answers to certain interrogations, he had the right to presume that the agent was competent to understand their meaning and effect, as well as the meaning and effect of the provisions of the policy bearing upon the disclosures made. The defendants ought not now to be heard to say that the agent of their own selection had exceeded his powers, and that he had not communicated to them the facts made known to him by the plaintiff. This is manifestly so, unless it could be shown that special limitations upon the powers of the agent were known to the plaintiff, or plainly appeared from the nature of his employment.

"No such limitations upon the powers of the agent are brought home to the assured, either in the application or otherwise."

As has been seen, the assured gave full and explicit information with respect to its contract with Mersereau to Lancaster, the general agent of the insurance company, and invoked his superior knowledge, in the light of all the facts, to write a policy which would afford the indemnity sought, and to secure which the premium was paid. Under these circumstances, without the slightest suspicion of bad faith on the part of the assured, the policy in question was prepared and delivered by Lancaster, with the assurance that it met the necessities of the case; and upon that assurance the assured acted, and parted with the premium. Between the delivery of the policy and the fire, no change had taken place in the status of the property, and not a dollar more of the purchase price had been paid by Mersereau; and it is conceded that the assured had an insurable interest in the property far greater in value than the amount of the policy. In the face of this undisputed testimony, to permit the insurance company, after loss, to escape liability upon the pretext that one of the general provisions of a printed policy, intended to cover every conceivable case, had been violated, would be in contravention of the decisions of this court from the case of West Rockingham Insurance v. Sheets, 26 Grat. 854, decided in November, 1875, to the latest expression of the court on the subject, found in the case of Union Assurance Society of London v. Nalls, 101 Va. —, 44 S. E. 896, decided in June, 1903.

In the case of The Wytheville Insurance & Banking Co. v. Teiger, 90 Va. 277, 18 S. E. 195, the policy contained a provision "that in any matter relating to this insurance, no person unless duly authorized in writing, shall be deemed the agent of this company," and the court held: "When an insurance company clothes a person with apparent authority to deliver policies and receive premiums, as was done in this case, it is estopped, after a policy is delivered as a valid contract to an innocent holder, to set up the defense that the agent acted without written authority from the company. Such a defense, if sustained, would operate as a gross fraud, and can receive no countenance in a court of justice. If in such case a waiver were not implied, the delivery of the policy would be not only an unmeaning, but a deceptive and fraudulent, ceremony." Citing Farnum v. Phoenix Ins. Co., 83 Cal. 246, 23 Pac. 869, 17 Am. St. Rep. 233; Georgia Home Ins. Co. v. Kinnier, 28 Grat. 88; Manhattan Fire Insurance Co. v. Weill, 28 Grat. 389-395, 26 Am. Rep. 364; Life Insurance Co. v. Miller, 12 Wall. 285, 24 L. Ed. 410, 2 May on Insurance (3d Ed.) § 360, and other authorities.

It was insisted on behalf of the insurance company that the decision in Sulphur Mines Co. v. Phoenix Insurance Co., 94 Va. 355, 27 S. E. 24, is opposed to the doctrine contended for on behalf of the defendant in error. An examination of that case, however, shows that the question raised here was not involved. There the policy contained a provision that it should be void if the property was or should become incumbered, unless consent thereto should be indorsed on the policy by an authorized agent of the insurance company. The court held that such an incumbrance, unknown to the company, avoids the policy, although it was not customary to make that inquiry when policies were issued to large corporations. It was not pretended in that case that the agent who effected the insurance knew of the incumbrance, or made any representation to the assured in regard to it. It was therefore a breach by the assured of an express condition of the policy, unaffected by extraneous circumstances, and the court properly held that the policy was avoided.

It is also argued that the established doctrine of this court, namely, that an insurance company will not be heard to say that an agent of their own selection has exceeded his powers, and has not communicated to them facts made known to him by the assured, is subject to the qualification, unless it can be shown that special limitations upon the powers of the agent are known to the assured, or plainly appear from the nature of the agent's employment. The contention is that a provision in a policy such as is contained in the policy in this case, ipso facto, carries notice of the restrictions on the powers of the agent home to the assured.

If that contention were true, it would practically abrogate the doctrine of this court in all cases, for the rule is predicated upon the fact that the dealings of the agent have been such that a policy which, according to its letter, was violated in its inception, and void ab initio, must be upheld on the ground that the agent has so dealt with the assured as to estop his principal from setting up and taking advantage of what would otherwise have operated a forfeiture. The contention presents a striking illustration of arguing in a circle. The insurance company, it is said, is estopped from relying upon the forfeiture prescribed by the policy, by reason of the conduct of its agent, which constitutes a fraud upon the rights of the assured; but the assured cannot avail himself of the estoppel, because to do so would contravene the provisions of the policy.

The true interpretation of the qualification of the rule is that the assured must have actual notice of the limitations placed upon the agent's powers, either by having his attention called to the stipulation of the policy containing it, or otherwise, and not on the constructive notice afforded by the circumstance that the policy contains the limitation.

In May on Insurance (Parsons' Ed.) § 137, at page 244, Mr. Parsons, referring to decisions where it is held that, in case of restrictions in the policy upon an agent's power, he cannot bind the company by acts in excess of such limitation, says:

"It seems very doubtful if the doctrine of these cases is entirely correct. The assured has a right to suppose that a general agent has all the powers incident to his business, unless he has knowledge to the contrary, and usage may overcome the provisions of the policy. * * *

"Prudent men are accustomed to rely upon the acts and statements of the agents, and they should be protected in so doing. * * * As to waivers taking place after issue, it is very proper to require the assured to look at his policy and conform to it, and limitations of the agent's authority should be effective unless, by a course of business or otherwise, the company has waived the limitation on the agent's power of waiver."

While, it must be confessed, there is great divergence of opinion on the subject, the rule as stated by Mr. Parsons is believed to be more in consonance with justice and reason, and has been uniformly upheld by the decisions of this court for the past 30 years.

Mr. Joyce, in his admirable work on Insurance (volume 1, § 439), after an exhaustive discussion of the subject and review of the authorities, reaches the conclusion that an agent may waive conditions, notwithstanding the inhibition in the policy.

A strict adherence to the opposing theory would not only operate disastrously to the assured, but to the business of the insurer as well, for, in the practical conduct of such business, it would be impossible to submit every departure from the company's rules to the principal office or to the board of directors.

Much reliance has been placed by counsel for the plaintiff in error upon the opinion of Mr. Justice Shiras in the case of Northern Assurance Co. v. Grand View Building Association, 183 U. S. 308, 23 Sup. Ct. 183, 46 L. Ed. 214, reversing the judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals of the Eighth Circuit. While the pronouncements of that great court must always command the highest respect, its judgment in the particular case is deprived of much value as a precedent by the circumstance that it is not in harmony with many former decisions of that court, and that the Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Harlan, and Mr. Justice Peckham did not concur in the opinion of the majority. Since that decision was rendered, Mr. Justice Shiras has retired from the bench, and been succeeded by Mr. Justice Day, who presided in the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of Queen Insurance Co. v. Union Bank & Trust Co., 111 Fed. 689, 49 O. C. A. 555, where a different conclusion was reached. So there are now on that bench at least four justices who entertain views opposed to those of the majority, as expressed in the case referred to. In this state of the law, this court can hardly be expected to abandon its own well-considered precedents to follow the questionable ruling of another tribunal.

It follows from these views that the judgment complained of is without error, and must be affirmed.

PARLETT v. DUNN.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 10, 1904.)

MASTER—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DUTIES OF MASTER—SAFE PLACE TO WORK—SAFE APPLIANCES—REASONABLE CARE—ERROR IN JUDGMENT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY—INSTRUCTIONS—INAPPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

1. In an action for a servant's injuries, expert evidence is admissible to show the usual method of putting up a hoisting apparatus, consisting of a derrick slightly inclined, and held in position by guy ropes, as the manner in which such an apparatus should be constructed, placed in position, and fastened, so as to make it reasonably safe, is not within the range or experience of men not skilled in the use of such appliances.

2. In an action for servant's injuries, expert testimony as to witness' own practice in guying up a derrick, rather than as to the usual or customary manner of doing such work, was improper.

3. It is the duty of a master to use ordinary care and diligence to provide a reasonably safe place in which his servant is to work, considering the character of the work to be done, and for a failure to do so he is liable for resulting injuries to the servant.

4. A servant who, when employed, knew what kind of work he was to do, and claimed to have had experience in such work, and knew that there was neither floor nor scaffolding on either side of the girders where he was to work, and, with full knowledge of the obvious danger, continued to work on the girders without complaint or objection, must be held to have assumed the risk.

5. In an action for servant's injuries, an instruction as to the master's duty not to expose the servant to risks beyond those incident to his employment, and such as were in contemplation at the time of the contract of service, was improper, where there is no evidence of such exposure.

6. It is the duty of the master to use ordinary care and diligence to provide for the use of his servants reasonably safe and suitable appliances for the work to be done.

7. The construction and setting up of a hoisting apparatus, which required skill and knowledge of mechanical forces in order to render it safe for the work to be done by servants, and which was put in position for the purpose of raising all the material for a building, is an appliance concerning which it is the master's duty to exercise ordinary care to see that it is reasonably safe; and it is not within the rule that the adjustment of implements to the work in hand, according to its varying needs, belongs to the duties of the servant, and not to those of the master.

8. The master's duty in furnishing safe appliances is to use that ordinary care which persons of ordinary prudence would exercise under the circumstances of the particular case, and he is not negligent for not adopting some method or instrumentality which some people believe to be less perilous than the method adopted.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by one Dunn against C. R. Parlett. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hughes & Little, for plaintiff in error. Wolcott, Wolcott & Gage, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. This is an action by an employé to recover damages from his employer for personal injuries resulting from the alleged negligence of the latter in failing to provide for the plaintiff a reasonably safe place in which, and reasonably safe and suitable appliances or machinery with which, to work.

The defendant, C. R. Parlett, as general contractor, was building a warehouse in the city of Norfolk, upon which the plaintiff was working at the time of the accident. Through the building, 15 or 16 feet apart, were upright pillars, upon which rested horizontal girders, 12 by 14 inches. On these girders the floor joists were placed. The joists were raised from the ground to the second and third stories by means of a hoisting apparatus known as an "A" or breast derrick. It was 8 feet wide at the bottom, 12 inches wide at the top, and 26 feet high. The bottom of it rested on second-story joists, or on timbers resting on, and at right angles to, the joists on the edge of a wellhole where the joists had not been placed, through which building material was to be raised. The derrick did not stand perpendicular, but inclined slightly toward the wellhole, and was held in position by two guy ropes, each fastened to the center of the top piece—one extending to the rear and the other to the front of the derrick, at right angles to it, and made fast. To the top of the derrick was attached a pulley, through or over which a rope came down in front of the derrick and over the wellhole, to which the building material was to be attached. The other end of the rope ran down to a pulley or snatch block attached to a pillar by a rope. From this pulley the rope extended back through another pulley to a hoisting engine in the rear and to the left of the derrick. From the ground to the bottom or foot of the derrick was about 17 feet, and the pitch or height of the second story was 12 feet.

The derrick had been placed in position on Monday prior to the injury on the following Friday, and used without accident during that period to raise the second-story joists, all of which had been laid, except those over the wellhole. At the time of the accident the joists for the third story were being raised, and Dunn and three other employes were engaged in guiding, receiving, and piling the joists as they were hauled to the third story. Their place of work, as the joists came up through the wellhole, was on the girders upon which the third-story joists were to be placed. Dunn and another employe were on the girder to the right, and McDonald, the foreman on that floor, and the other employe, were on the girder to the left, of the derrick, awaiting or looking out for a load of joists which was being hoisted. While in that position the derrick swung around or fell over towards Dunn, and struck and knocked him off the girder, causing him to fall upon the joists on the second story, and inflicting the injuries described in the declaration.

The cause of the accident, the plaintiff claims, was the negligent and faulty construction of the hoisting apparatus, and the failure to provide him a safe place to work on the third story.

The evidence shows that there was no flooring or scaffolding on the third story around or along the girder where the plaintiff was working. It further shows that the plaintiff was employed, among other things, to work overhead in the building in raising joists, and that he held himself out, when employed, as having had experience in such work. The evidence further shows that the defendant furnished the material, including pulleys, guys, and ropes, for making the hoisting apparatus; that it was constructed at the building by McDonald, foreman, and that it was put in position by the employes of the defendant; that the defendant was engaged in other work, gave no personal attention to the construction of the building, but left it in charge of his head foreman, Johnson. The plaintiff introduced expert evidence to show that the hoisting apparatus was defective, in this: that it only had two guy ropes to hold it in position, when there should have been at least three, and that the pulley or snatch block near the ground floor ought to have been under the center of the derrick, and not at one side, as it was. The defendant introduced expert evidence tending to show that the hoisting apparatus was constructed, placed in position, and fastened in the usual and customary way.

The first error assigned is the action of the court in permitting the plaintiff to introduce expert evidence tending to show that the hoisting apparatus used in raising the joists was not properly guyed.

Where the facts from which negligence is to be inferred are within the range of ordinary human experience, the opinions of the men on the jury, in the eye of the law, is better than those of experts; but, where the injury involves questions of science or skill, expert evidence is admissible. The manner in which such a hoisting apparatus should be constructed, placed in position, and fastened so as to make it reasonably safe and suitable for the work to be done, cannot be said to be within the range of the experience of men not skilled in the use of such an appliance. Expert evidence was therefore admissible to show the usual method of putting up such an appliance, but some of the answers of the witness seem to give his own practice in guying an "A" derrick, rather than the usual or customary manner of doing such work. Such evidence was not proper. Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. 509.

The action of the court in giving certain instructions asked for by the plaintiff, and the refusal to give certain others asked for by the defendant, is assigned as error.

One of the instructions given for the plaintiff to which objection was made is as follows:

"No. 2. The court further instructs the jury that it was the duty of the defendant to use all reasonable care to provide and maintain for the plaintiff a safe place to work while in the performance of his duties, and not to expose him to risks beyond those incident to his employment, and such as were not in contemplation at the time of the contract of service; and if the jury believe from the evidence that the said defendant did not use due and reasonable care to provide for the plaintiff a reasonably safe place to stand on the third floor of the said building, where he was required to be in order to help land materials elevated to that floor, and that such failure was the cause of the injury to the plaintiff, then, although they further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff had knowledge of the dangers of the place in which he was required to work on the said third floor of said building, and still continued to work there, they must find for the plaintiff, unless they believe that a person of ordinary prudence, acting with such prudence, would, under all the circumstances, have refused to incur the risk, and unless they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was himself guilty of any negligence which contributed to the injury."

It is the duty of the master to use ordinary care and diligence to provide a reasonably safe place in which his servant is to work, considering the character of the work to be done, and for a failure to do so he is liable in damages for resulting injuries to the servant. The servant, however, assumes all the ordinary risks of the service in which he is engaged. He also, as a general rule, assumes all risks from causes which are known to him, or which should have been readily discovered by a person of his age and capacity in the exercise of ordinary care. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869; McDonald v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 93 Va. 98, 27 S. E. 821; Robinson v. Dinlenny, 96 Va. 41, 42, 80 S. E. 442; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 763, 40 S. E. 54.

The plaintiff, when employed, knew what kind of work he was to do, and claimed to have had experience in such work. He knew that there was neither floor nor scaffolding on either side of the girders where he and the other employes on that story were working. The danger was open and obvious. Having sought and accepted employment to work on the building, with full knowledge of the danger, and continued to work on the girder without complaint or objection, when he knew there was neither floor nor scaffolding to protect him from falling, he assumed the risk.

"Where a business," says Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (volume 1 [5th Ed.] § 185), "is obviously dangerous, and is conducted in a manner which is fully known to the servant at the outset, he assumes the risk of its conduct in that manner, although a safer method could have been adopted."

The instruction is based upon the theory that the defendant had exposed the plaintiff to risks beyond those incident to his employment, and such as were not in contemplation at the time of the contract of service. There is no evidence to sustain this theory, and the instruction should not have been given.

The action of the court in giving the plaintiff's instructions Nos. 1 and 3, and in refusing to give the defendant's instructions 1 and 3, is assigned as error.

The question raised by these instructions is whether it was the duty of the master to exercise ordinary care and diligence in furnishing a reasonably safe and suitable hoisting apparatus for raising the building material to the second and third stories of the warehouse, or whether the master had performed his duty when he furnished his employes sound and suitable material out of which to make the derrick, and with which to rig or set it up.

The rule is settled in this state by repeated decisions that it is the duty of the master to use ordinary care and diligence to provide for the use of his servants reasonably safe and suitable appliances for the work to be done. N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Nuckolls, 91 Va. 193, 21 S. E. 342; Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin's Adm'r, 93 Va. 791, 22 S. E. 869; Richmond Locomotive Works v. Ford, 94 Va. 627, 27 S. E. 509; McDonald v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 95 Va. 98, 27 S. E. 821; Robinson v. Dinlenny, 96 Va. 41, 30 S. E. 442; Riverside Cotton Mills v. Green, 98 Va. 58, 34 S. E. 963; Va. & Car. Wheel Co. v. Chalkley, 98 Va. 62, 34 S. E. 976; Southern Ry. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 692, 37 S. E. 285; N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cromer, 99 Va. 764, 40 S. E. 54.

The fact that the hoisting apparatus in this case was made up, when complete, of various parts, each of which was sound and suitable for the purpose for which it was intended, is relied on to bring it within the rule of law that the adjustment and adaptation of implements to the work in hand, according to its varying needs, belongs to the sphere of the servant, and not to the master. 1 Shear. & Red. on Neg. (5th Ed.) § 195.

Whatever be the scope of that rule, it cannot, under our decisions, apply where the construction and setting up of the apparatus or machine, ready for use, require skill, judgment, and knowledge of mechanical forces, in order to render it safe and suitable for the work to be done by the servants. The hoisting apparatus in question was not a simple appliance to be moved from place to place about the building and easily adjusted, but was an instrumentality constructed and put in position, according to the foreman's testimony, for the purpose of raising all the material for the building which required hoisting, and was operated by a steam engine, and, as appears from the evidence of the experts, requiring for its construction and setting up, ready for work, such skill, judgment, and knowledge of mechanical forces as the ordinary laborer or employe could not be expected to have.

The court below properly held, in giving and refusing the instructions under consideration, that, if the defendant failed to exercise ordinary care and caution in furnishing a hoisting apparatus reasonably safe, he was liable in damages for the injury done, if the plaintiff himself was free from fault. But while this rule of law is well settled, it is also true, as was said in the case of N. & W. Ry. Co. v. Cromer, supra, that even the skillful and experienced will frequently differ in their choice of instrumentalities and methods of doing work, and the master should not be adjudged negligent for not conforming to some other method, believed by some to be less perilous than the method adopted. Ordinary care depends upon the circumstances of the particular case, and is such care as persons of ordinary prudence, under all the circumstances, would and do exercise.

We are of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, the verdict set aside, and a new trial awarded, to be had not in conflict with the views expressed in this opinion.

CHESTERMAN v. BOLLING.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 10, 1904.)

EJECTMENT—COMMON SOURCE—TITLE—DISPUTE—ESTOPPEL—CONVEYANCES—ADVERSE POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE.

1. Neither plaintiff nor defendant in ejectment is entitled to dispute the title of the person through whom each claims as a common source.

2. Where plaintiff's remote grantor caused a survey of 50 acres to be taken from a tract described by name, and sold such survey to defendant's ancestor, and thereafter the balance of the tract was sold at public sale, at which the 50-acre tract was expressly reserved, and both the vendor and the vendee in the deed under which plaintiff claimed purchased with notice that the 50-acre tract was excluded, plaintiff had no title thereto as against defendant.

3. Where plaintiff's remote grantor in 1877 sold 50 acres from a larger tract to defendant's ancestor, who took possession under the contract of sale, and occupied the land openly as his own, claiming title thereto until his death in 1901, and in 1880 he paid the balance of the price and received a conveyance under a court decree, and none of plaintiff's grantors of the larger tract had ever claimed title to such 50 acres, defendant was entitled to the land as against plaintiff by adverse possession under color of title.

Error to Circuit Court, Goochland County.

Action by Evan R. Chesterman, as trustee, etc., against Martha Ann Bolling. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

C. W. Throckmorton and H. R. Miller, for plaintiff in error. A. K. & D. H. Leake, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. This is an action of ejectment, which was instituted in September, 1901, in the circuit court of Goochland county, by the plaintiff in error, Evan R. Chesterman, trustee, against the defendant in error, Martha Ann Bolling, to recover a tract of land situated in that county, described in the declaration as "Red Hill," containing 375 acres, more or less.

At the trial neither party demanded a jury, whereupon all questions of law and fact were submitted to the court, and judgment rendered for the defendant.

Both plaintiff and defendant claim title to the land in controversy from a common source, so that it is unnecessary to trace their chain of title beyond W. B. Durfey, under whom both claim, and the validity of whose title neither can dispute. Bolling v. Teel, 76 Va. 493.

It appears from the certificate of evidence that in 1882 B. D. Peachy, as special commissioner, acting under a decree of the circuit court of James City county, in a suit to partition the real estate whereof W. A. Durfey died seised among his heirs conveyed part of the "Red Hill" tract, containing 375 acres, more or less, to the purchaser, W. B. W. Brooking. In 1895 Brooking and wife conveyed the land to C. T. Davis; and in 1898 Davis conveyed to M. L. Wood, who subsequently conveyed it in trust to Chesterman, to secure a debt due from Wood to Davis.

In 1900 there was a survey made of the Red Hill farm, according to metes and bounds established while the entire tract belonged to Durfey, which showed that the original boundary embraced about 380 acres, and included the 50 acres in the possession of the defendant.

It further appears that the defendant is the daughter and sole heir of Joseph Mayo, deceased; that in 1877 Durfey caused a survey of 50 acres, taken from the Red Hill tract, to be made by the county surveyor, and delivered possession thereof to Mayo under a contract of sale; that Mayo cleared the land, paid the taxes, and erected a dwelling house and other permanent improvements thereon, and remained in the peaceable, undisputed, and exclusive possession of the property, under color of title, from the date of his purchase until his death in the year 1901; that there was a small balance of purchase money due upon the land, which Mayo paid a short time before his death to Special Commissioner Peachy, who thereupon conveyed the land to him, as directed by a decree of the October term, 1880, of the circuit court of James City county; that at a judicial sale made in 1882 of part of the Red Hill tract to Brooking it was publicly announced by those conducting the sale that the 50 acres of land previously sold by Durfey to Mayo were excepted from the sale; that Brooking, the original purchaser of the larger tract, knew of Mayo's ownership and possession of the smaller tract, and that it was not included in his purchase; that Davis was also apprised of those facts, and that neither Brooking nor Davis ever asserted title to that property. Peachy, who, as special commissioner, made conveyances to Brooking and Mayo of their respective purchases, states unequivocally that he transacted all business pertaining to the Durfey estate, and knows that the Mayo tract was not included in the sale and conveyance to Brooking.

Thus both vendor and vendee agree that the deed under which plaintiff claims does not cover the land in dispute.

It will be remembered that the case is here as upon a demurrer to evidence by the plaintiff; but, without invoking that rule, it is manifest from the whole evidence that plaintiff has no title whatever to the 50-acre tract, and that no previous owner of the larger tract ever asserted any claim thereto. Even if Brooking had purchased the property originally, plaintiff's right of action would long since have been barred by the adverse possession under color of title of the defendant and her ancestor for nearly a quarter of a century.

In no aspect of the case, therefore, could there have been a recovery by the plaintiff. His contention proceeds upon the false premise that he is invested with the legal title to the land in controversy. If he was not, as obviously appears, the exceptions taken to various subordinate rulings of the court on matters of procedure were immaterial, and need not be considered.

The judgment complained of is without error, and must be affirmed.

NORFOLK & W. RY. CO. v. HAWKES.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 10, 1904.)

MASTER AND SERVANT—RAILROADS—DANGEROUS PREMISES—DEPOT PLATFORMS—OVERLAPPING TRAINS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. Defendant's trains, while passing a station at which plaintiff was employed, by reason of a curve opposite the platform, extended over the edge of the platform, which was built on a straight line, for various distances along the same. Plaintiff, who was 19 years of age, and a person of intelligence, was employed by defendant to take the mail bag from the messenger on the express car. Plaintiff had been in defendant's service for 18 days prior to his injury, and had performed the same duty on 34 former occasions; and on the day in question, when he saw the train coming, he took his position at a point within 6½ inches of the edge of the platform, and was struck by the train by reason of its overlapping the platform for such distance. At the point where plaintiff stood, the platform was 12 feet wide; leaving 11 feet 5½ inches behind him, where he might have stood in safety. Held, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law.

Error to Circuit Court, Nottoway County.

Action by Samuel Hawkes against the Norfolk & Western Railway Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

William Hughes Mann and Jos. I. Doran, for plaintiff in error. James F. Epees, for defendant in error.

HARRISON, J. This action was brought by Samuel Hawkes, a minor, suing by his mother, as next friend, to recover from the Norfolk & Western Railway Company damages for injuries alleged to have been received in consequence of the negligence of the defendant company.

It appears that there is at Blackstone, Va., a station of the defendant company, which has in front of it a platform 95 feet long and 12 feet wide. This platform has a straight edge on the side next to the railroad track, while the track has a slight curve, that would not be observed unless attention was called to it. The result of this curve is to bring a train, when it reaches the station, closer to the platform at some points than others; the projection of the cars over the platform varying from 1¼ inches, at the ends, to 10 inches at the nearest point of contact between the rail and the platform.

On the 18th day of May, 1902, about 11:55 p. m., the plaintiff, a youth 19 years of age, who was an employé of the railroad company, went upon the platform, in the discharge of his duty, to take the mail bag off the express car; and, as the train pulled in, he was struck by it and thrown down, with one leg under the wheels of the engine, resulting in injuries that made amputation of the leg necessary.

It is averred that it was negligence in the defendant company to employ a youth 19 years of age, without the consent of his mother, his father being dead, and without requiring him to file a written application setting forth his age, experience, and other necessary qualifications; that it was also negligence in the defendant not to furnish the plaintiff with a copy of its rules, and not to give the plaintiff particular instructions touching the dangers and perils of his employment. The averment of negligence, however, chiefly relied on, is that, in careless disregard of the ordinary rules of safety, the defendant company erected its station so near the track that the trains, in passing, projected tortuously over the platform thereof; that the railway track at the point where the station was located was curved, and the front edge of the platform, along beside which the trains passed, was in a straight line, in consequence whereof both the points and the extent of the projection of passing trains over the platform were irregular, unequal, uncertain, and misleading, so that, while a person occupying a position a given distance back from the front edge of the platform, at one point thereon, might be safe, yet, if the same person were to occupy a position the same distance back from the front edge of the platform at another point, it would be fatally dangerous.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $1,500. A motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, and for other reasons, was overruled, and judgment was given for the plaintiff, to which ruling the defendant excepted.

In the view taken by this court, it is unnecessary to consider any other assignment of error than that which involves the refusal of the lower court to set aside the verdict as contrary to the law and the evidence; and, in dealing with that subject, it is wholly unnecessary to enter upon a consideration of the question whether or not any actionable negligence has been traced to the defendant company, for, if such negligence were conceded, the plaintiff, upon well-settled principles, would not be entitled to recover; the injury of which he complains being the result of his own reckless and inexcusable negligence.

The evidence shows that the plaintiff was a person of intelligence, and that the only duty he had to perform on the night of the accident was, when the passenger train reached the station, to take from the messenger on the express car the United States mail bag. He had been in the service of the defendant for 18 days, and had performed this same duty on 34 former occasions. The platform was 12 feet wide at the point of the accident, and the overlap of the train at that point was 6½ inches. This left 11 feet 5½ inches of platform where the plaintiff could have stood in safety. He says that he saw the train coming, and knew that it was dangerous to stand too close to it; and yet he negligently put the 11 feet 5½ inches of safe platform behind him, and took his stand on the 6½ inches, where the danger apparent from an approaching locomotive was enough to frighten back the most foolhardy. The plaintiff says he thought he was safe. It makes no difference that the danger was not in the plaintiff's mind. Such thoughtlessness is negligence which cannot be charged to the defendant company. Southern R. Co. v. Mauzy, 98 Va. 699, 37 S. E. 285. The plaintiff had reached the age of discretion. Ordinary care would have required him to have kept far enough from the edge of the platform to be out of the way of the engine he knew to be approaching. His negligence in getting too near the track, when it was not necessary to do so, not only exposed him to, but brought upon him, the injury of which he complains.

In B. & O. R. Co. v. Whittington's Adm'r, 30 Grat. 805, an employé of the railroad company, who was engaged in mending the track, stood near enough to the track to be struck by a train if there should have been an increase of speed, or a wider car passing. He might have stood further off and been safe. This court declared him to be guilty of the greatest imprudence and negligence, and denied a recovery for his death. Judge Staples, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "But it is obvious to every mind that a man who stands near enough to a railroad track to be struck by a train, if perchance there should be an increase of speed, or a change of cars, is simply guilty of the greatest imprudence and negligence."

"No man is justified in placing himself near a passing train upon any such idea or presumption. It is inexcusable rashness and folly to do so. The instincts of self-preservation, the dictates of the most ordinary prudence, would suggest, and even require, that every person, upon the approach of a train, shall retire far enough to avoid injury, whatever may be the speed of the train or the width of the cars. He must, at his peril, place himself where he cannot be struck by the train so long as it continues upon its track. Of course, the result might be very different where the employé, in remaining or near the track, is acting under the instructions of the company.

"In the present case the deceased both saw and heard the train long before it reached him. It is not denied he had ample time to get out of the way."

In the case at bar it was not a question of having time to get out of the way. The plaintiff was in a place of safety, and put himself, unnecessarily and negligently, in the way. In the case of passengers upon the station platform of a railroad, it has been repeatedly held that they could not recover where they had been guilty of negligence in going near enough to the edge of the platform to be struck by a passing train. Chicago, B. & Q. R. R. v. Mahara, 47 Ill. App. 208; Matthews v. Pennsylvania Ry. Co., 148 Pa. 491, 24 Atl. 67; Dotson v. Erie R. Co. (N. J. Err. & App.) 54 Atl. 827.

In the case last cited, a passenger was struck, while walking near the edge of a station platform, by the pilot beam of a passing engine, which projected over the platform. The court declared that there was no question of negligence by the company, and denied a recovery. In a well-considered opinion, the court said:

"It is undoubtedly a settled rule that a railroad company is under a duty to exercise ordinary and reasonable care to so construct and maintain station buildings, platforms, and approaches that they shall be safe for use by passengers. Elliott on Railroads, 1590. But this use is to be exercised in conformity to the manifest purpose for which the structure in question is adapted. And so a railroad company is only required to build platforms of sufficient dimensions to accommodate passengers getting on and off at their stations. Harkey v. R. & P. Ry. Co., Fed. Cas. No. 6,065; Taylor v. Pennsylvania Co. (C. C.) 50 Fed. 755; Moreland v. Boston & C. R. R., 141 Mass. 81, 6 N. E. 225; Kelly v. Manhattan Ry., 112 N. Y. 440, 20 N. E. 383, 3 L. R. A. 74; Laffin v. Buffalo R. Co., 108 N. Y. 136, 12 N. E. 599, 60 Am. Rep. 433. It is manifest that this duty requires the railroad company to construct its platform sufficiently near to the rails that it will afford to passengers, including the aged and infirm, a safe exit to and from the trains. And it is a matter of common knowledge that in performing this duty the platforms along the best-regulated railroads are built so near the rails that the projections from the engines and cars will overlap, to some extent, the edge of the platform. While the extreme edge of the platform is perfectly safe for passengers when occupying it for the purpose to which it is manifestly adapted, it is a matter of common knowledge that it is a place of danger when occupied while trains are passing or are likely to pass. It is the plain duty of the passenger, when not getting on or off a train, but while he may be waiting upon the platform, or engaged in walking upon it, to keep such a distance from the edge of it next to the rail that he would be beyond the reach of the projections of ordinary trains.

And the company is not liable for injury to a passenger who suffers himself to go beyond such a limit, and is injured by a passing train. It was held in C. & Q. R. R. v. Mahara, 47 Ill. App. 208, that, where a platform is wide enough to give room for safety, the fact that it is so built that the edge nearest the track cannot be safely occupied as a standing place while trains are passing is not negligence. In Matthews v. Pa. R. Co., 148 Pa. 491, 24 Atl. 67, it was held that where a passenger waiting for a train at a station, the platform of which is properly constructed, stands so near the track as to be struck and killed by the bumper of a passing locomotive, the railroad company is not liable. See, also, McGeehan v. Lehigh Valley R. Co., 149 Pa. 188, 24 Atl. 205; Pa. R. R. v. Bell, 122 Pa. 58, 15 Atl. 561."

The negligence of the plaintiff was the proximate cause of his injury, and in such a case there can be no recovery.

For these reasons, we are of opinion that the lower court erred in overruling the motion of the defendant company to set the verdict aside, and its judgment must therefore be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

DINNING v. DINNING.

HOLOGRAPHIC WILLS—EXECUTION—SIGNATURE.

1. Under Code 1887, § 2514, providing that a will shall be signed by the testator in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature, a holograph will purporting to make an orderly and apparently complete disposition of all testator's property, ending with the words, "I, William Dinning, say this is my last will and testament," was sufficiently signed by the testator to entitle it to probate.

Error to Hastings Court of Portsmouth.

Application by Harry James Dinning for the probate of the will of William Dinning, deceased. From a judgment denying probate, proponent brings error. Reversed.

William H. Stewart, for plaintiff in error.

HARRISON, J. In the court of Hastings for the city of Portsmouth, on the 18th day of April, 1903, Harry James Dinning offered for probate the following paper, purporting to be the last will and testament of William Dinning, deceased:

"Portsmouth, Va., April 20th, 1902.

"In case of my death, I wish my brother Harry to take charge of my estate and pay off all of my just and honest debts, and I want my sister Mary's body brought from Berkley and buried alongside of me. After this is done and all paid for and my funeral and burying is paid for, I give to my brother, Harry Hunter Dinning, all of my furniture in my house on Glasgow street, Scottsville, and all of my clothes, watch and chain, and give him my house and vacant lots on Glasgow street, known as the Walton property, Scottsville, and my store, 1332 County street. I do give to my brother's wife, Mary Elizabeth Dinning, my half interest in the property corner of Glasgow and Pearl streets, Park View; she is the owner of the other half of this property, and to my nephew, Harry James Dinning, the house and lot corner of Glasgow and First avenue, Scottsville; also my Lincoln Park lot; to my niece, Daisy Hunter Raby, I leave my place known as the Perry place, North street, Park View, and my lot in Buffalo, N. Y., to pay off the mortgage to Mr. Wise. I leave her this, she being my favorite niece, and for kindness in my life, I having raised her and loved her. I, William Dinning, say this is my last will and testament."

The court certifies that it was proved that William Dinning died on the 20th of March, 1903; that at the date mentioned in the writing he was upwards of 21 years of age, and of sound mind and memory; that the paper was wholly in his handwriting, and was found, a few days after his death, in a valise, with his other valuable papers.

Probate of this writing was refused upon the ground that it was not signed in such manner as to make it manifest that the name was intended as a signature. This judgment was excepted to, and a writ of error awarded by this court.

Section 2514 of the Code of 1887 requires that a will shall be signed by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction, in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature. This statute was first introduced into our law by the revisors of 1849, and has remained unchanged to the present day. It has several times been interpreted by this court. Ramsey, etc., v. Ramsey's Ex'r, 13 Grat. 664, 70 Am. Dec. 438; Roy, etc., v. Roy's Ex'rs, 16 Grat. 418, 84 Am. Dec. 696; Warwick v. Warwick, 86 Va. 602, 10 S. E. 843, 6 L. R. A. 775. The result of these decisions is that it must appear from the face of the paper that the testator designed by the use of his signature to authenticate the instrument; the manifest intention of the signature, wherever placed, being the rule of the statute.

In Ramsey v. Ramsey's Ex'r, supra, after reviewing the history of the law on the subject, Judge Daniel says: "When due weight is given to these considerations, there arises, I think, a fair inference that the Legislature, in requiring that the will shall be signed 'in such manner as to make it manifest that the name is intended as a signature,' designed not merely to enact what had been decided in Waller v. Waller [1 Grat. 454, 42 Am. Dec. 564], but to furnish a rule in respect to the signature, which, whilst it would have all the certainty of the British statute, would yet let in wills, which, though not signed at the foot or end, might be signed in such manner as to afford internal evidence of authenticity equally convincing."

In the case at bar the instrument was undoubtedly intended as a will. It makes an orderly and apparently complete disposition of the testator's property. After naming an executor, the testator gives directions as to the payment of his debts and the removal of his sister's remains to be buried beside his own; and, subject to the payment of these debts and expenses, makes certain specific bequests and devises, leaving for the last the provision he desired to make for his niece, the special object of his affection and bounty. He then concludes, "I, William Dinning, say this is my last will and testament." If, under the construction placed, as seen, for nearly 50 years, upon it, the statute was designed to furnish a rule in respect to the signature, which would let in wills, though not signed at the foot or end, if signed in such manner as to afford internal evidence of authenticity equally convincing, then it would be difficult to conceive of a case coming more nearly within the contemplation of the statute than the will under consideration. The signature is at the end of an apparently completed instrument, and followed by only eight words, which do not indicate a purpose to add anything more, or to take anything from what had been written, but, understood according to their usual acceptance, constitute an emphatic declaration that the signature was intended to authenticate all that had preceded it, as the final consummation of the testator's purpose. If the testator had said, "I say this is my last will and testament. William Dinning," no question could have been raised. The sense is exactly the same when he says, "I, William Dinning, say this is my last will and testament." Neither form was essential. The will would have been complete without those words, either following or preceding the signature. The testator evidently used them as adding force to his signature, and it would be trifling with the right of a man to dispose of his property by will to hold that the addition of the words mentioned after the signature to an otherwise completed will had resulted in rendering invalid the entire instrument.

For these reasons the judgment complained of must be reversed, and the case remanded, with directions to the lower court to enter an order admitting the will in question to probate.

TEMPLEMAN'S ADM'R v. PUGH.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 10, 1904.)

LIMITATIONS—PROSECUTION OF SUIT—OBSTRUCTIONS.

1. Section 2933 of Code of 1887, as amended by Act Feb. 19, 1898 (Acts 1897-98, p. 441, c.

404), providing that the statute of limitations shall not run while the prosecution of a right is obstructed in any manner therein mentioned, applies only to persons who obstruct the prosecution of such right, and has no application to deceased persons or their estates.

Error to Circuit Court, Fauquier County.

Action by A. B. Pugh, receiver, against the administrator of James A. Templeman. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

O. B. Roller, Mr. Martz, and T. J. Elliott, for plaintiff in error. Munford, Hunton, Williams & Anderson and Arthur B. Pugh, for defendant in error.

BUCHANAN, J. A. B. Pugh, receiver, on the 26th day of December, 1900, instituted his action of assumpsit against the personal representative of James A. Templeman, deceased, to recover the sum of $1,250, alleged to be due from the said decedent's estate on account of subscriptions to the stock of the Salem Loan & Real Estate Investment Company, chartered under the laws of this state.

The defendant appeared, and filed the plea of non assumpsit, the plea of res judicata, and two pleas of the statute of limitations—one of three years and the other of five years.

The plaintiff replied generally to the first two pleas, and filed two special replications to each of the pleas of the statute of limitations. To each of these special replications the defendant demurred. The court overruled the demurrers, and issues were joined. A jury was waived, and, all matters of law and fact having been submitted to the court for its determination, it rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. To that judgment this writ of error was awarded.

The facts relied on in the pleadings by the plaintiff to defeat the bar of the statute of limitations are the following: The contract sued on, which was to be performed in this state, was entered into in the year 1890 by James A. Templeman, who was then a citizen and resident of the state of Maryland, and continued to reside without the state of Virginia until his death on the 27th day of October, 1894. His will was probated and his executors qualified in the orphans' court of the city of Baltimore, in the state of Maryland. Afterwards, on the — day of —, 1900, ancillary letters of administration were granted to the sheriff of Fauquier county. The cause of action accrued on the 1st day of January, 1895.

Section 2920 of the Code of 1887, after fixing the period of limitation upon any action to recover money upon an award or any contract other than a judgment or recognizance, provides "that the right of action against the estate of any person hereafter dying [May 1, 1888] on any such award or contract, which shall have accrued at the time of his death, or the right to prove any such claim against his estate in any suit or proceeding, shall not in any case continue longer than five years from the qualification of his personal representative, or if the right of action shall not have accrued at the time of the decedent's death, it shall not continue longer than five years after the same shall have so accrued."

By section 2919 of the Code, as amended by an act approved February 12, 1896 (Acts 1895-96, p. 331, c. 292), it is provided, among other things, that the period of one year from the death of any party shall be excluded from the computation of time within which by the operation of any statute or rule of law it may be necessary to commence any proceeding to preserve or prevent the loss of any right or remedy.

The decedent, James A. Templeman, having died October 27, 1894, and this action not having been brought until December 26, 1900, the demand sued on, whether controlled by the three-years or the five-years statute of limitations, is barred, even if the period of one year from the death of the debtor should be excluded in computing the time between his death and the institution of this action, unless the decedent or his estate is exempted from the operation of the statute by section 2933 of the Code, as amended by act approved February 19, 1898 (Acts 1897-98, p. 441, c. 404). This section, as amended, so far as material to this case, is as follows:

"Where any such right as is mentioned in this chapter shall accrue against a person who, by departing without this state or by absconding or concealing himself, or by continuing to reside without the state, or by any other indirect way or means, shall obstruct the prosecution of such right, the time that such obstruction may have continued shall not be computed as any part of the time in which the said right might or ought to have been prosecuted. But this section shall not avail against any other person than him so obstructing, notwithstanding another might have been jointly sued with him if there had been no such obstruction."

The object of the Legislature in enacting that section was to stop the running of the statute of limitations as to the classes of persons therein mentioned as long as they obstructed the prosecution of any such right of action as is mentioned in chapter 140 of the Code. Since dead men cannot obstruct the prosecution of any such right, it is clear that the section can only apply to persons living at the time the right of action accrued, and then only to such time as they shall have obstructed the prosecution of such right in the manner therein indicated.

In this case, the debtor having died before the plaintiff's right of action accrued, he did not and could not obstruct its prosecution. He is neither within the letter nor the spirit of section 2933; neither is his estate. As soon as two months had elapsed after the debtor died, the plaintiff could have had his estate in Virginia committed to the sheriff of Fauquier county for administration (Code 1887, § 2845), and, as soon as his right of action accrued, have instituted this action, just as he could have done if the debtor had been a resident of this state when he died.

Statutes of limitations are statutes of repose, and especially is this true as to the estates of the dead. They are founded on a sound public policy, and should be so construed as to advance the policy they were designed to promote.

We are of opinion that the facts relied on are not sufficient to defeat the bar of the statute of limitations, and that the judgment of the circuit court must be reversed for so holding.

NORTHINGTON v. NORFOLK RY. & LIGHT CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Feb. 10, 1904.)

CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—CONTRADICTION—EVIDENCE—VERDICT—VACATION—NEW TRIAL—APPEAL—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE.

1. Under the express provisions of Acts 1891-92, p. 962, where there have been two trials of an action at law, and the verdict on the first is set aside by the trial court, and a new trial granted, and proper exceptions taken, and on the second trial a jury is waived, and no testimony introduced, whereupon a judgment is rendered, and the evidence certified, the appellate court will examine the evidence on the first trial, and, if the court erred in setting aside the verdict, the subsequent proceedings will be annulled, and a judgment rendered thereon.

2. In an action for injuries received while boarding a street car, held that, plaintiff's evidence being contradictory, a verdict in her favor was properly set aside as unsupported by the evidence.

Error to Law and Chancery Court of City of Norfolk.

Action by Anna Northington against the Norfolk Railway & Light Company. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Miller & Coleman, for plaintiff in error.
Richard B. Tunstall, for defendant in error.

WHITTLE, J. The plaintiff in error, Anna Northington, brings this case here to review a judgment of the court of law and chancery of the city of Norfolk setting aside the verdict of a jury awarding damages in her behalf against the defendant in error, the Norfolk Railway & Light Company, in an action for personal injuries.

The status of the case is as follows: There were two trials in the court below. At the first trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, which, upon motion of the defendant, was set aside as contrary to the law and evidence, and a new trial granted. At the second trial the plaintiff declined to introduce any testimony, and, a jury having been waived, the court rendered judgment for the defendant.

In such case, by statute, the rule of decision is that this court must "look first to the evidence and proceedings on the first trial, and if it discovers that the trial court erred in setting aside the verdict on that trial, it shall set aside and annul all proceedings subsequent to said verdict and enter judgment thereon." Acts 1891-92, p. 962; Wood v. Am. Nat. Bank, 100 Va. 306, 309, 40 S. E. 931.

The declaration alleges that while the plaintiff was in the act of boarding one of the defendant's cars at the intersection of Church and Henry streets, in the city of Norfolk, the car was suddenly and prematurely started, and the plaintiff was thrown to the ground with such violence that her leg was broken at or near the ankle.

The defendant denied liability upon two grounds: (1) Because the accident was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff in jumping from a car while in motion; and (2) that, in consideration of the payment of $50 and the doctor's bill for medical services rendered the plaintiff, she had acknowledged satisfaction, and executed and delivered a release of all claims and demands against the defendant on account of the injury.

Upon the question of negligence, the witnesses who testified on behalf of the plaintiff were the plaintiff herself, Mary Dean, her sister, Godfrey Watkins, and George Williams. The accident happened on Church street, which runs north and south, at or near the corner of Henry street, which runs east and west; and the case made by the declaration and the contention of the plaintiff is that she was thrown off "just as soon as the car started," while the competing theory of the defendant is that plaintiff jumped off the car after it had gotten under way, and while in motion. The ascertainment of the exact point at which the accident occurred is therefore of controlling importance.

Plaintiff testified that the car stopped to discharge and receive passengers at the southern corner of Henry street on Church street, and that she fell at the intersection of these two streets as soon as the car started, which, of course, fixes the place at which she fell as the southern corner of Henry street; and the testimony of Mary Dean is substantially to the same effect. Her witness Godfrey Watkins, on the contrary, says explicitly that she was thrown from the car north of the northern corner of Henry street. George Williams, also, after making contradictory statements, finally, on cross-examination, settles upon the northern corner of Henry street as the point at which plaintiff fell. Thus the plaintiff and her sister were contradicted by two of her own witnesses on a most material point in the case, for, if her version of the affair be true—that she was thrown off at once, by the car starting prematurely—then the place where she fell could not have been north of Henry street, at which place the car was unquestionably in motion. Upon that issue she was also contradicted by four of the defendant's witnesses—one of them the conductor of a trailer car attached to the street car, and three of them disinterested passengers—all of whom testified that the car had crossed Henry street and was in motion when plaintiff jumped off and received the injury. It seems that Mary Dean had intended to board the car, but failed to do so; and the supposition is that, when plaintiff discovered that her sister had been left behind, she jumped off in order to join her.

It also appears that in the receipt executed by plaintiff to the defendant for $50 in cash and the amount of the doctor's bill, which were agreed to be accepted in full settlement and release of all claim to damages against the defendant, she admitted that the injury was the result of her stepping from a moving car. It further appears from a contemporaneous report of the accident made by the conductor of the street car (produced on cross-examination of one of defendant's witnesses) that the car was running at the rate of six or eight miles an hour when the plaintiff was injured.

In the case of Preston v. Otey, 88 Va. 491, 14 S. E. 68, it was held that a party's admission was so inconsistent with his contention that a verdict in his favor ought to be set aside as against the evidence. And the court said in the case of N. & W. R. Co. v. Poole, 100 Va. 148, 40 S. E. 627, at page 153, 100 Va., page 629, 40 S. E.: "Where damages are claimed for injuries which may have resulted from one of two causes, for one of which the defendant is responsible, and for the other of which it is not responsible, the plaintiff must fail if his evidence does not show that the damage was produced by the former cause. And he must also fail if it is just as probable that the damages were caused by the one as by the other, since the plaintiff is bound to make out his case by a preponderance of the evidence." Searles v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 101 N. Y. 661, 5 N. E. 66; 1 Shear. & Red. on Neg. § 57; C. & O. Ry. Co. v. Sparrow, 98 Va. 640, 641, 37 S. E. 302.

The rule in this class of cases is that the evidence must show more than a probability of actionable negligence on the part of the defendant. Nevertheless the admission of the plaintiff, and the testimony of two of her witnesses, Godfrey Watkins and George Williams, are so opposed to her own testimony and theory of the cause of the accident that it is impossible for the court to determine with any degree of reliability which should be accepted as true. It is obvious, therefore, that any conclusion that might be reached in the case favorable to plaintiff would not be warranted by any certain evidence, but would be based upon conjecture merely.

Upon the first issue, in view of the contradictory, confused, and inconclusive character of the testimony of the plaintiff and her witnesses, without regard to the countervailing evidence of the defendant, the verdict of the jury was a plain deviation from justice and the right of the case. As remarked, there was no reliable, substantial evidence to support the verdict, and the action of the court in setting it aside was without error.

The remaining ground of defense, as stated, is that plaintiff had received the sum of $50, and payment of the doctor's bill, in satisfaction of all claims and demands against the defendant.

The settlement was made on July 28, 1901, and the action was not brought until April of the ensuing year. Plaintiff received the money and executed the release without any suggestion that she was a minor at that time. That contention was made for the first time when the action was instituted. While the evidence to sustain that issue is based upon the memory of unintelligent witnesses and is unsatisfactory, the view already taken by the court of the other branch of the case renders a consideration of the second ground of defense unnecessary.

Upon the whole case, the judgment complained of is without error, and must be affirmed.

BLACKWELL v. McNINCH.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 1, 1903.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDING BY MASTER— QUESTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW— PAYMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. A finding by the master, affirmed by the circuit judge on reference in an action on an unsecured note, cannot be reviewed on appeal.

2. An objection that the usury statute does not apply to the note in suit cannot be considered when not raised below.

3. In an action on a note, evidence considered, and held insufficient to show payment in full by personal services rendered under an agreement.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; Buchanan, Judge.

Action by Thomas R. Blackwell against James R. McNinch. Decree for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Wm. N. Graydon, for appellant.

JONES, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court affirming the report of the master, to whom all issues of law and fact had been referred. The master's report was as follows:

"This is an action to foreclose a mortgage and a suit on two unsecured notes. It appears that on the 21st day of November, 1889, one John I. McGhee held a mortgage over certain lands of defendant to secure the sum of $1,440, evidenced by three notes bearing interest at 7 per cent. On these papers were indorsed two payments, amounting together to $105.35. It seems, after a calculation was made, John I. McGhee agreed with James R. McNinch, the mortgagor and defendant herein, to take $500 for the debt. James R. McNinch, not having all the money with which to take up the mortgage, had Thomas R. Blackwell, the plaintiff, to advance a part of it. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant, advanced $462 and the defendant $38, and the papers were assigned to the plaintiff by John I. McGhee. It is further alleged in the complaint that, in order to show the amount paid by the plaintiff and to show the amount of interest agreed to be paid by the defendant, the said James R. McNinch executed and delivered to the plaintiff his note for $462, payable one year after date, with interest from maturity at ten per cent. per annum. The defendant admits the execution of this note and the payment thereon of $121.74 on November 11, 1893, but denies the payment of $10, October 27, 1898; alleges that the plaintiff advanced only $420, and he (the defendant) advanced $80; and pleads usury. For a further defense the defendant says that on account of and by reason of certain services he rendered the plaintiff at the request of the plaintiff and by an agreement with the plaintiff, the said debt had been fully paid, and the defendant pleads the same in satisfaction and payment thereof. As to the two $165 notes sued on: The defendant admits the execution of both notes; alleges that he received only $150 on each, that $15 in each was usurious interest added, pleads payment and usury, and sets up a counterclaim for $60 excess interest.

"From a careful consideration of the testimony, I find as matters of fact:

"First. That of the $500 paid John I. McGhee for the assignment of the mortgage herein sued on Thomas R. Blackwell, the plaintiff, advanced $420, and the defendant, James R. McNinch, $80. Mr. and Mrs. McNinch both swear that McNinch advanced $80 of this $500 and Blackwell advanced $420. The interest on $420 for one year at ten per cent. is $42, and $42 added to $420 makes $462, the principal of the note sued on, and which does not bear interest until after maturity, a year from the date. Whether Mr. Blackwell advanced $420 or $462, the plea of usury fails, since ten per cent. was legal at the time, whether interest was collected before or after maturity.

"Now, as to the other defense, to wit, the services the defendant claims paid this debt. The testimony shows that the defendant moved on the plaintiff's plantation in 1887, and lived there until 1900. He lived there as a renter a part of the time and as a crop-per a part. The plaintiff's place was a nine or ten horse farm. In 1887 the plaintiff moved off his place to Due West, and had the defendant move in the house vacated by himself. The defendant was subsequently put in charge of the whole place as overseer or keeper, and rendered valuable service to Mr. Blackwell, the plaintiff, in keeping up the plantation, by ditching, terracing, and repairing and building houses, for which Mr. Blackwell was to compensate him; and that Mr. Blackwell, in 1894, upon the defendant offering to pay him money on this mortgage debt, refused to accept the money, and told the defendant that, if he would remain on the place, and continue to render services for the unexpired term of ten years, he would surrender him the mortgage marked satisfied, in consideration of his services. The preponderance of the testimony, to my mind, establishes the fact that John R. McNinch rendered these services alleged to have been rendered the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff agreed with the defendant to accept these services in payment of the mortgage debt, and I so find.

"As to the note for $165, dated January 30, 1894, I find from the testimony that it had been paid. That the said note was usurious, in that the original debt was $150, and $15 as interest for one year was added as interest on $150. This note was given for money and supplies to be advanced, but, being included in the 1894 account of Blackwell against McNinch, which account appears to have been settled by compromise, I cannot find that the $15 interest was paid as interest; hence the counterclaim as to this note is disallowed.

"As for the $165 note of April 3, 1896, I find, as a matter of fact, from a careful consideration of the testimony and a comparison of the papers offered in evidence, that this note has been fully paid, and the said note was usurious, in that $15 was added as interest for less than a year's time on $150. The counterclaim to this note is sustained for twice the difference in interest at eight per cent. and ten per cent., to wit, in the sum of $6.

"Upon the foregoing findings I conclude as matter of law: (1) That the complaint herein be dismissed, with costs. (2) That the defendant have judgment against the plaintiff for $6. (3) That the mortgage herein sued on be delivered up and marked satisfied of record."

The exceptions relate merely to the findings of fact. With respect to the unsecured notes of $165 each, we regard the conclusion of the circuit court as final. The action, in so far as it relates to these notes, is one at law, and no equitable defense is involved. The plaintiff, having waived trial by jury, is bound by the determination of the facts by the circuit court, and this court has no power to review such findings of fact in an action at law.

We have not considered the point presented in argument by appellant's counsel that as to these notes which were executed prior to March 2, 1898, the usury law was repealed under section 1664, Code 1902 (Act 1898, 22 St. at Large, p. 749), for the reason that it does not appear that such question was raised before or considered by the circuit court, nor is there any exception specifically raising such question.

With respect to the foreclosure of the mortgage, the action is equitable, and this court may reverse the findings of fact therein if such findings are against the preponderance of the evidence. A careful consideration of the testimony leads us to the conclusion that the circuit court was in error in dismissing the complaint in foreclosure upon the ground stated—that defendant rendered services to plaintiff, and that plaintiff agreed with defendant to accept these services in payment of the mortgage debt. The complaint thus alleges the agreement in question: "That in November, 1893, upon the occasion of making the payment of $121.74, mentioned in paragraph 5 of the complaint, the plaintiff promised and agreed with defendant that if he would continue in the performance of the services hereinabove mentioned until ten years had elapsed from the time when defendant moved on the lands, as herein stated, that plaintiff would satisfy in full the indebtedness of defendant to plaintiff, evidenced by the papers set out in paragraph 4 of the complaint, and the same cancel and deliver to this defendant." The only testimony offered to establish this alleged agreement was by the defendant alone, who testified as follows: "In 1894, I offered to pay Mr. Blackwell money on the land, and he refused to take it, saying that I had helped him four years, and, if I made out the ten years, he would give me up the mortgage. He said he would pay me if I would go ahead and help him out. I had worked five or six years when he promised to give me the mortgage. I had worked on and kept up the place for a little over four years." The defendant further testified that his services were worth $400 for the whole time he was on plaintiff's place, if we limit the time of his services to 10 years. According to defendant's estimate, his services were worth $40 per year. It does not appear at what time in 1894 this alleged agreement was made; but, after crediting the mortgage on November 11, 1893, with the payment of $121.74, the annual interest of the balance of the debt exceeded the annual value of the services—a very improbable contract, to say the least of it. The plaintiff testifies: "In 1894 I never offered to give the mortgage to McNinch for services. Never did make any such contract with him." Remembering that the burden of proof rested upon the defendant to establish the alleged agreement, and in view of the unreasonableness of such a contract, we do not think it could fairly be well said that the preponderance of the evidence was against the plaintiff, an unimpeached witness, who positively denied having made any such contract. But there is a strong circumstance in the case which corroborates the plaintiff, and is wholly inconsistent with the defendant's version. It appears that in 1899 the plaintiff assigned this mortgage to a Mr. Todd as collateral security, after procuring from defendant the receipt of $121.74 for payment of November 11, 1893, for the purpose of placing upon the mortgage all proper credits, in accordance with the demand of Mr. Todd. The defendant thus testifies as to this circumstance: "In 1899, in February, Mr. Blackwell came down to my house for the $121.74 receipt. Said he wanted to credit it on the mortgage, so he could use the mortgage with Mr. Todd. I asked him what Todd was doing with my papers. He said he was going to place the paper with Todd as collateral security. He wanted money, and Todd would not take it without all credits being put on it. He [Mr. Blackwell] never said I was not entitled to the mortgage. When he asked me for the receipt, I asked him what business Todd had with my papers, and he asked if I would not loan him $500. He said he would not let me suffer, and I gave him the receipt the next morning." The defendant further testified: "When Mr. Blackwell came for the receipt I never forbade to pledge the mortgage to Mr. Todd, but I told Blackwell it was my mortgage. I never told Mr. Todd the mortgage was paid." With reference to this matter the plaintiff testified: "When I called on McNinch for the $121.74 receipt, he did not hesitate to give it to me. He never laid any claim to the mortgage." The fact that the defendant aided plaintiff in 1899 in placing all proper credits upon the mortgage with a view to enable him to assign it as collateral to a third person, is wholly inconsistent with the idea that the mortgage was then paid by the services rendered. We have not considered in this connection the statute of frauds, which forbids action upon any agreement that is not to be performed within one year, unless the agreement be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, as no question has been raised with reference to said statute. The circuit court therefore erred in holding that the mortgage was paid by the services alleged to have been rendered under such an agreement and in dismissing the complaint. Subject to what we shall hereafter direct, the plaintiff was entitled to a decree of foreclosure for the sum of $462, with interest from November 21, 1890, as stipulated, less credit of $121.74, November 11, 1893, and the credit of $10, October 27, 1898, admitted by plaintiff, although denied by defendant, and less also the amount of $6, allowed as a counterclaim by the master and circuit court in the action on the unsecured notes. Equity requires that the mortgage debt should be credited or reduced by whatever amount plaintiff is justly liable to pay defendant for services rendered. But as neither the master nor the circuit court has made any findings as to the value of such services and plaintiff's liability to pay therefor, independent of the alleged special agreement, which defendant failed to establish, we are not prepared to finally dispose of the case, and will remand it for an inquiry into those matters.

The judgment of the circuit court, in so far as it relates to the unsecured two notes of $165 each, is affirmed; but in so far as it relates to the foreclosure of the mortgage it is reversed, and the case is remanded for such further proceedings as may be proper to carry out the views herein announced.

MILFORD v. MILFORD.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. July 9, 1903.)

USURY--EVIDENCE--PAYMENT OF NOTE--APPLICATION OF USURIOUS INTEREST.

1. In an action to foreclose a mortgage, evidence held to show that an amount added to the notes given for the price of land rendered them usurious.

2. Where a debtor agrees that certain payments shall be applied to certain notes as payment in full, and they are canceled and turned over to him, he cannot thereafter claim that usurious interest was collected on the notes.

3. Where a contract under which certain notes secured by mortgage were given is held usurious, and some of the notes have been paid in full and surrendered, the debtor cannot, by way of counterclaim, have the penalty for usurious interest thus collected credited on the balance of the principal due, but the creditor is entitled to judgment for balance of the principal, but without costs.

4. Where, in action on notes, defendant sets up counterclaim for usurious interest, and the court finds as a matter of fact that there has been no payment of usurious interest, and defendant does not appeal, there is no material error in failing to consider the counterclaim.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenwood County; Joseph A. McCollough, Special Judge.

Suit by Joseph H. Milford against John R. Milford. From a decree, plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Plaintiff appeals on following exceptions, charging error:

"(1) In overruling the sixth exception to the report of the master, which exception charged that the master erred in his findings as follows, to wit: 'Sixth. In holding that the additional amount inserted in the notes was illegal interest, instead of holding that it went to make up the credit portion of the land sold; the error being that the testimony of both the plaintiff and the defendant was that $2,251.20 was the sum agreed on by them as the credit price of the said tract of land.

"(2) In overruling the seventh exception of the plaintiff to the report of the master, which exception charged that the master erred in his findings as follows, to wit: 'Seventh. In not holding that the vendor and purchaser of land have the right to insert in their contract an additional sum in consideration of credit extended by the vendor, and the fact that it is a certain percentage on the purchase money cannot make any difference, unless it is provided in the contract that it shall be payable under the name of interest;' the error being that the statute against usury forbids the charging, taking, agreeing upon, or allowing a greater rate of interest than seven, or eight, or ten per centum per annum for the hiring, lending, or use of money or other commodity, and does not apply at all to land; and the decisions of this court being that an additional sum may be charged or agreed upon for the credit portion of the purchase money on sale of a tract of land, unless it is charged or agreed upon as interest by name.

"(3) In not holding that the testimony in this case shows that $2,251.20 was the credit price of the land as agreed upon by the vendor and purchaser, and the fact that a different consideration was expressed in the deed could not change the rights and liabilities of the parties, the real consideration being set out in the notes and mortgage, and it being competent for the real consideration to be proved by parol.

"(4) In overruling the plaintiff's ninth exception to the report of the master, which exception charged that the master erred in his findings as follows, to wit: 'Ninth. In not holding that the defense of usury cannot be set up to the first two notes in this action, for the two reasons that the action is not brought on the first two notes or the first three notes, but on the last three, and that the money paid by the defendant was applied by agreement of the parties to the principal and interest due on the first three notes, leaving a balance due on the third note of $40, and that the contract was fully executed as to such three notes;' the error being that the testimony of both the plaintiff and the defendant was that by agreement made between them the first nine payments were applied to the face of the first note, with interest thereon at ten per centum per annum until it was paid in full; then to the amount due on the second note according to its face, with interest thereon at ten per centum per annum, until it was paid in full; and then to the amount due according to the face of the third note, with interest thereon at ten per centum per annum, leaving a balance due thereon of $48.92; and that the defendant made no complaint except that there was an error in the date of a credit, which he did not try to correct.

"(5) In overruling the plaintiff's tenth exception to the master's report, which exception charged that the master erred in his findings as follows, to wit: 'Tenth. In finding and holding that there is due upon the mortgage debt only $638.40, whereas he should have held, under the evidence submitted in this case, including the written papers, that there is due thereon more than $1,100;' the error being that the parties hereto applied to the first three notes and interest the sum of $1,807.87, leaving a balance due thereon of $48.92, besides the whole amount due on the other three notes, to wit, on the fourth note, $275, on the fifth note, $320, and on the sixth note, $362; and, if all interest should be disallowed, the plaintiff would still be entitled to judgment for over $900.

"(6) In sustaining the defendant's second exception to the master's report, which charged that the master erred in his findings as follows, to wit: 'Second. The master should have found as matter of fact that all payments were made on the debt, and accordingly applied the payments made to the discharge of the principal debt without interest or costs;' the error being that his honor should not have considered at all an exception which does not specifically point out the error complained of, and that all the testimony submitted both by the defendant and the plaintiff showed that the first nine payments were applied by agreement of the parties first to the interest at ten per centum per annum on the first three notes, and then to the principal due thereon, leaving a balance of $48.92 due on the third note; and therefore the said exceptions should have been sustained at most only as to the tenth payment of $100, as to which there was no application made by the parties.

"(7) In finding and holding that the evidence showed that the purchase price of the land was only $1,632, whereas he should have held that the testimony offered by both parties showed that the credit purchase price of the land was $2,251.20.

"(8) In finding and holding that 'at the time these payments were made nothing was said as to their application'; the said finding being irrelevant to the questions in the case, as they had the right to make the application of the payments at the time they were made or at any time thereafter, and, the defendant having consented to such application and appropriation, he is bound thereby, and cannot now be allowed to question it.

"(9) In finding and holding that the plaintiff does not base his actions on the theory that those two notes, including usurious interest, had been paid; no exception or objection on that ground having been made by the defendant, and the testimony of both the plaintiff and the defendant, admitted without objection by the defendant, showing that the first nine payments made were applied by the parties to the interest at ten per cent. and the principal due on the first three notes.

"(10) In not finding and holding that, where several notes of a series are paid and taken up, and the suit is brought on the remaining notes of the series, the contract as to the notes so paid off must be held to be executed, and the plea of usury in such notes so paid cannot be allowed in the suit on the remaining notes.

"(11) In finding and holding that the several notes mentioned in the complaint were evidences of one contract, the said finding being irrelevant to the issues before the court, and the testimony being that the parties treated them as separate and distinct transactions, and they being such in fact.

"(12) In holding that the plaintiff must be bound by the allegations of his complaint as to the sufficiency of the payments made to pay off the principal and interest of certain of the notes, not applying the same rule to the allegations made by the defendant in his answer, and then disregarding the testimony of both the plaintiff and defendant on that point, which was admitted without objection or exception on the part of the defendant.

"(13) In finding and holding that the plaintiff can only recover the principal sum, amount, or value so lent or advanced, without any interest, which amount is $1,632; there being no evidence that any amount was lent or advanced, but that the land was sold for a certain credit price, and the plea of usury being applicable only to so much of the sum stated in each note as was reserved as interest eo nomine.

"(14) In finding and holding that at the time these various payments were made there was no direction as to their application, and the plaintiff was therefore bound to apply them to such legal obligation as he held against the defendant, such legal obligation being the purchase price of the land, to wit, $1,632; such finding being erroneous in the following particulars: (a) In ignoring the principle that, where the rights of third persons are not in question, the parties to a contract for the payment of money may make any application of money paid by the debtor that they may see proper to make, and that such application may be made by them either at the time of payment or at any subsequent time, and when so made, neither party has the right afterwards to repudiate it. (b) The said parties did, in fact, make a different application of the payments from the one his honor thinks should have been made, and they had the legal right to make it. (c) In holding that the purchase price of the land was $1,632, when the undisputed testimony both of the plaintiff and the defendant was that it was $2,251.20.

"(15) In making the following findings in his said decree, to wit: 'I further conclude from the pleadings and testimony that there has been no application of said payments or any part of them, to usurious interest.

* * * I have some doubts as to whether or not the parties could subsequently consent to their application to usurious interest, when no such application was made at the time.

* * * Be that as it may, I am satisfied from this testimony that no such agreement was had, and, indeed, by his complaint the plaintiff repudiates any such theory. The defendant certainly did not consent to such application, and the fact that he received the notes canceled would not be conclusive evidence of the fact, for the reason that, owing only so much of the notes as represented the legal debt, when that amount was paid he would be entitled to a surrender of the evidence of said debt. Besides this, he denies that any such application was made with his knowledge and consent.' The errors in said findings and rulings are as follows, to wit: (a) In finding that there was no application of the payments to the interest at ten per cent., and that the defendant did not consent to such application, the testimony of the defendant on that point being as follows: 'I know that the payments had been put on the first and second notes—that the $50 paid the first two notes and some on the third, by Mr. Giles' calculation. * * * I agreed that the first notes were to be calculated at ten per cent. interest, and the amounts I paid to be applied on these first notes. The error in the Giles statement was a credit, was placed in the wrong place. I don't know where it was and how much it was.' (b) In doubting the right of the parties to agree on an application of payments after they had been made, it being the right of the parties to make such application at any time, if the rights of third parties are not affected thereby. (c) In finding that the plaintiff repudiates such theory, the rule being that both parties are equally bound by the allegations of the pleadings, and the testimony, which was admitted without objection, showing that the parties had made such application. (d) In holding that the defendant owed only so much of the notes as represented the legal debt, thus finding that a debt for usurious interest is not a legal debt; whereas it is respectfully submitted that an agreement to pay interest in excess of the amount allowed by law is not immoral and not illegal in any other sense than a debt barred by the statute of limitations is illegal, namely, that the law will not lend its aid to enforce the payment of it.

"(16) In finding that there is due to the plaintiff on the mortgage debt only the sum of $224.13, whereas he should have found from the undisputed testimony in the case there is due the sum of at least $1,000."

Graydon & Giles, for appellant. Sheppards & Grier, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This appeal involves some alleged errors in the findings of fact and conclusion of law in the decree rendered in this case by Hon. Joseph A. McCollough, presiding as special judge in the court of common pleas for Greenwood county. We do not know that full justice will be done the parties litigant except by reproducing in this opinion the report of the master of Greenwood county and the decree of the special judge:

"I beg leave to submit the following report:

"This is an action to foreclose mortgage given November 26, 1890, by the defendant to the plaintiff, on the tract of land mentioned and described in the complaint, to secure the payment of six promissory notes made by the defendant to the plaintiff for the alleged purchase money of the said tract of land. The said notes aggregate $2,251.20, which is the alleged purchase price paid for the said tract of land. The first note reads as follows: '$363.20. On or before November 26th, 1901, I promise to pay Joseph H. Milford or order the sum of $363.20, with interest from date of maturity until paid in full at ten per cent. per annum. Value received, in first payment of 136 acres of land this day conveyed to me. This note secured by mortgage this November 26th, 1890. J. R. Milford. Attest: C. A. C. Waller.' The second note, of same date, was for $368.70, due November 26, 1892, and provided for interest from date of maturity at ten per cent. per annum. The third note, of the same date, was for $370.70, and provided for interest from date of maturity, to wit, November 26, 1893, at ten per cent. per annum. The fourth note, of the same date, for $377.70, provided for interest from date of maturity, to wit, November 26th, ten per cent. per annum. The fifth note, of the same date, was for $388.20, provided for interest from date of maturity, to wit, November 26, 1895, at ten per cent. per annum. The sixth note, of the same date, was for $398.20, and provided for interest from date of maturity, to wit, November 26, 1896, at ten per cent. per annum. The complaint alleges the following payments, which are admitted to be correct: (1) November 18, 1891, $131; (2) November 12, 1892, $190; (3) December 19, 1892, $75; (4) November 14, 1893, $200; (5) December 12, 1893, $50; (6) November 19, 1894, $100; (7) October 26, 1895, $200; (8) December 21, 1895, $50; (9) October 17, 1896, $400; (10) January 14, 1898, $100. The complaint further alleges that the first nine payments above set out were sufficient to pay and satisfy, and did pay and satisfy, the first two notes above mentioned, and the legal interest due thereon, and also the legal interest due on the other four notes, and the plaintiff canceled and delivered to the defendant the first two notes, and that the last payment was sufficient to pay and satisfy the interest due on the said last four notes, but left certain sums due on the principal; that there is now due and unpaid on the said debt the sum of $1,156.09, with interest thereon from the 14th of January, 1898. The defendant, answering, admits the execution of the said six notes and the mortgage, and the payments as above set out, but denies that the purchase price of the said tract of land was $2,251.20, and alleges that it was only $1,632, and no more. The defendant further alleges in his answer that to each of the said notes was added a usurious and unlawful interest, and that the note provided for a greater rate of interest than seven per cent. per annum; that the purchase price was $1,632, and that the excess was usurious and unlawful interest added; that the defendant has paid the plaintiff on the principal sum, $1,632, the sum of $1,407.87, leaving due thereon the sum of $224.13, without interest or cost. The defendant pleaded usury, and sets up a counterclaim for $1,107.14, and asks that the complaint be dismissed, with costs. The plaintiff replied, denying the allegation of the counterclaim and pleading the statute of limitations. The plaintiff demurred to the defense contained in the answer, and also to the counterclaim, on the ground that the defense and counterclaim set out that the rate of interest was greater than seven per cent. only, but does not show that it was greater than eight per cent., and does not show what the excess was. (Demurrer overruled.) The plaintiff's attorney moved to amend his reply by inserting 'three' instead of 'six' before 'years.' (Amendment allowed.)

"I will consider first the question of usury. Section 1390 of the Revised Statutes [of 1893] is as follows: 'No greater rate of interest than seven per cent. per annum shall be charged, taken, agreed upon or allowed upon any contract arising in this state for the hiring, lending or use of money or other commodity, except upon written contract, wherein by express agreement a rate of interest not exceeding eight per cent. may be charged. No person or corporation lending or advancing money or other commodity upon a greater rate of interest shall be allowed to recover in any court of this state any portion of the interest so unlawfully charged; and the principal sum, amount or value so lent or advanced, without any interest, shall be deemed and taken by the courts of this state to be the true legal debt or measure of damages, to all intents and purposes whatever, to be recovered without costs: provided, that the provisions of this section shall not apply to contracts or agreements entered into or discounts or arrangements made prior to the first of March, 1890.' As the notes sued on in this case provide upon their face for a greater rate of interest than the law allowed, the defense of usury must, therefore, be sustained, and the principal sum considered the true legal debt.

"Now, as to the counterclaim. The plea of the statute of limitations is overruled. Claim for penalty for excepting the usurious interest is not barred in three years when set up as a counterclaim. Mortgage Co. v.

Gillam, 49 S. C. 345 [26 S. E. 990, 29 S. E. 203]. From the testimony I find as matters of fact: That the purchase price of the said tract of land was $1,632, and the principal in each of the said six notes was as follows: First note, $200; second note, $225; third note, $250; fourth note, $275; fifth note, $320; sixth note, $362—total, $1,632. That to the principal of each of the said notes was added interest at ten per cent. per annum upon certain sums of principal. The testimony of Mrs. Milford clearly shows what amount of original principal was taken and what interest was added, the usurious interest added being the difference between seven per cent. interest and ten per cent. interest. As a matter of fact I find the amount of usurious interest received by the plaintiff from the defendant to be $155.25, as per a calculation to be attached as a part of this report. The fourth payment of $200, on November 14, 1893, overpaid the first note, and the plaintiff received $65.89 excess interest. The seventh payment, to wit, $200, on October 26, 1895, overpaid the second note by $18.52, and the defendant received up to and including this payment excess interest in all amounting to $153.25. These two notes were paid in full, and subsequently canceled, and delivered to the defendant. As matter of law, the counterclaim should be sustained in twice the sum of $153.25, to wit, in the sum of $306.50.

"I find as matters of fact that there is due and unpaid on the principal sum the sum of $638.40, which I ascertained by taking from the principal sum, $1,632, the aggregate principal of the first two notes, to wit, $425, the overpayment of the $18.52 of the second note, and the three last payments made by the defendant. Wherefore I conclude as matters of law that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of foreclosure in the sum of $331.98, the difference between balance of principal sum and the counterclaim allowed, without interest and cost.

"The testimony taken is herein attached as a part of this report.

"I further beg leave to report that if the usurious interest, to wit, $65.89, received in the payment of the first note, November 14, 1893, is barred because of the lapse of six years before the commencement of this action, then in that event the counterclaim allowed should be reduced in the sum of twice $65.89, and the judgment of foreclosure should be for $463.76, but under the pleadings my views are as above set forth. Still it occurs to me that in a separate action to recover the penalty for the receipt of usurious interest paid six years prior to the commencement of the action, and when the particular note upon which the interest is received is paid in full six years prior to the suit, the claim would be held barred by the statute of limitations."

The decree of the circuit judge was as follows:

"This case was heard by me upon exceptions to the master's report, both on the part of the plaintiff and the defendant. Inasmuch as the report of the master contains a full and clear statement of the case, I shall not discuss the facts in detail, and content myself in confirming the master's conclusions of both law and fact, except as herein-after modified. The exceptions both on the part of the plaintiff and the defendant, in so far as they conflict with the views herein-after announced, are overruled.

"The principal question involved is that of usury. I concur in so much of the master's report as finds the debt in question usurious. The ten per cent. included in the several notes, which notes represented the debt for the purchase money of the land, was intended as interest, and therefore clearly usurious. According to the testimony on behalf of both the plaintiff and the defendant, the purchase price of the land was only $1,632, and no more. The parties, if they had so desired, could have fixed the price at $2,251.20; but they did not do so. It appears that the plaintiff has paid the defendant in all the sum of $1,407.87, and I believe there is no dispute as to this fact. At the time these payments were made, I find from the testimony that nothing was said as to their application. It seems that some time afterward the parties met in the office of Mr. Giles, and a calculation was submitted, and, according to the testimony of the plaintiff, 'Mr. Giles calculated the interest on them [the notes], and, finding that enough had been paid to take up the notes, I delivered them.' These notes were calculated as per their face value, which included ten per cent. interest. The defendant says that he protested that the calculation was not correct, but accepted the notes. In his complaint the plaintiff does not base his action upon the theory that those two notes, including usurious interest, had been paid. He says 'that the first nine payments above set out were sufficient to pay and satisfy, and did pay and satisfy, the first two notes mentioned above, and the legal interest due thereon, and also the legal interest due on the other four notes, and the plaintiff thereupon canceled and delivered to the defendant the said first two notes.' The defendant denies this allegation of the complaint, sets up his counterclaim for usury, and claims that all of the payments that he made should be credited on the original debt of $1,632, for which amount the plaintiff should have judgment, without interest or cost.

"I conclude as matter of law that the several notes mentioned in the complaint were evidence of one contract. See Heyward v. Williams, 63 S. C. 470 [41 S. E. 550]. The said notes upon their face provide for a greater rate of interest than the law allows, and a greater rate of interest than the law allows was claimed upon the principal and added to the notes at the time they were drawn, thereby rendering the said debt usurious in its inception. I therefore conclude in this action that the plaintiff can only recover as against the defendant the principal sum, amount, or value so lent or advanced, without any interest, which amount is $1,632.

"I further conclude from the testimony and pleadings in this case that at the time these various payments were made by the defendant there was no direction as to their application, and the plaintiff was therefore bound to apply them to the payment of such legal obligation as he held against the defendant. This legal obligation was the purchase price of the land, to wit, $1,632.

"I further conclude from the pleadings and the testimony that there has been no application of the said payments or any part of them to usurious interest, and therefore the question of counterclaim fades from the case. I have some doubts as to whether or not the parties could subsequently consent to their application to usurious interest, when no such application was made at the time, so as to furnish the basis of a counterclaim; but, be that as it may, I am satisfied from this testimony that no such agreement was had, and, indeed, by this complaint the plaintiff himself repudiates any such theory. The defendant certainly did not consent to such application, and the fact that he received the notes canceled would not be conclusive evidence of the fact, for the reason that, owing only so much of the notes as represented the legal debt, when that amount was paid he would be entitled to a surrender of the evidence of said debt. Besides this, he denies that any such application was made with his knowledge and consent.

"I therefore conclude that the defendant is entitled to a credit of $1,407.87, this representing the total amount of his payments on the debt, $1,632 being the purchase price of the land, without interest, leaving the defendant due the plaintiff the sum of $224.13, for which amount he is entitled to judgment, without interest or costs."

The plaintiff's many exceptions will be reported with the case. However, we will pass upon each one of them.

1. Unfortunately for the plaintiff, in contending that the credit price was the amount of the mortgage, he forgets that the plaintiff himself conveyed this land by his deed for the sum of $1,632, and not the sum of $2,251.20. The latter sum was produced by adding the interest to the six notes, due respectively one, two, three, four, five, and six years after the date of the deed. The fact of these notes, without interest, foots exactly $1,632, the sum named in the deed. This exception is overruled.

2. There is no weight or force in this exception. The overwhelming weight of the testimony is in favor of the master and circuit judge in this matter. This exception is overruled.

3. This exception is overruled. The testimony shows there was no credit price of the land. The land sold on a credit, and a mortgage was given for the six notes and interest accruing after the sale. The deed shows what was the price fixed upon at which the land was sold. Of course, parties could make a "credit price" sale, but the trouble is that the testimony shows that these parties did not do so.

4. We think there is merit in this exception, which we will endeavor to unfold. The plaintiff in this complaint did not sue on the first three notes. He admitted in his said complaint that such three notes were paid. He only claimed $6.99 on the third note (and his firmness in still holding out before Mr. Giles for this sum of $6.99 is what has cost him this suit, no doubt). The plaintiff turned over to the defendant two or three years before this suit was brought, the first two of such notes as fully paid, and the defendant received them as fully paid, and has had them in his possession ever since. Consider in this connection what both the plaintiff and the defendant stated in their testimony was their object in having Mr. Giles to make his calculation for the two. John R. Milford said: "This paper shown me is the Giles calculation. This calculation was made to settle the dispute as to whether the third note was paid." Joseph H. Milford, the plaintiff, testified: "Mr. John Milford said the third note was paid, and I told him I thought not, and we left it to Mr. Giles to make by agreement between us." Again, Mr. John R. Milford testified: "I agreed that the first note was to be calculated at ten per cent. interest, and the amounts I paid to be applied on those first notes." (Italics ours.) Inasmuch as there are no third persons, such as creditors of John H. Milford, to object to the credit being applied to the first three notes, he (John R. Milford) had a right at any time to consent to this application of its payment. Once he agreed to this arrangement, and the arrangement was then carried out, he could not afterwards successfully object. The first three notes were thereby paid, and no longer play any part in this controversy, for the transaction whereby the first three notes became paid is an executed transaction. It is a law in this state that you cannot impute usury to an executed transaction. Chief Justice McIver stated in Butler v. Butler, 62 S. C., at page 174, 40 S. E., at page 141: "Section 1390 [Rev. St. 1893] only prohibits the recovery of any interest upon a contract tainted with usury, and there is nothing in the statute which either expressly or by necessary implication provides that interest paid for or to the commencement of any action upon a contract infected with usury and credited as such shall be regarded as a payment upon the principal sum loaned and so credited. In other words, section 1390 does not purport to disturb an executed transaction, but simply provides that when the power of the court is invoked for the enforcement of a contract which was either usurious in its inception or has since become so by the subsequent payment of usurious interest, or by any other means, that the creditor shall not be allowed to recover any more than the principal sum loaned, without interest or costs. For example, if A. executes his note whereby he promises to pay to B. a specified sum of money at a designated time, with interest from the date of the note at lawful rate of interest, and the contract subsequently becomes tainted with usury by the payment of interest at a rate in excess of the lawful rate, section 1390 does not purport to disturb such payment by declaring that it shall operate as a credit on the principal of the note, but simply declares that, if the payee undertakes to enforce the payment of such contract by any proceeding at law, he will not be allowed to recover anything more than the principal sum loaned, without any interest or cost; but this cannot affect interest already paid and credited as such." This decision of this court was affirmed in the case of Bird v. Kendall et al., 62 S. C. 178, 40 S. E. 142. We will have occasion hereinafter to state the effect of these decisions in a practical way. This exception is sustained.

5. This exception must be sustained for the following reason: The principal of the debt was the sum of $1,632. The principal contained in the first three notes was ($200, $225, and $250) $675. The principal in the last three notes ($362, $320, $275) was the amount due on the principal, $957. Now, no interest is to be charged on the last three notes from 1890 to the date of the judgment—nearly 13 years—because the interest which was to be paid, as shown by the notes and mortgage, was 10 per cent., which is admitted to be usurious. All the plaintiff can legally claim or recover because of his charge of usurious interest is the balance of his principal, $957. But it might be suggested that the defendant paid 10 per cent. on the first three notes, and that such notes should have the interest which defendant paid on those added to such principal, $675, of such first three notes, and the aggregate deducted from the principal, $1,632. To do this, however, would be to interfere with an executed transaction. The defendant admitted that he had already paid these notes and the interest thereon before suit was brought on the last three notes, and the plaintiff only sued upon the last three notes. Here this exception is sustained.

6. We see no force in this exception. It is overruled.

7. We have already, by what we have held in considering the first three exceptions, overruled this exception.

8. We think this exception should be sustained. We have already held that the parties to the suit agreed upon an application of the defendant's payments to the first three notes.

9. For reasons already given this exception is sustained.

10. For reasons already given this exception is sustained.

11. The contract between the parties was for the sale of the land at the price of $1,632, and a credit was given for that price in six notes, each note separate and distinct. Three of those notes have been paid, leaving three notes unpaid. The judgment of the court must be directed to the last three notes, which alone plaintiff sued to recover. This exception is sustained.

12. We sustain this exception for reasons already given.

13. This exception is overruled for reasons already given.

14. We sustain this exception for reasons already given.

15. We sustain this exception for reasons already given.

16. We sustain this exception for reasons already given. The plaintiff is entitled to have his judgment against the defendant and a foreclosure of his mortgage to recover the sum of $157, without interest and without cost.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be modified as herein required.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The defendant has filed a petition for rehearing in this case on several grounds, one of which is that the court overlooked the fact that defendant, by his answer, among other things sets up a counterclaim. His honor the circuit judge, in his decree, which is set out in the opinion, uses this language: "I further conclude from the pleadings and the testimony that there has been no application of the said payments, or any part of them, to usurious interest, and therefore the question of counterclaim fades from the case. I have some doubt as to whether or not the parties could subsequently consent to their application to usurious interests, when no such application was made at the time, so as to furnish the basis of a counterclaim. But be that as it may, I am satisfied from the testimony that no such agreement was had, and, indeed, by his complaint, the plaintiff himself repudiates any such theory. The defendant certainly did not consent to such application, and the fact that he received the notes canceled would not be conclusive evidence of the fact, for the reason that, owing only so much of the notes as represented the legal debt, when that amount was paid, he would be entitled to a surrender of the evidence of said debt. Besides this, he denies that any such application was made with his knowledge and consent." We construe this as a finding of fact that there has been no payment of usurious interest. The defendant did not appeal from this finding of fact, nor did he serve notice that he would rely upon a reversal of this finding as an additional ground for sustaining the judgment of the circuit court. Under these circumstances this court is of the opinion that there was no material error in failing to consider the counterclaim, for, if it was a fact that no usurious interest was received or taken, then there was no basis for the application of section 1391, Rev. St. 1893, as to counterclaim.

Another ground relied upon for a rehearing is, it is submitted, that the court overlooked the fact that there was no application of the last payment of $100, and was therefore in error in applying it to discharge the interest at 10 per cent. on the third note. This ground must be sustained, and the judgment of this court must be modified accordingly, but we see no necessity for ordering a reargument.

After careful examination of all other questions presented by the petition, we are satisfied that no material question of law or fact has either been disregarded or overlooked.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of this court be modified in the particular hereinbefore mentioned, and that the order heretofore granted staying a remittitur be revoked.

HILL v. SOUTHERN RY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 1, 1903.)

RAILROADS — CHARTER — CONSTRUCTION — APPEAL—REVIEW—EXCEPTIONS— QUESTION FOR JURY.

1. A provision in a railroad charter authorizing it to build a railroad on the most practical route from S., "passing near the village of U." does not prevent the railroad company from passing through the village of U., but only requires it to be built at such a distance as to be convenient to the inhabitants of the village.

2. An exception on appeal alleging error in the granting of a nonsuit will not be considered where such ground was not urged below.

3. The question of title to land claimed by a railroad as a right of way is for the jury, where there is evidence of adverse use of a part of it in a manner inconsistent with its use for right of way.

4. An exception that the court erred in not allowing plaintiff to rebut presumption of statute, and what her father said about the right of the railroad company to go through the premises, and that there was never any deed to the land or right of way through the premises, is too general.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Union County; Buchanan, Judge.

Action by Ann E. Hill against the Southern Railway. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. Clough Wallace, for appellant. O. P. Sanders, for respondent.

GARY, A. J. This is an appeal from an order of nonsuit. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff is the owner and in the exclusive and peaceable possession of a certain lot of land in the town of Union, containing 1½ acres, situate within a quarter of a mile of the courthouse and within the original limits of said town, as shown by the charter of 1837; that the defendant, on the 15th day of November, 1898, and on divers other days, wrongfully, unlawfully, willfully, and maliciously, and against the consent and written objection of the plaintiff, entered upon said lot, dug up her soil, trampled her grass, etc., to her damage $2,000. The defendant, by its answer, denied the material allegations of the complaint and set up certain defenses, which are not material in considering the questions raised by the exceptions.

The assignment of error in the exceptions numbered 1, 2, and 3 will be considered together, and are as follows: "(1) Because his honor erred in holding that the presumption of right and title to the Spartanburg & Union Railroad Company, under section 11 of its charter, by grant from the owner of the land upon which the said railroad may be constructed, together with 100 feet from the center of the track on each side of the same for railroad purposes, where there was no written agreement or contract between the owner and the company, unless suit was brought within the period limited, applied to lots and lands within the corporate limits of the town of Union at the date of said charter; and in granting the nonsuit on this ground, and in holding that the presumption of the statute did not so apply, and in not refusing on that ground the motion for nonsuit. (2) Because his honor erred in holding that under the act of 1855, renewing and amending the charter of the town of Union (12 Stat. at Large, p. 371), the stating (in section 2 thereof) 'the Spartanburg and Union Railroad depot now in course of erection in said town' 'as a center' from which the corporate limits of said town should be measured one-half mile, instead of from the courthouse, gave the railroad company the right to go through and exercise the right of eminent domain, and have all the benefits of the presumptions under section 11 of its charter in the town of Union, as incorporated at the date of the charter of the railroad company, as fully as if the said company had specifically provided that the said company should have the right to build and construct its road through the village of Union; and in granting the nonsuit on this ground. And he further erred in not holding that the act in no way affected the rights and liabilities of the said railroad company under its charter, and in not refusing the nonsuit for that reason. (3) Because his honor erred in holding that the making (in the amended town charter, 12 Stat. at Large) the railroad depot the point from which to measure the corporate limits of the town showed the intention of the Legislature in the charter of the railroad company (1845) to give the railroad company the right of eminent domain in, and the right to construct its road through, the town of Union as then incorporated, and to give the railroad company everything it should need or want anywhere."

The act chartering the Spartanburg & Union Railroad Company authorized it to construct a railroad "on the most practical route from the town of Spartanburg passing near the village of Union to connect with the Greenville & Columbia Railroad or the Charlotte & South Carolina Railroad," etc. It was not the intention of the Legislature to prevent the railroad from passing through the village of Union, but to require that it should be built at such distance as to be convenient and useful to the inhabitants of the village. This purpose was subserved by building the railroad through the village. The railroad company, under its charter, had the same right to acquire a right of way through lots in the village as in other lands. These exceptions are therefore overruled.

The fourth exception is as follows: "(4) Because so much of section 11 of the said railroad company charter as gives a grant from the owner by statutory presumption to the said railroad company to the land on which its road should be constructed, together with 100 feet from the center of the track on either side thereof, for railroad purposes, where there was no written contract, if suit not brought within the period limited, was and is unconstitutional and void, under the Constitution of this state and of the United States, in that it in effect took and takes private property without compensation; and the nonsuit should have been refused on this ground."

This exception cannot be sustained for the reason that the question presented by it was not raised on circuit, and his honor the presiding judge did not rule upon it.

The fifth exception is as follows: "(5) Because, even if the presumption of the statute did apply to lots and land in the town of Union, there was evidence to show continuous adverse obstruction of the right for more than twenty years by plaintiff and those through whom she claimed, and the judge should have sent the issue to the jury, and his not doing so and granting the nonsuit was error."

The record contains the following statement: "J. Clough Wallace, Esq., being duly sworn, testifies as follows: 'Did you ever hear a conversation between your grandfather and Mr. Meng and Mr. Jeator, who was president of the Southern Road at that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. State what that conversation was? Mr. Sanders: We object. I don't think any conversation between these parties can affect this case at all. If we have got a right of way there, we had it under the charter, which says what our limit is. The Court: Suppose the charter does not give you that right? When did this conversation occur? A. In 1866 or '67, after the road was built. Mr. Sanders: We submit that is incompetent. Court: I think that is incompetent.

Mr. Wallace: We claim, if the state gave them a presumptive right of way, we propose to show that the right of way has been obstructed for forty years. Court: In that view, I think it is admissible. A. In 1866, I was sitting on the western porch of the residence with my grandfather, and Mr. Jeator, who was then the president of the railroad, came down the railroad. It was in the morning, just after breakfast time. Mr. Jeator came down from his residence. On the triangle lot through which this side track is now put there was a big red oak tree right edge of the cut. In years the weather had washed the dirt from under the root of this tree, and the top, which I suppose was 50 feet, died, and Mr. Jeator came along and called grandfather to that tree and said, "Mr. Meng, that tree is dangerous, and I would like to have it cut down." My grandfather said, "No, sir; you have got no right to touch that tree." Mr. Jeator said, "Well, I know I didn't have a right to do it, but it is somewhat dangerous, and I thought you would be willing." My grandfather said, "No, let it stand like it is." There was also testimony to show that in the lifetime of plaintiff's father, who died in 1869, the lots in question were fenced up to the edge of the railroad, and that he claimed the land exclusively as his own. In Railway Co. v. Beaudrot, 63 S. C. 266, 41 S. E. 299, Mr. Justice Jones thus states the doctrine in such cases: "It appears in the 'case' that the defendant had erected within the alleged right of way a substantial fence inclosing what defendant claimed exclusive of any right therein by plaintiff. Such an assertion of right to exclusive occupancy of the land is not compatible with the right of easement belonging to the plaintiff. If such adverse holding should run for the statutory period, the easement would be defeated. We do not say that the mere use or occupation of land within the right of way acquired by a railroad company is such adverse use as would give currency to the statute of limitations, unless the use is inconsistent with the easement; but we do say that the inclosing of land within the right of way under a claim of exclusive right to use and occupation, and a refusal to remove the inclosure after demand therefor, is some evidence of the assertion of a claim, incompatible with plaintiff's alleged easement, which, under the issues raised, ought to have been submitted to the jury." This principle is affirmed in the case of Matthews v. Seaboard Air Line Ry. Co., 46 S. E. 335, which has just been filed. This exception is sustained.

The sixth exception is as follows: "(6) Because his honor erred in not allowing plaintiff to prove by her own testimony and other evidence to have followed to rebut the presumption of the statute, what her father said about the right of the railroad company to go through the premises, and that there was never any deed or grant to the land or right of way through the premises in question."

This exception is too general for consideration.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

JOHNSTON v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March Term, 1903.)

For majority opinion, see 45 S. E. 381.

CANDLER, J. (dissenting). "In a criminal proceeding the pendency of a former indictment for the same offense is no ground for a plea in abatement or in bar, although the accused may have been arraigned thereon and have filed a plea." Irwin v. State, 117 Ga. 706, 45 S. E. 48. In my opinion, it can make no difference that the venue of the former indictment may have been changed, and the accused tried thereon, but neither acquitted nor convicted. The second indictment in the county of the original indictment is an entirely different proceeding, and is not affected by the ineffectual attempts to dispose of the case in the county to which the venue of the original indictment was changed.

CHEEK v. OAK GROVE LUMBER CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 16, 1904.)

EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—WAIVER OF EXCEPTION—LOCOMOTIVES—SETTING FIRE—EVIDENCE—ABSENCE OF SPARK ARRESTERS—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Plaintiff, by introducing in evidence the whole of a paragraph of the answer, waives his exception to the refusal to allow him to introduce part only of it.

2. In an action for the burning of plaintiff's timber by sparks from defendant's engine, evidence that a year later, at another place, it set fire to timber, is properly excluded.

3. Any error in allowing defendant in an action for the burning of timber by sparks from its engine to introduce testimony describing the engine, and stating that when equipped with a spark arrester it did not steam well, but that this was taken off, and it then steamed all right, is harmless, the court having instructed that defendant was liable if the engine set the fire.

4. Though prior to the action for the burning of timber by sparks from an engine defendant's president and general manager, who did not see the fire set, stated that the engine set it, defendant is not estopped to show he was mistaken.

5. The fact that defendant's engine was not equipped with a spark arrester, though negligence, does not make it liable for a fire without proof that it set it.

Day & Bell and T. C. Harrison, for appellant. W. E. Daniel, E. L. Travis, and Claude Kitchin, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. This action is prosecuted by the plaintiff to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the negligence of the defendant, in that it negligently and carelessly failed and neglected to equip its engine with spark arresters and other appliances to prevent the escape of fire and sparks when passing over the lands of the plaintiff, whereby much valuable timber standing on her land was destroyed, etc. The defendant denied the material allegations in the complaint, and thereupon the following issue was submitted to the jury: "Did the defendant negligently and wrongfully burn the plaintiff's timber, as alleged in the complaint?" After the introduction of other testimony the plaintiff offered to read in evidence a portion of the fourth paragraph of defendant's answer, to wit, "That it admits the engine used by it for hauling logs was not equipped with a spark arrester." The defendant objected, and to the court's ruling sustaining the objection the plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff thereupon introduced the whole of said paragraph, to wit: "That the fourth section thereof is untrue, save and except that it admits that the engine used by it in hauling logs was not equipped with a spark arrester; but it avers there was no necessity therefor, and the failure to so equip it was not negligence." Without passing upon his honor's ruling, we have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the exception was waived by the action of the plaintiff in reading to the jury the entire paragraph of the answer. If the plaintiff had relied upon the exception and thereby lost the benefit of the admission in the answer, she would be in a position to have this court decide whether there was reversible error in the ruling of his honor. She abandoned the exception, and by reading the entire paragraph got the benefit of the admission. The learned counsel in their brief complain that the portion of the paragraph which they desired to exclude "was a statement of bad law, which could not explain or modify the admission." His honor so instructed the jury. We cannot perceive how the plaintiff has any cause to complain in this respect.

The plaintiff proposed to show by the president and general manager of the defendant corporation that the same engine, one year after the fire in question, at another place some miles from the defendant's farm, set fire to timber. The exclusion of this evidence forms the basis of the plaintiff's second exception. We concur in his honor's ruling. The proposed evidence involved too many collateral inquiries, and was calculated to mislead and confuse the jury in respect to the fact in issue. It is often difficult to accurately trace the line which separates evidence which is relevant—that is, has a visible, reasonable connection with the fact in issue—from that which is too remote and constitutes no evidence. The fact that the engine which was charged with the injury to the plaintiff's timber, 12 months after and at another place, fired timber, gave no aid to the jury in answering the issue, unless it was followed by a mass of other testimony showing similarity of conditions, etc. Pearson, O. J., in Bottoms v. Kent, 48 N. C. 154, thus states the rule: "As a condition precedent to the admissibility of evidence, the law requires an open and visible connection between the principal and the evidentiary facts. This does not mean a necessary connection which would exclude all presumptive evidence, but such as is reasonable and not latent or conjectural." In State v. Vinson, 63 N. C. 335, Rodman, J., says: "If the fact offered to be proved be equally consistent with the existence or nonexistence of the fact sought to be inferred from it, the evidence can furnish no presumption either way, and should not be admitted." State v. Brantley, 84 N. C. 766; Grant v. Railroad, 108 N. C. 462, 18 S. E. 209; Ice Co. v. Railroad, 126 N. C. 797, 36 S. E. 279.

The president and general manager of the defendant was permitted to testify, after objection, that his engine had no spark arrester. "It was a cog-gear locomotive engine—kind usually used on such roads. That it at one time had a spark arrester. Did not steam well, and was taken off. The results were poor. Could not get any steam. Took it off. Got good results, steamed all right." Plaintiff's counsel insist that this testimony was incompetent, and excepted to its admission. We can perceive no valid objection to it, and in the light of his honor's charge it was entirely harmless. The defendant was certainly entitled to describe to the jury the construction, equipment, and operation of its engine. The value of the testimony, as relieving the defendant of liability, was for the jury under proper instructions from the court. The exception cannot be sustained.

Plaintiff introduced a witness who testified that the president and general manager of defendant said to him in response to the question, "Did your engine set it afire?" "Yes, my engine set it afire, but fire had been there before." There was other testimony tending to show that defendant's engine set fire to the timber. No eyewitness testified to the fact. The defendant introduced testimony tending to show that the timber was set on fire from other causes. His honor instructed the jury that, although they should find that the engineer of the defendant told the plaintiff's witnesses that the defendant's engine set fire to the plaintiff's timber, that did not necessarily render the defendant liable, unless the jury find that the defendant's engine did actually set fire to the timber, but that the jury were at liberty to consider all the evidence, the facts and circumstances testified to by the witnesses, and find whether defendant's engine did actually set fire to plaintiff's land or woods or not. Plaintiff excepted. It was not claimed that the defendant's general manager saw the engine set fire to the timber. The plaintiff insists that, if the jury believe that the president made the admission, the burden was shifted, and put upon the defendant the labor of showing that the fire was not the result of negligence. We cannot concur in this view. The testimony, if believed, did not estop the defendant from showing that its general manager was mistaken in saying that the engine set fire to the timber. The admission does not come within the rule which binds a party to a "solemn admission" made in the pleading. It may well be that the general manager, from the facts and circumstances known to him, honestly believed that the engine set fire to the timber. This was competent testimony, but did not work an estoppel upon the defendant to show the fact to be otherwise. In the light of his honor's charge it is evident that the jury found that the defendant's engine did not set fire to the timber. His honor told the jury that if they found the defendant's engine was not equipped with a spark arrester, and that the fire was caused by the failure of the defendant to equip its engine with a spark arrester, that they should answer the first issue "Yes." This was equivalent to telling the jury that the failure to have a spark arrester was negligence, and that if, by reason thereof, the plaintiff sustained the injury complained of, the defendant was liable. This instruction was strictly in accordance with the rulings of this court. It being conceded that the engine had no spark arrester, the only question under his honor's instructions for the jury to answer was whether the engine set fire to the timber and the failure to have the spark arrester was the proximate cause thereof. These matters were peculiarly within the province of the jury. We concur in the plaintiff's contention that the failure to furnish the engine with a spark arrester was negligence, and his honor so instructed the jury, leaving to them the question whether the engine set fire to the timber, and whether the failure to have a spark arrester was the cause thereof. The proposition maintained by the plaintiff is that the defendant's engine set fire to her timber; that it had no spark arrester; that the failure to have a spark arrester was negligence per se. If we concede this proposition, the plaintiff must, before she can maintain her action, show that the failure to have a spark arrester was the proximate cause of the fire. "Negligence, no matter in what it may consist, cannot result in a right of action, unless it is the proximate cause of the injury complained of by the plaintiff."

Elliott on Railroads, § 711; Henderson v. Traction Co., 132 N. C. 779, 44 S. E. 598; Butts v. Railroad, 133 N. C. 82, 45 S. E. 472; Edwards v. Railroad, 129 N. C. 79, 39 S. E. 730.

We think that his honor's instructions fully cover every phase of the controversy, and that plaintiff's exceptions cannot be sustained. Upon a careful examination of the entire record, we find no reversible error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

MONTGOMERY, J., did not sit on the hearing of this case.

STATE et al. v. BUTT et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 16, 1904.)

PREMATURE APPEAL—JUDGMENT AFFECTING SUBSTANTIAL RIGHT—TAXATION OF COSTS OF FRIVOLOUS PROSECUTION.

1. A judgment of a justice adjudged the prosecution frivolous and malicious (in which case Code, § 3756, requires the costs to be taxed against the complainant or prosecutor), and that O. pay the costs. O. was a witness for the prosecution, but the warrant had been issued on the affidavit of W., another witness. On appeal the superior court remanded the case to the justice to serve notice on W. and O. to show cause why one or the other should not be marked "Prosecutor," and taxed with the costs; the justice to find the facts, reform his judgment accordingly, and make return to the court. Held, that appeal of O. from the order of the court was premature, as the justice may find in his favor, and Code, § 548, requires for an appeal a judgment affecting a substantial right.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Moore, Judge.

On a prosecution of W. H. Butt and another, the justice taxed J. O. Heptinstall with the costs, and he appealed to the superior court, and from its order he again appeals. Dismissed.

Day & Bell, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, C. J. The defendants were tried before a justice of the peace for an offense within his jurisdiction. He adjudged the defendants not guilty, and that the prosecution was frivolous and malicious, and that "J. O. Heptinstall pay the costs of the action." In such cases, Code, § 3756, requires that the costs be taxed "against the complainant or prosecutor." J. O. Heptinstall was one of the witnesses for the prosecution, but the warrant had been issued upon the affidavit of J. W. Heptinstall, another witness. From such order taxing him with the costs, J. O. Heptinstall appealed to the superior court. The judge remanded the case to the justice of the peace, with directions to serve notice upon J. W. and J. O. Heptinstall "to show cause why one or the other should not be marked 'Prosecutor,'" and taxed with the costs, and further ordered that "said justice of the peace shall find the facts, and reform his judgment in accordance therewith," and make return to the court. From this order, and also from the refusal to set aside the order of the justice taxing him with the costs, before such finding returned by the justice, J. O. Heptinstall appealed to this court.

The appeal is premature. In execution of said order, the justice may find the facts in favor of said J. O. Heptinstall, and reform the judgment accordingly, which would render this appeal useless. The appellant should have noted his exception, and, if the justice should find the facts against him, they would be reviewable by the judge. State v. Murdock, 85 N. C. 598; State v. Powell, 86 N. C. 640. The judge's findings of fact would be binding upon us, and no appeal would lie, except upon the ruling of law upon such finding. State v. Hamilton, 106 N. C. 660, 10 S. E. 854; State v. Morgan, 120 N. C. 563, 28 S. E. 634. Here the judge has made no ruling, except the very proper one that the justice must find the fact whether J. O. Heptinstall was the real prosecutor. In State v. Roberts, 106 N. C. 662, 10 S. E. 900, where the appellant was taxed in the superior court with costs without a sufficient finding of facts, this court held that this was error, but that the superior court at a subsequent term could still investigate the matter, either on motion of the solicitor, or ex mero motu even, and find the facts, and tax the prosecutor with the costs if justified by such finding of facts. This was cited and approved in State v. Sanders, 111 N. C., at page 702, 16 S. E. 320. As, under Code, § 895, the costs in such cases can in no event be taxed against the county (Merrimon v. Commissioners, 106 N. C. 369, 11 S. E. 267), and, if the prosecution is frivolous and malicious, as here adjudged, the costs are taxable against the "prosecutor or complainant" (Code, § 3756), it is but just that the matter should be re-referred to the justice, to ascertain who was the prosecutor, unless the judge had chosen to find that fact himself, as he might have done. The absence of J. W. Heptinstall doubtless caused him to remand to the justice to find the facts upon notice to both J. O. and J. W. Heptinstall. Though the affidavit was made by J. W. Heptinstall, it may be that J. O. Heptinstall was the real prosecutor, and the facts should be found. The appeal is premature, for there has been no judgment of the superior court affecting a substantial right, and authorizing an appeal. Code, § 548.

Appeal dismissed.

DICKENS et al. v. PERKINS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 16, 1904.)

PLEADING—VARIANCE—SUBMISSION OF ISSUE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where the complaint alleged that one agreed to pay $200 to another, who thereupon agreed to purchase land at a judicial sale and convey it to persons named, so far as the proof tended to show that the person who received the $200 was to advance any additional sum necessary to purchase the land, and to reconvey the land when he was repaid such advance, there was a substantial variance.

2. Under Code, § 391, providing that an issue of fact arises on the pleadings when a material fact is alleged by one party and controverted by the other, a complaint simply alleging that one agreed to purchase land at a judicial sale and convey it to third persons does not justify the submission to the jury of the issue whether the purchaser bought the land under the parol agreement and with the understanding that when he was repaid the money he advanced to buy the land he should convey it to others, the plaintiffs not being entitled to avail themselves of a different contract than they pleaded, except by amendment, as authorized in Code, § 273.

3. Where a complaint alleged that one agreed, on payment to him of $200, to purchase land at a judicial sale and convey it to third persons, and the issue was submitted whether he bought under the parol agreement and with the understanding that when he was repaid what he advanced to buy the land he should convey it to the third persons, an instruction that if the jury found the contract was made as alleged in the complaint they should answer the issue "Yes" was error, different contracts being stated in the complaint and the issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Halifax County; Geo. A. Jones, Judge.

Action by Mary G. Dickens and others against Helen Perkins and others. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Thos. N. Hill and E. L. Travis, for appellants. Day & Bell, W. E. Daniel, and Battle & Mordecai, for appellees.

WALKER, J. This action was brought to enforce a parol trust. The plaintiffs allege in their complaint that, in 1871, W. M. Perkins entered into a parol contract with Melissa J. Dickens whereby he promised and agreed that if she would pay him the sum of $200 he would buy a tract of land, which is known as the "Emsley Dickens Home Tract," at the judicial sale then about to be made by the administrator of Emsley Dickens, for the use and benefit of Mary Jane Dickens during her life, and at her death the remainder in fee for the use and benefit of the children of said Melissa J. Dickens, and that he would have a deed for the land made to himself, and would then convey the land as above indicated. That the money was paid to him, and at the sale made by the administrator he bought the land and took a deed therefor in his own name, and that instead of complying with his agreement to execute the deed to Mary Jane Dickens for life, with remainder to the children of Melissa J. Dickens, he, by his will, devised the land to the said Mary J. Dickens for life and remainder in fee to the defendants Helen, Bettie, and Nellie Perkins, in utter disregard of the rights and equities therein of the plaintiffs, who are the children of Melissa J. Dickens. It is further alleged that W. M. Perkins has died, having left a will which has been duly admitted to probate. There are other allegations in the complaint which it is unnecessary to set out, for it is not material that they should be considered in the view we take of the case as it is now presented.

The defendants, who are the heirs, devisees, and executor of W. M. Perkins, in their answer deny that he entered into the agreement with Melissa J. Dickens which is described in the complaint, and, while they admit that he bought the land and took the deed for the same in his own name, they deny that it was done under any parol agreement that he would hold it in trust as alleged by the plaintiffs, but, on the contrary, they aver that he bought the land for himself, and took the deed in his own name without any trust attached thereto in favor of any of the plaintiffs, and that he thereby became the owner of the land in fee and in his own right. It is admitted that the land was devised by him in his will in the manner alleged in the complaint. They further aver that at the administrator's sale the said W. M. Perkins purchased the land at the price of $468, which amount he paid to the administrator, and they insist that, if the plaintiffs are entitled to a conveyance of the land and the $200 was paid by Melissa J. Dickens to W. M. Perkins, then and in that case the plaintiffs should be required to pay to the executor of W. M. Perkins the sum of $268, it being the difference between the $200 alleged to have been paid by Melissa J. Dickens and the amount paid by W. M. Perkins to the administrator of Emsley Dickens for the land; and they further insist that the said sum of $268 should be declared by the court to be a charge upon the land. At the trial the court submitted to the jury the following issue: "Did W. M. Perkins buy the land described in the complaint under the parol agreement and with the understanding that he would take a deed for the same, and, when he was paid the money advanced for said purpose, would convey a life estate in the same to Mary J. Dickens, with the remainder in fee to the children of Melissa J. Dickens?" The defendants duly excepted to the submission of the issue. An issue of fact, as defined by the Code, arises upon the pleadings when a material fact is alleged or maintained by the one party and controverted by the other. Code, § 391. Issues do not arise upon the evidence, nor should they be so framed as to require the jury to find facts which are merely evidential. There is no allegation in the complaint that the parties entered into any such contract as the one set out in the issue. The contract alleged by the plaintiffs to have been made, and denied by the defendants in their answer, instead of being the one described in the issue, is quite different in its essential features, and involves different rights and liabilities. If the plaintiffs were unable to show by their proof that the contract was made as alleged, and by the evidence established a different agreement, they could have availed themselves of the latter, and have enforced the same only by an amendment, provided the cause of action was not thereby substantially changed. Code, § 273. The plaintiffs alleged that W. M. Perkins had agreed that, upon the payment to him of $200, he would buy the land at the sale, and hold the same for the uses already mentioned, and convey it afterwards to the same uses, and that the $200 had been paid, which entitled the plaintiff to a conveyance when W. M. Perkins bought the land; while there was proof tending to show that it was agreed between the parties that Melissa J. Dickens should pay to W. M. Perkins $200, which she did, and that he should advance whatever additional amount might be necessary to pay for the land, and that, with this understanding, he would purchase the land at the sale, and, upon being repaid the amount advanced by him, he would convey the same to Mary J. Dickens for life, with the remainder to the children of Melissa J. Dickens. This must, at least, be taken as the plaintiffs' understanding of the testimony, because they did not except to the issue, and must therefore have thought that there was evidence to warrant an affirmative answer to it by the jury. But the proof, in this view of it, did not sustain the allegation, and there was therefore a substantial variance, if not a failure of proof. Clark's Code, § 271, and notes; Faulk v. Thornton, 108 N. C. 314, 12 S. E. 998, and cases cited. As there was no other allegation in the pleadings, either in the complaint or the answer, which could raise the issue framed by the court and duly excepted to by the defendants, it was error to submit it to the jury. Fortesque v. Crawford, 105 N. C. 29, 10 S. E. 910; Sprague v. Bond, 113 N. C. 551, 18 S. E. 701; Wright v. Cain, 93 N. C. 296; Miller v. Miller, 89 N. C. 209. As we have already stated, this defect may be cured by proper amendment, if the plaintiffs intend to rely upon the contract as set out in the issue.

If the proof should be construed as tending to show only that Melissa J. Dickens paid the $200 upon the agreement that W. M. Perkins should buy the land and take a deed therefor to himself, and then convey it to the parties above named according to the uses declared in the contract, and that any additional amount advanced by him should be paid by Mary J. Dickens, the payment of the same not to be a condition precedent to the conveyance, but he to rely for reimbursement solely upon the personal promise or obligation of Mary J. Dickens, it would not warrant an affirmative finding upon the issue submitted, and this brings us to the only remaining exception of the defendant which we deem it necessary to consider.

However the case may stand upon the pleadings and proof, or upon the issue submitted and any reasonable interpretation of the testimony, we find that his honor's charge in one respect cannot be sustained. The court charged the jury substantially that, if they found the contract was made as alleged in the complaint, that is, that W. M. Perkins was paid the $200 upon his promise to buy the land and hold it in trust and to convey it to Mary J. Dickens for life, with remainder to the children of Melissa J. Dickens, they should answer the issue "Yes." The issue did not embrace only the facts recited in the charge, and the jury were therefore, in effect, instructed that, if they were satisfied that W. M. Perkins made the contract as stated in the charge, they should answer the issue "Yes," which of course required them to find that he made another and different contract. This was error. There was no correspondence between the allegation of the complaint and the issue, in respect to the terms of the contract, and none between the issue and the charge of the court.

At the next trial, the defendants may, by tendering proper issues and by prayers for instructions, present the other questions argued in this court as to the illegality of the consideration of the contract and the statute of limitations, if it becomes material that they should be passed upon. The question relating to the validity of the parol trust can better be considered when the terms of the contract are ascertained.

For the reasons already given, we do not think the case was correctly tried in the court below, and a new trial must therefore be awarded. New trial.

SUMNER et al. v. EARLY et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 16, 1904.)

AGREEMENT FOR PARTITION OF LANDS—REFUSAL TO PERFORM—REMEDY—SUIT FOR SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE.

1. Where tenants in common of one tract of land and tenants in common of another mutually agreed that all the lands should be partitioned "as if they held the said lands as tenants in common," the remedy on the refusal of the tenants in common of one of the tracts to carry out the agreement is by suit for specific performance, and not by a special proceeding for partition, the agreement being executory only.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; M. H. Justice, Judge.

Action by J. B. Sumner and others against B. F. Early and others. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

This is a civil action, in which the plaintiffs aver that on the 4th day of March, 1890, the plaintiffs and defendants entered into a written contract, set out in the complaint, whereby the plaintiffs, being the owners, as tenants in common, of certain lands described therein, and the defendants, being the owners of other lands, mutually agreed that all of said lands should be partitioned, and that they would select three disinterested men to make the partition "as if they held said lands as tenants in common." The terms and provisions of said contract are set forth in detail in the paper writing which is made a part of the complaint. The plaintiffs allege that the defendants refused to carry out and perform their part of the contract, whereas the plaintiffs have always been ready and willing to perform the contract on their part. They demand judgment that the contract be specifically performed, and that partition be made in accordance with the terms thereof. The defendants, in their answer, admit the execution of the contract, and aver matters in avoidance of the plaintiffs' right to have specific performance and partition. At October term, 1903, of the superior court of Hertford, a jury was duly impaneled to try the issues raised by the pleadings, whereupon the defendants moved to dismiss the action for that the court had no jurisdiction. The motion was allowed, and the plaintiffs appealed.

Winborne & Lawrence, for appellants.
Francis D. Winston, for appellees.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the case). The motion of the defendants is based upon the position that the plaintiffs' remedy for the refusal of the defendants to perform their contract was a special proceeding, of which the clerk had original jurisdiction. If the contract had contained appropriate words of conveyance whereby the parties conveyed to each other the title to the lands described therein as tenants in common—that is, if it were an executed contract—the position of the defendants would have been correct. The contract is, however, executory, and the remedy upon it is for specific performance. If the court shall, upon a trial of the issues raised by the pleadings, adjudge that the plaintiffs are entitled to a decree, it will, in furtherance of the remedy, appoint commissioners to make partition, and thus give complete relief. "When the title of a co-tenant is equitable merely, and he is entitled to a conveyance of the legal title, he may, by proper pleadings, assert his rights, and obtain a decree of the court compelling those in whom the legal title rests to convey according to the partition awarded. But when the sole purpose of the bill is to procure a partition, it will not be granted on the ground that the plaintiff is entitled to a conveyance. He must first, in the same or an independent suit, obtain a decree declaring the right to a conveyance. Freeman on Cotenants and Partition, § 518. "A partition of lands among several joint owners will not be made unless those by whom the partition is sought have a legal title to the portions claimed by them. A party who has a mere equitable right to a conveyance of an undivided interest is not in a position to ask for a partition." Williams v. Wiggand, 53 Ill. 238. In that case it is said that in a bill for specific performance a prayer may be joined for partition, but, when the sole purpose of the bill is for partition, it will not be allowed merely on proof that the complainant is entitled to a conveyance. No partition can be ordered until the equitable rights are determined and adjudged. It is well settled that the clerk in the exercise of his statutory jurisdiction in special proceedings, may not administer equities or equitable relief. This jurisdiction is vested solely in the superior court in term. The language of Mr. Justice Davis in Edland v. Edland, 96 N. C. 488, 1 S. E. 858, is appropriate to and decisive of this appeal: "Equitable elements exist in this case and involve questions of law and fact which could not be adjudicated before the clerk, and which, under the old practice, would have been cognizable in a court of equity, and it is properly a 'civil action' within the definition of Pearson, C. J., in Tate v. Powe, 64 N. C. 644." Pollard v. Slaughter, 92 N. C. 72, 58 Am. Rep. 402; Parton v. Allison, 109 N. C. 674, 14 S. E. 107. We therefore conclude that the action is properly brought. The defendants' motion to dismiss should have been denied. Judgment dismissing the action will be reversed, and the court will proceed to hear and determine the cause upon the pleadings.

Reversed.

MEEKINS v. NORFOLK & S. R. CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 16, 1904.)

DEATH—PROXIMATE CAUSE—NEGLIGENCE—NATURAL CAUSES—EVIDENCE—DAMAGES.

1. Plaintiff might recover for the death of his decedent if a cause of the death was a disease but the disease was accelerated and death hastened by the negligent act of the defendant.

2. In an action for death, evidence that the decedent would have died in a short time from natural causes was competent on the question of damages, but incompetent on the issue of defendant's negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tyrrell County; Council, Judge.

Action by J. C. Meekins, administrator, against the Norfolk & Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. F. Aydlett and I. M. Meekins, for appellant. Pruden & Pruden and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. This is an action to recover damages for the death of the intestate from injuries alleged to have been received through the negligence of the defendant. The first issue was as follows: "Was the death of the intestate, John Jones, caused by the negligence of the defendant as alleged in the complaint?" This issue was answered "No," which rendered the remaining issues immaterial.

There are several exceptions, nearly all to the charge or failure to charge; but as they are so connected with the evidence that they may not arise upon a new trial, we will confine ourselves to the exception which alone seems necessary for the determination of this appeal. The court charged as follows: "If the jury shall find that intestate's death was caused by disease, and would have occurred from disease which he had at the time of the accident to him, even if the accident had not befallen him, then they shall answer the first issue 'No,' even if they shall further find that the fall aggravated his disease and hastened his death." In this instruction there was substantial error for which a new trial must be granted. The first part of the instruction would of course be correct if taken by itself, as the defendant would not be liable for the death of the intestate if a pre-existing disease were its proximate cause; but in contemplation of law the cause of death is that which produces death at the time it happens. The unlawful killing of a human being would be none the less murder or manslaughter, as the case might be, even if the innocent victim were in the last stages of a fatal disease. We see no reason why the defendant should not be held civilly liable for negligently doing an act, the intentional commission of which might subject an individual to the punishment of death. Any other construction of law would be liable to the gravest consequences.

It has been repeatedly held by this court that substantial damages are recoverable where the death of the intestate was hastened or accelerated by injuries resulting from the negligence of the defendant. In Lewis v. Raleigh, 77 N. C. 229, where the jury found that "the death of John Godwin was accelerated by the noxious atmosphere of said guardhouse," it was held, in a well-considered opinion, that his administrator could recover. In Gray v. Little, 126 N. C. 385, 85 S. E. 611, this court says on page 387, 126 N. C., page 611, 35 S. E.: "His honor, in charging the jury, substantially followed the charge approved in Benton v. Railroad, 122 N. C. 1007 [30 S. E. 333], and in addition thereto instructed the jury in these words: 'But in considering the second issue as to the cause of the death of the plaintiff's intestate, if you find that the death of the intestate was only hastened or accelerated by the acts or omissions of the defendant as alleged, then you are instructed that, in answering the third issue as to damages, you cannot award the plaintiff any more than nominal damages; that is, such small sum, as, for instance, five cents, or other small sum, because in such state of the case, if the death of the intestate was only hastened or accelerated by the defendant, you could only respond to this issue in nominal damages.' [Exception.] The error in that part of the charge lies in considering the act expediting death as a mere technical injury. This is not the language of the law nor of the textbooks on criminal matters. There are instances in the common-law reports where the accelerator paid the severest penalty known to the law. We know of no decision of a final appellate court in this country declaring otherwise." In view of the uniform decisions of our own state, it is needless to cite outside authorities; but a further discussion of the question may be found in Railroad v. Northington (Tenn.) 17 S. W. 880, 16 L. R. A. 268, and in 1 Thompson, Neg. § 149.

The evidence tending to show that the intestate would in any event have died in a short time from natural causes was competent upon the issue of damages, but was utterly immaterial upon that of negligence. For this erroneous instruction of his honor, a new trial is ordered. New trial.

CHEESBOROUGH et al. v. ASHEVILLE SANATORIUM et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 16, 1904.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—CORPORATION PROPERTY—DEED OF TRUST—PRIORITY—MATERIALS FURNISHED—WORK AND LABOR.

1. Under Code, § 1255, as amended by Laws 1897, p. 511, c. 334, providing that mortgages of incorporated companies shall not exempt the property of such corporations from execution for labor performed, and omitting the words "nor for materials furnished," contained in the section prior to its amendment, claimants, who "performed work" and "furnished materials" for a corporation, and in doing the work used said materials subsequent to the registration of a deed of trust of its property, were not entitled to priority over the deed of trust for the materials furnished.

Appeal from Superior Court, Buncombe County; Hoke, Judge.

Action by Thomas P. Cheesborough and others against the Asheville Sanatorium, in which J. C. McPherson and T. G. Clark were permitted to file a complaint. From a judgment for plaintiff, said McPherson and Clark appeal. Affirmed.

This action was brought by the plaintiffs for the purpose of enforcing the execution of the trusts declared in a certain deed executed by the defendant corporation to J. S. Adams. Charles McNamee was appointed receiver. At August term, 1899, the appellants were allowed to make themselves parties to such action, and filed their complaint therein. The cause was submitted to his honor upon an agreed state of facts. The defendant was, on and before the 30th day of September, 1897, a corporation created and organized under the laws of this state. On said day the said corporation executed to the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church certain bonds aggregating the sum of $30,- 000, and, for the purpose of securing the payment thereof, executed a deed in trust upon its land and buildings in the city of Asheville, which was duly registered in Buncombe county on the 3d of January, 1898. Between the 9th of February, 1898, and the 15th of July, 1899, the plaintiffs McPherson & Clark, pursuant to a contract made with said corporation, "performed labor" and "furnished materials" for it, and in doing said work used said materials, which said materials were furnished and used by them on the buildings situate on the land and premises of the defendant corporation, particularly described in the notice of lien filed by said plaintiffs. Said work and material were reasonably worth the prices set out and charged therefor. By the terms of said contract the said corporation became indebted to the plaintiffs McPherson & Clark in the sum of $646 for said labor and work and materials so furnished. Of said sum $115.60 is for items marked "work" in the bill of particulars filed with the notice of lien, the remainder of said sum being for "materials furnished." The plaintiffs filed their notice of lien in compliance with the provisions of section 1781 of the Code on the 16th day of August, 1899, and on the 19th day of October, 1899, filed their complaint in this action. The Board of Home Missions filed its answer to said complaint, alleging the execution of the said deed in trust; and denying the plaintiffs' right to any lien on said property, or priority in the proceeds of the sale thereof over the payment of the bonds held by said Board of Missions and secured by said deed in trust. His honor adjudged that the defendant corporation was indebted to the plaintiffs McPherson & Clark in the sum of $646.15, with interest, and of this amount the sum of $115.61, being for "work and labor," constituted a lien upon said property, and had priority over all other liens whatsoever, and over all mortgages and deeds in trust thereon, and that said sum be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the property of the defendant corporation in preference to all other claims, etc. The plaintiffs excepted to the refusal of his honor to declare the entire amount of their claim entitled to priority, and appealed.

F. A. Sondley, for appellants. Merrimon & Merrimon and J. D. Murphy, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. (after stating the case). The exception to the judgment of his honor involves the construction of section 1255 of the Code, as amended by chapter 334, p. 511, Pub. Laws 1897. The section of the Code as originally enacted declared that "mortgages of incorporated companies * * * shall not have power to exempt the property of such incorporations from execution for labor performed, nor for material furnished, nor for torts committed." This section was construed by this court in Coal Co. v. Electric Light Co. (1896) 118 N. C. 232, 24 S. E. 22. The General Assembly, at the session of 1897, amended the section by striking therefrom the words "for material furnished such corporation." Chapter 334. The sole question presented by this appeal therefore is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to priority over the deed in trust executed prior to the commencement of the work or the furnishing of the materials. There can be no doubt that, as against the defendant corporation, the plaintiffs have a lien pursuant to the provisions of section 1781 of the Code, providing for liens "for work done * * * or materials furnished." This lien, however, is subordinate to the registered deed in trust, attaching, as it does, at the time of the beginning of the work or furnishing materials. Burr v. Maulsby, 99 N. C. 263, 6 S. E. 108, 6 Am. St. Rep. 517; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. (2d Ed.) 479. While, therefore, as was said by the court in Coal Co. v. Electric Light Co., supra, the right of priority asserted by the plaintiffs is not based upon the idea of a lien, we may resort to the construction put upon statutes providing for mechanics' liens to aid us in ascertaining and giving expression to the legislative intent. It is significant that the amendment of 1897 to section 1255 follows the decision of this court in Coal Co. v. Electric Light Co., supra, being enacted at the next succeeding session of the General Assembly. "Whether mechanics' liens should be construed strictly or liberally is a question upon which there is a hopeless division of opinion." Bolsot on Mechanics' Liens, § 34. The author cites a large number of cases in which various opinions are expressed. Upon this question we prefer to adopt the following principles thus stated by him: "There is a line of decisions that seems to take a middle ground, holding that the statute should be reasonably construed, so as to ascertain the intent of the Legislature, and to require a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute, without extending its provisions beyond the plain language of the act." Id. § 87. This court, in Cumming v. Bloodworth, 87 N. C. 83, drew a clear distinction between a lien for labor performed and one for material furnished, holding that in respect to the former the Legislature had the power, pursuant to article 10, § 4, of the Constitution, to provide for a lien for "work done" having priority over the right to the homestead, but had no such power in respect to "materials furnished." The current of authority tends to sustain the distinction made by this court. Bolsot on Mechanics' Liens, §§ 235, 241. This court, in Broyhill v. Gaither, 119 N. C. 443, 26 S. E. 31, says: "The laborer's lien is solely for 'labor performed.' The mechanic's lien is broader, and includes the 'work done'; i. e., the building built or superstructure on the premises." This language would seem to be decisive of this appeal, as, since the amendment of 1897, the right of priority secured by section 1255 is confined to "labor performed," and the amendment expressly excludes "materials furnished," thus narrowing the class of persons and claims entitled to its protection within a much smaller compass than the language of section 1781.

His honor having separated the items in the bill of particulars for "work done" from those for "materials furnished," we are not called upon to decide the question discussed by counsel as to the rights of the laborers who, in the performance of their contract, and as an essential part of their work, used materials.

It is difficult to reconcile the large number of the decisions found in the Reports of the different states concerning lien laws, and we carefully refrain from announcing any principle of construction further than is necessary to dispose of this appeal. Upon the facts found by his honor, we are of the opinion that he correctly construed the statute as amended.

Affirmed.

FIDELITY & DEPOSIT CO. v. JORDAN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 16, 1904.)

EQUITY — JURISDICTION — JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—APPEAL—SUBROGATION—PLEADING.

1. An objection to the jurisdiction, though waived in the court below, may be raised on appeal.

2. The superior court, and not a justice of the peace, had jurisdiction of an action by a creditor seeking to be subrogated to the rights of other creditors of the same debtor, whose claims he had paid.

3. A complaint alleged that plaintiff was the surety on the official bond of a clerk of court, who received, as clerk, large sums of money, a large part of which he deposited in the bank, and that he misappropriated the trust funds so received by him to the amount of nearly $1,800, which has been paid by the plaintiff, as surety, and that the defendants received a check from the clerk for $197.86 on the bank, and that amount, out of the trust funds in the bank, was paid to him on the check. Held, that as plaintiff alleged that the clerk misapplied the fund so received by him, but did not allege that he misapplied that part deposited in bank, and as every intendment is to be made against the pleader, it did not appear that defendants had received any of the funds misappropriated, and plaintiff showed no right to be subrogated to any rights as against defendants.

4. If the clerk had misapplied that part of the fund deposited in the bank, plaintiff had a right of subrogation, though he had secured no assignment of the claims of creditors.

5. The trial court might, on application, permit the plaintiff to amend his complaint, under Code, § 273, permitting the court, before or after judgment, to allow a pleading to be amended by inserting other allegations material to the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Hertford County; M. H. Justice, Judge.

Suit by the Fidelity & Deposit Company against William Jordan and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Winborne & Lawrence and Geo. Cowper, for appellants. Pruden & Pruden and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff in the court below for the recovery of $197.86, and was tried upon demurrer to the complaint. The plaintiff, a corporation, alleged that, at the request of John F. Newsome, clerk of the superior court of Hertford county, it became surety on his official bond, as it was authorized by law to do, in the sum of $15,000, with the usual conditions; that said Newsome, as clerk and receiver, by virtue of his office, received large sums of money to be held by him for several parties, and a large part thereof he deposited in bank, to his credit as "clerk and receiver"; that he defaulted and misapplied the trust funds so held by him, to the amount of nearly $1,800, and thereafter, he having died, a judgment was recovered against his administratrix and the plaintiff, his surety, for $909.80, which amount, and the further sum of $507.75, which he had also converted or misapplied, the plaintiff was compelled to pay, as surety; that prior to his death the said Newsome, being individually indebted to the defendants, gave them a check drawn by him, as "clerk and receiver," to their order, on the bank in which the trust funds had been deposited, for the sum of $197.86, in payment of said indebtedness, and the check was afterwards paid to them out of the trust funds; that defendants had no claim upon the said funds, and knew at the time they received the check and the money paid thereon that the giving of the check was a misappropriation of the trust funds by Newsome. It is then alleged "that the plaintiff is advised and believes, and so avers, that it is subrogated to the rights of those whose debts against the said clerk and receiver it has paid, and is entitled to recover in this action, of the defendants, the sum received by them as aforesaid of John F. Newsome, deceased." The plaintiff demands judgment for the sum of $197.86 and the costs. The defendants demurred substantially upon the following grounds: (1) That the court has no jurisdiction of the action. (2) It appears from the complaint that the plaintiff paid the alleged fiduciary claims for money wrongfully converted by his principal without having the same assigned to it, and thereby discharged the same, and for this reason it has no legal or equitable demand against the defendants, by subrogation or otherwise. (3) That the plaintiff, in its complaint, does not state a cause of action because, first, it does not appear that plaintiff is subrogated to the rights of any person or persons having any cause of action against the defendants; second, it is not stated to whom the plaintiff paid the said money, nor how much it paid to any one person, nor does it appear by proper averment to whose right the plaintiff seeks to be subrogated. The demurrer was overruled, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff, to which the defendants excepted and appealed.

The objection to the jurisdiction was waived in the court below, but the defendants' counsel insisted upon it in this court, as he had the right to do. We think, however, that it is without any merit. The cause of action attempted to be set up by the plaintiff is equitable in its nature, and can be enforced only in the superior court. The court of a justice of the peace has no jurisdiction by which it can affirmatively administer an equity. This has been repeatedly decided. Barry v. Henderson, 102 N. C. 525, 9 S. E. 455, and cases cited. While it is a court for the enforcement of remedies merely legal, it may so far recognize an equity involved in any action pending before it as to permit it to be pleaded as a defense. Bell v. Howerton, 111 N. C. 69, 15 S. E. 891; McAdoo v. Callum, 86 N. C. 419.

The defendants next contend that the plaintiff, having paid the judgment recovered against it, and the other part of the debt due by its principal, without having taken an assignment to itself for the same from the creditors, has thereby discharged the indebtedness, and deprived itself not only of the right to enforce payment of the particular judgment and claim thus discharged by it, but has also lost all right to be substituted in the creditors' place to all collateral rights and securities to which the creditors were entitled, or which they held at the time of the payment, and that by the payment it became merely a simple-contract creditor of its principal, without any security for its debt, and its only remedy is by personal action against the administrator to recover the amount so paid by it. It is very true that in order to enforce the payment of a judgment obtained upon a debt, or to recover upon the debt in its original form, if it has not been reduced to judgment, it is necessary that the surety, when he pays the debt, however it may be evidenced, should have it assigned to a third person in trust for his benefit; and, if such an assignment is taken, the debt is kept on foot, although the money be paid to the creditor by the surety, and its vitality is preserved, even at law, and much more in equity, and he may enforce payment of it just as the creditor could have done before the payment was made. Hanner v. Douglass, 57 N. C. 262. But it is not required that this should be done in order to preserve the collateral remedies or securities of the creditor. It is only the debt or security upon which the judgment has been taken, or the note or other instrument given to the creditor as evidence of the indebtedness, that is discharged by the payment; and in such a case an equity arises at once in favor of the surety making the payment to have all the securities held by the creditor, and which have not been extinguished by the payment of the debt—such as the bond securing the principal debt—transferred to him; and he is entitled to be subrogated to all the rights and remedies which the creditor has against the debtor, and to avail himself of them as fully in every particular as the creditor could have done. This principle of equity we consider as well settled by the authorities. Liles v. Rogers, 113 N. C. 197, 18 S. E. 104, 37 Am. St. Rep. 627. The distinction we have drawn is clearly and tersely stated by Rodman, J., for the court, in McCoy v. Wood, 70 N. C. 125, as follows: "The law is that if a surety pays the bond of his principal, for which there is no collateral security, the bond is thereby extinguished, unless he takes an assignment to a trustee. But in equity it is held that, if the creditor has taken a collateral security for the debt, the surety, on payment, is subrogated to the rights of the creditor in the security, without an express assignment." While the original debt, whether in the form of a judgment or a bond, is discharged by the payment, the surety becomes a simple-contract creditor of his debtor; and to this new relation equity attaches what is called the "right of subrogation," which is defined to be the substitution of one person in the place of another, whether as a creditor or the possessor of any other rightful claim, and the substitute is put in all respects in the place of the party to whose rights he is subrogated; the principle having been adopted from the civil law by courts of equity. It is treated as a creature of equity, and is so administered as to secure real and essential justice, without regard to form, and independent of any contractual relations between the parties to be affected by it. It is broad enough to include instances in which one party pays the debt for which another is primarily answerable, and which, in equity and good conscience, should have been discharged by the latter. Sheldon on Subrogation, p. 2. By another, the doctrine of subrogation is said to be distinctly a creature of equity, having its basis in natural justice, irrespective and independent of rules and forms of law. But in equity no contract is necessary upon which to base the right. It is a remedy which a court of equity seizes upon in order to accomplish what is just and fair between the parties, where a party who is seeking the aid of the court and the benefit of the rule has been no mere volunteer, and where his action has been based upon general equitable rules, which it is the particular province of a court of equity to enforce. "Subrogation is the substitution of one who, under the compulsion of necessity, or for the protection of his own interest, has discharged a debt for which another is primarily liable, in the place of the creditor, with all the security, benefits, and advantages held by the latter with respect to the debt. One of the prerequisites to the exercise of the right is the complete discharge of the debt." 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. §§ 797, 798. In conformity to this established doctrine, it has been held that the sureties of an insolvent clerk of the court, upon a breach of trust by their principal, will, in equity, be entitled to all the remedies and securities that belong to a cestui que trust, or creditor, against one who co-operated in the breach of trust. Bunting v. Ricks, 22 N. C. 130, 32 Am. Dec. 699, cited and approved in Powell v. Jones, 36 N. C. 337.

The case of Fox v. Alexander, 36 N. C. 340, seems to be directly in point as an authority in support of the doctrine that, when a surety has paid a judgment against his principal (in that case, a guardian), he may by action follow and recover any of the fund which has been wrongfully converted or misapplied by the principal, and which has been received from him by a third person, with notice of its fiduciary character, in payment of a debt due him from the surety's principal, even though the judgment which was obtained against the surety and his principal on account of the breach of trust has been paid and discharged. In that case the guardian transferred to the defendant, in payment of the debt due to him, a note payable to himself as guardian. The ward recovered judgment against his guardian for the amount of his defalcation; the bond transferred to the defendant being a part of the trust property, which was misapplied by the guardian, and for which misapplication the judgment was given. This judgment the sureties paid without having any assignment made to a third person for their benefit. It was held that, as the sureties had thus been compelled to pay the ward the amount due to him, they had the right, in a court of equity, to stand in his place, and follow the trust fund in the hands of the defendant, and to have satisfaction of him to the amount thereof. This case, it would seem, is a full and complete answer to the contention of the defendants' counsel, and sustains the plaintiff's right to a recovery, if it has made the necessary allegations to raise this equity of subrogation in its behalf. While it may be needless for us to cite authorities to show that the defendant is liable to account for the money received by him on the check, upon the ground that he is constructively a trustee of the same, having received it with full notice that it was part of the trust fund, the principle upon which such a liability rests is fully discussed in the following cases: Edwards v. Culberson, 111 N. C. 342, 16 S. E. 233, 18 L. R. A. 204; Powell v. Jones, 36 N. C. 337; Liles v. Rogers, supra; Bunting v. Ricks, supra. Having received the fund with notice of the breach of trust, he is held to have participated therein, and becomes himself, by construction of a court of equity, a trustee of the fund for the benefit of the party entitled to the same, and the latter may pursue and recover it for the purpose of "indemnity and recompense"; and a court of equity will not stop the pursuit until the means of ascertainment and identification of the fund fail, or the rights of bona fide purchasers for value, without notice of the trust, or of some person having a superior equity, have intervened. Edwards v. Culberson, supra.

While this right of subrogation exists, and will always be enforced when a case is presented, to the facts and circumstances of which it is adapted, we do not find in the plaintiff's complaint sufficient allegations to bring its cause of action within the application of the rule; and this requires us now to consider the defendants' last contention—that the plaintiff has not alleged facts sufficient to show that it is entitled to represent and stand in the place of any person entitled to the money which was paid by the bank to the defendants on the check. The plaintiff alleges that Newsome received large sums of money as clerk, a large part of which he deposited in the bank, and that he misappropriated the trust funds so received by him, to the amount of nearly $1,800, which has been paid by the plaintiff, as surety, and that the defendants received a check from Newsome for $197.86 on the bank, and that amount, out of the trust funds in the bank, was paid to him on the check. It does not appear from this allegation with sufficient distinctness, even under the liberal provisions of the Code, that the money which the defendants received was any part of that which was converted or misappropriated by Newsome, and which plaintiff was compelled to pay. It will be observed that the plaintiff does not allege that the trust fund misapplied by Newsome, the amount of which it was required to pay, was the same which had been deposited in the bank. The fund in the bank did not constitute all of the trust funds which had been received by Newsome as clerk. It is alleged that he had received large sums of money, a part of which he placed in the bank. It appears, therefore, that the fund converted by Newsome, and for which plaintiff was held liable, and the amount of which it afterwards paid, may have been that part of the "large sum of money" alleged to have been held by Newsome which was not deposited in the bank by him. Thus the matter is involved in the greatest doubt and uncertainty, and we are left entirely to conjecture as to what are the real facts. If the fund, for the conversion of which by Newsome the plaintiff was made liable, was not deposited in the bank, then it is very clear that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action, as it seeks to recover upon the theory that the defendants have received a part of the trust fund which was deposited in the bank. The defect in the pleadings is to be found in the fifth section of the complaint, where it is alleged that Newsome misapplied the trust fund so received by him, not the fund so received by him and deposited in the bank. Newsome having received other funds than those which he placed in the bank, we must assume, in the absence of more specific allegation, that they were the funds misapplied by him, and for which misapplication or conversion the plaintiff was held liable. If this be true, the defendants cannot be liable to the plaintiff, as they received no part of the fund which was not deposited in the bank. The rule of pleading is that every intentment is to be made against the pleader. In Wright v. McCormick, 67 N. C. 27, Rodman, J., says: "It is a rule of construction, of which no pleader has a right to complain, that all uncertainties and ambiguities in his pleadings shall be taken in the sense most unfavorable to him, for he has at all times the power, and it is his duty, to make them plain." But, however this may be, and while we are sure that the failure to make the necessary allegation was a mere inadvertence, we cannot ascertain and pass upon the rights of the parties by mere conjecture. The demurrer in this respect must be sustained, but, as the plaintiff may have a good cause of action, which is defectively stated in the complaint, the court below may, upon proper application, and in the exercise of its discretion, allow the pleading to be amended. Code, § 273; Proctor v. Ins. Co., 124 N. C. 265, 32 S. E. 716.

The court erred in overruling the demurrer. Let the case be remanded, with the direction to proceed further therein in accordance with this opinion. Error.

McNEELEY et al. v. SOUTH PENN OIL CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. March 28, 1903.)

On petition for rehearing. Denied.
For former opinion, see 44 S. E. 508.

NOTE BY BRANNON, J. Upon a petition for rehearing, the court carefully examined the case, and saw no ground for rehearing. It occurs to me to add this note, to present a further view for the position taken in the above opinion that never for a moment was there any adverse possession until after the death of Nathan Higgins. I have stated above that it is impossible to say that, as the possession under the executory contract was not hostile to Nathan Higgins, it was nevertheless hostile to his wife; and I say again that there could not be a possession adverse to half the tract, half the acre, half the pebble, half the molecule. But reflect further that nobody will say that as to Nathan Higgins the possession as to the whole tract was adverse. Every one must admit that it was friendly. This being so, we then bring in the fact that between Higgins and his wife there was a relation of privity and unity—that of joint tenancy—and the same character the possession bore to Nathan Higgins it bore to his wife. The possession being by executory contract while the wife lived, and not being adverse to him, neither was it adverse to her. He was her tenant, as well as his tenant. Dry law views them as such. A court of law views them as such, and adverse possession is governed by this view. Had Higgins made a deed, instead of a contract, the possession would have been adverse to him; and, being adverse to him, so it would have been as to her.

But even if the possession had been adverse to Mrs. Higgins while she lived, at her last breath the law cut off that adverse possession because of her husband's curtesy. Her heirs were instantly barred from suit by an act of God, for which they are not responsible, and they should not suffer therefrom. Upon her death the law gave their father curtesy, and that prevented their suit, and they had to obey the law. So far as disability of infancy is concerned, the statute did not stop. As to it they could sue, but then that curtesy stood in their way, and it prevented them from suing until the last breath of their father. That was not a disability, and is not tested by the law of disability. How can it be said, with reason or justice, that, when only two years of adverse possession had passed, the heirs are barred? They are entitled to the full period given by the statute. It is immaterial to say whether the statute was suspended during curtesy, so as to allow possession before the death of the wife to be tacked to that after the death of the husband, or whether the possession during her life was tolled—taken away—and a new cause of action accrued after the husband's death. The case of Steele v. Gellatly, 41 Ill. 39, supports the position taken in the above opinion as the import of Jackson v. Johnson, in saying that the statute cannot run until there is a person who can sue, and that "so decided have the courts been on this point that, although it is a general rule, when the statute has begun to run, it shall continue to run in spite of supervening disability. Yet in the case of Jackson ex dem. Swartwout v. Johnson, 5 Cow. 74, 15 Am. Dec. 433, the court held that the statute having commenced to run, actually ceased during the period when the person having the right had no legal power to enforce it. This question is, of course, wholly distinct from that of mere disabilities. Whether married women or infants, or any other class of persons having an estate, shall be considered as under disabilities, and therefore excused from bringing suit, or what time shall be allowed them after such disabilities are removed, are questions for the Legislature, and the courts have only to obey its behests. But the case we are considering is not one of technical disability, in the ordinary sense of the term, where the persons having the right have also the legal power to assert it in the courts, but are excused on account of infancy or coverture; but it is one where the claim sought to be barred has been in such a position that it could not be asserted by any one. If a claim of this character could be barred, it would be simple confiscation, without crime, fault, or laches on the part of the owner, and we cannot suppose the Legislature so intended."

The law cannot deny action, and yet confiscate property for failure to sue. So applied, the statute would be unconstitutional.

STATE v. POYNER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 23, 1904.)

MAINTAINING NUISANCE—LIABILITY OF EMPLOYEES.

1. Persons who, as employes of another, place posts in a waterway, constituting a nuisance, may not, 12 years after they have ceased to be in his service, be convicted of maintaining the nuisance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Currituck County; Council, Judge.

A. J. Poyner and another were convicted of maintaining a nuisance, and appeal. Reversed.

Pruden & Pruden and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellants. The Attorney General and E. F. Aydtlett, for the State.

CONNOR, J. The defendants were indicted for erecting and maintaining a public nuisance, in that they "did erect, place, and put in Wills Island Lead, a common highway, certain piles and posts, and unlawfully and willfully doth continue said obstructions and impediments," etc. There was evidence tending to show that Wills Island Lead is a waterway extending from one end to the other of Currituck Sound; that it was navigable, and used by the citizens for hunting and fishing. There was also evidence that the stakes and obstructions placed in said waterway have remained there until the trial of this indictment, and were put there by the defendants; that they were put there from 10 to 13 years before the presentment or indictment herein; that the work was done by the defendants, who were laborers employed by and under the direction of one Thomas J. Poyner, who was superintendent of the Currituck Shooting Club; that defendants left the employment of said Poyner and said club the same year the obstructions were put in, and had not been in the service of either since, nor had they had anything to do with said obstructions.

The defendants' counsel, in apt time, requested the court to charge the jury: "If the defendants were laborers, and employed in the service of T. J. Poyner, or other employer, and, as such employes and laborers, under direction of the said employer, more than two years before the finding of the bill of indictment in this case, drove said stakes, and thereafter had nothing to do with keeping of and maintaining said obstructions, they cannot be convicted, and you should return a verdict of acquittal." The court declined to give this instruction, and the defendants excepted. The court instructed the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they should find the defendants guilty, notwithstanding the lapse of time since they did the work and ceased their connection with the matter. The defendants duly excepted, and, from judgment upon a verdict of guilty, appealed.

The indictment is drawn in accordance with the decision of this court in State v. Narrows Island Club, 100 N. C. 477, 5 S. E. 411, 6 Am. St. Rep. 618, and charges a nuisance at common law for placing obstructions in a public highway—navigable water—and for continuing and maintaining the same. If the bill charged the defendants with placing the obstructions in the highway, they could not have successfully defended themselves by showing that they did so by direction of their employer. State v. Campbell, 134 N. C. —, 45 S. E. 844. They would, however, have been entitled to an acquittal because more than two years had elapsed since the commission of the offense. The Attorney General insists that the indictment is also for continuing and maintaining a nuisance, and that against this offense the statute does not run so long as the nuisance continues. This is undoubtedly true, as held by this court in State v. Holman, 104 N. C. 861, 10 S. E. 758. The present Chief Justice says: "The state was entitled to show the existence of the nuisance at any time within two years before the indictment." In that case the defendants owned the land upon which the milldam complained of was situate. They had control of it, and actively maintained it. In this case the defendants, laborers in the employment of other persons, in the discharge of their duty, and by their direction, put the stakes in 12 years ago. They had no interest in the matter, and nothing to do with keeping them there or maintaining the obstruction. During the same year they left the employment. It does not seem that in any proper or legal sense the defendants can be said to maintain the nuisance. The industry of the defendants' counsel has brought to our attention the case of Lyman v. Dorr, 1 Aikens (Vt.) 217, in which the distinction is very clearly pointed out. Rogle, J., says, "When a person in his own right, and for his own benefit, commits a trespass by erecting a nuisance on another's land, it is but reasonable that he should remain liable for the continuing injury. And on the other hand, if he committed the original trespass as an agent and for the benefit of another, the continuance should not be regarded as his act, but as that of the principal." It would be a strange result if the law should hold a laborer liable for maintaining a nuisance erected by him in the course of his employment, and by direction of his employer, 12 years after he had quit the service, and had not since had any connection with the master. Certainly, if a civil action would not lie, he could not be indicted and convicted of a criminal offense.

The court should have given the instruction asked, and, for the refusal to do so, the defendants are entitled to a new trial.

DISOSWAY v. EDWARDS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 23, 1904.)

BONDS—PENALTY—LIQUIDATED DAMAGES—CONSTRUCTION—BREACH—JUDGMENT FOR DAMAGES—ABSENCE OF PROOF.

1. An allegation, after averring a breach of a bond, that plaintiff is "endamaged to the amount of one thousand dollars," although it is not such a specific allegation of fact as to be deemed admitted by demurrer, is sufficient to entitle plaintiff to an inquiry as to his actual damages, where the cause of action is admitted by demurrer.

2. Courts incline to construe a bond as penal in character, unless such a construction would tend to defeat its essential object, even where it is expressly stated that the amount of the bond is intended as stipulated damages.

3. In an action on a bond conditioned for the performance of an agreement not to engage in a certain business, it was error to enter judgment for the full amount of the bond, on overruling a demurrer to the complaint, where there were no specific allegations as to the damage suffered, or showing that the amount of the bond was not unreasonable, and no proof was taken on the subject.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Moore, Judge.

Action by Mark Disosway against A. M. Edwards. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

This is an action upon a bond executed by the defendant in the following words: "Know all men by these presents that I, A. M. Edwards of Craven County, N. C. acknowledge myself indebted to Mark Disosway in the sum of One Thousand Dollars. The condition of this bond is such that if the said A. M. Edwards shall at any time, within the next twenty years from date hereof, engage in the sale of spirituous liquors either directly or indirectly within the limits of the city of New Berne, N. C., then this bond to be in full force and effect, and the said Mark Disosway, his heirs or assigns, in that case, is fully authorized hereby to at once take steps for the enforcement of this obligation, otherwise this bond to become null and void. A. M. Edwards. [Seal.] Witness, R. B. Nixon." The complaint alleges a breach of the bond, inasmuch as the defendant continues to engage in the sale of spirituous liquors in said city of New Berne, and further alleges, in separate paragraphs, that he is thereby "endamaged to the amount of one thousand dollars," and that "the defendant is indebted to him in the sum of one thousand dollars." The defendant demurred upon the following grounds: "(1) That the bond set out in the fourth paragraph of the complaint is in restraint of trade, tending to create a monopoly, contrary to public policy, null, and void.

(2) For that in any event such a bond could only be good to the extent of securing actual damage sustained, and the complaint does not set forth any fact from which the court can see that the plaintiff has sustained any damage whatever." Whereupon judgment was rendered as follows: "This cause coming on to be heard upon the complaint of plaintiff, and demurrer thereto filed by the defendant, and upon argument of counsel said demurrer being overruled, and the defendant allowed to answer over, but, declining to answer, excepts to the order of the court overruling said demurrer, and appeals to the Supreme Court, it is thereupon ordered and adjudged that the plaintiff recover of the defendant the sum of one thousand dollars upon the verified complaint of the plaintiff—no answer being filed by the defendant—with interest until paid, and the costs of action."

W. D. McIver, for appellant. O. H. Gulon, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. (after stating the case). We think the demurrer was properly overruled on both grounds, but that there is error in the judgment in allowing the full amount of the bond, in the absence of sufficient allegations in the complaint to enable the court to hold, as matter of law, that the penalty of the bond is in the nature of stipulated or liquidated damages. The plaintiff alleges that he is "endamaged in the sum of one thousand dollars," and, while this is not such a specific allegation of fact as is deemed admitted by the demurrer, yet it is sufficient to entitle him to an inquiry as to his actual damages, in view of the admission of his cause of action. It is not stated in the bond that it is intended to cover stipulated or liquidated damages, and, while such an inference might be drawn from some of the attending circumstances, it is not sufficiently strong to overcome the general rule of interpretation. As the primary object of the allowance of damages is to recompense the plaintiff for the actual loss sustained from the injury—that is, to make him whole—courts are always inclined to construe a bond as penal in its nature, unless such a construction would tend to defeat its essential object. This is true even when it is expressly stated that the amount of the bond is intended as stipulated damages. There are cases where the full amount so stipulated is allowed—as, for instance, where it is extremely difficult or practically impossible to ascertain the actual damage; but even then we think that, to entitle the plaintiff to more than nominal damages, sufficient facts should appear, either by proof or admitted allegations, to show that some actual loss has been sustained, and that the amount of the bond is not unreasonable. These questions are fully discussed by this court in Lindsay v. Anesley, 28 N. C. 186; Thoroughgood v.

Walker, 47 N. C. 15; Burrage v. Crump, 48 N. C. 330; Wheedon v. Am. Bonding Co., 128 N. C. 69, 38 S. E. 255. The general rule is thus stated by Chief Justice Marshall in Taylor v. Sandford, 7 Wheat. 13, 17, 5 L. Ed. 384: "In general, a sum of money in gross to be paid for the performance of an agreement is considered as a penalty, the legal operation of which is to cover the damages which the party in whose favor the stipulation is made may have sustained from the breach of contract by the opposite party. It will not, of course, be considered as liquidated damages, and it will be incumbent on the party who claims them as such to show that they were so considered by the contracting parties." This principle is further discussed in 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. 699; 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. 397, 402; 5 Cyc. 848. We are not inadvertent to the line of decisions distinguishing between ordinary contracts and those stipulating against carrying on a trade or business; but, while in such cases the courts are more inclined to allow liquidated damages, yet in all cases the clear intention of the parties, and the reasonableness of the amount, must affirmatively appear, to withdraw the case from the operation of the general rule.

We are deciding the case as it is presented to us, but upon a trial on the merits it may be made to appear that liquidated damages were reasonably intended. We would suggest that both the plaintiff and the defendant be allowed to amend their pleadings so as fully to present the questions at issue.

The defendant strenuously contends that the contract is against public policy, as being in restraint of trade. We are not prepared to say that the contract is so unreasonable as to be void under our line of decisions, and we are not disposed to extend the rule in favor of the multiplication of saloons. The following cases from our own Reports may be taken as exemplifications of the general rule: Baker v. Cordon, 86 N. C. 116, 41 Am. Rep. 448; Cowan v. Fairbrother, 118 N. C. 412, 24 S. E. 212, 32 L. R. A. 829, 54 Am. St. Rep. 733; Kramer v. Old, 119 N. C. 1, 25 S. E. 813, 34 L. R. A. 389, 56 Am. St. Rep. 650; King v. Fountain, 126 N. C. 196, 35 S. E. 427; Hauser v. Harding, 126 N. C. 295, 35 S. E. 586; Jolly v. Brady, 127 N. C. 142, 37 S. E. 153. We think that this is a case which must be finally determined upon all the facts as they may be made to appear upon the trial of the issues.

WILLIAMS v. SMITH.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 23, 1904.)

LIBEL—ACTION—NOTICE—PLEADINGS—AMENDMENT—ANONYMOUS PUBLICATION.

1. A complaint in an action for libel published in a newspaper is demurrable if it fails to allege that before bringing suit plaintiff gave the notice required by Pub. Laws 1901, p. 784, c. 557, at least five days before instituting proceedings for such publication, specifying the article and the statement therein alleged to be defamatory.

2. A complaint failing to aver the giving of such a notice may be amended.

3. A newspaper article signed "Smith," written by one with such surname, was not anonymous, within the provision of Pub. Laws 1901, p. 784, c. 557, that the requirement of notice of intention to bring an action for libel published in a newspaper shall not apply to anonymous publications.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Moore, Judge.

Action for libel by John H. Williams against Isaac H. Smith. From a judgment overruling a demurrer to the complaint, defendant appeals. Reversed.

D. L. Ward, for appellant. H. C. Whitehurst, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant wrote and published in the Newbern Daily, a newspaper published in the city of Newbern, of and concerning him, a certain article entitled "An Honorable Man"; that said article was a malicious libel, etc. The article was signed "Smith," and refers to the defendant as "one Williams." The defendant demurred to the complaint, and among other grounds for demurrer says, "That the plaintiff should allege that before bringing his suit he gave the defendant five days' notice in writing, specifying the article and the statement therein which he alleges to be false, as required by chapter 557, p. 784, of the Laws of 1901," etc. From a judgment overruling the demurrer the defendant appealed.

The appeal presents for construction sections 1 and 3, c. 557, p. 784, Pub. Laws 1901, known as the "London Libel Law," in the first section of which it is enacted: "That before any proceedings either civil or criminal, shall be brought for the publication in a newspaper or periodical in this state, of a libel, the plaintiff or prosecutor shall, at least five days before instituting such proceedings, serve notice in writing on the defendant or defendants, specifying the article and the statement therein, which he alleges to be false and defamatory. If it shall appear upon the trial that said article was published in good faith," etc., "only nominal damages shall be recovered," etc.

Neither our own nor the researches of the learned and diligent counsel have enabled us to discover any case in which this or any similar statute is construed in regard to an action for libel. We are compelled, therefore, to resort to an examination of the question upon general principles and the construction put upon statutes relating to other actions in which the same or similar provisions are found. "Under the rule both of the common law and under the Codes, when the statute gives a new remedy and prescribes conditions, or if an action of a certain class or against certain parties be authorized only after the performance of similar conditions, the performance of these conditions, whether the right of action exists at common law or is created by statute, must be alleged in the complaint and proved at the trial." 4th Enc. Pl. & Prac. 655. The principle is clearly stated and well illustrated in Reining v. Buffalo, 102 N. Y. 308, 6 N. E. 792. The Legislature of New York enacted that "no action to recover or enforce any claim against the city shall be brought until the expiration of forty days after the claim shall have been presented," etc. Ruger, C. J., said: "The inquiry is whether this provision was intended as a condition precedent to the commencement of an action, or simply to furnish a defense to the city in case of an omission to make such demand. We think the plain language of the statute excludes any doubt on the subject. It absolutely forbids the prosecution of any action until the proper demand has been made. It attaches to all actions whatsoever, and by force of the statute becomes an essential part of the cause of action, to be alleged and proved as any other material fact. It does not purport to give the city a defense dependent upon an election to use it, but expressly forbids the institution of any suit until the preliminary requirements have been complied with. * * * It is competent for the Legislature to attach a condition to the maintenance of a common-law action as well as one created by statute, and, when this is done, its averment and proof cannot safely be omitted."

This court has given to a similar statute the same construction. Section 757 of the Code provides "that no person shall sue any city, county, or other municipal corporation for any debt or demand whatsoever unless the claimant shall have made a demand upon the proper municipal authorities." The section expressly requires the demand to be alleged in the complaint. This court has uniformly held that a failure to allege the demand may be taken advantage of by demurrer. Love v. Commissioners, 64 N. C. 706. Bynum, J., in Jones v. Commissioners, 73 N. C. 182, says: "That a demand was necessary before action begun is well settled. If, therefore, it had appeared from the complaint that no demand had been made, that would have been good cause of demurrer." School Directors v. Greenville, 130 N. C. 87, 40 S. E. 847. In Nichols v. Nichols, 128 N. C. 108, 38 S. E. 296, it is held that the provision in the statute (Code, § 1287) that in an action for divorce the complaint should be accompanied by an affidavit setting forth that the facts relied upon as ground for divorce had existed, to plaintiff's knowledge, six months, was mandatory, and that filing such affidavit was essential to give the court jurisdiction of the action. Hopkins v. Hopkins, 132 N. C. 22, 43 S. E. 508.

This construction has been put upon statutes imposing upon plaintiffs the duty of making demand or giving notice prior to bringing actions by all of the courts whose reports we have examined. It will be observed that in the clause of the act immediately following that under discussion the language is materially changed—"If it shall appear on the trial," etc. The first clause imposes upon the plaintiff, before instituting the action, the duty of making the demand, and giving the defendant opportunity to take the steps by which he may not defeat the right of action, but protect himself against the recovery of punitive damages. The plaintiff, however, says that this provision of the Code does not apply to this case. Section 3: "This shall not apply to anonymous communications and publications."

We find that the word "anonymous" is defined in the Century Dictionary as "of unknown name; one whose name is withheld, as an anonymous author, or as an anonymous pamphlet; or without any name; wanting a name; without the real name of the author; nameless." The article is signed "Smith." The defendant's name is Isaac H. Smith. He refers to the plaintiff as "one Williams," and speaks of him as having been party to the suit for the recovery of usury. We are of the opinion that this article does not come within the definition of an anonymous publication.

Without passing upon the other grounds, we conclude that his honor should have sustained the second ground of demurrer. Of course, the plaintiff will be entitled to amend his complaint in the superior court and make the necessary allegation. It is a defective statement of a cause of action, and may be cured by amendment. Johnson v. Finch, 93 N. C. 205.

Let it be certified that there was error in overruling the demurrer.

EARLY et al. v. EARLY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. 23, 1904.)

PLEADINGS—WAIVER OF DEFECTS—INHERITANCE OF REMAINDER—DEATH OF REMAINDERMAN AND HEIR BEFORE LIFE TENANT.

1. Defects in the answer are waived by plaintiffs agreeing that the judge shall find the facts and render judgment thereon.

2. Testator devised land to T., his son, after the death of M., testator's wife. M. survived testator, T., and J., the only child of T., who died intestate, without issue, after T. Held that, under Code, § 1281, providing that when any person dies intestate seised of an inheritance, or of any right thereto, or entitled to any interest therein, it shall descend under the rules there prescribed, the heirs of J., and not those of T., inherit the remainder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Cooke, Judge.

Action by Josiah Early and others against Ella Early. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Francis D. Winston, for appellants. J. B. Martin, Day & Bell, and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This is an action for the recovery of real property. A jury having been waived, the court found the following facts: "(1) Andrew Early, late of Bertie county, owned in fee simple at his death a tract of land on which he lived, called his 'Home Place,' in said county, lying on both sides of the public road from Hexlena to Conaritsa Church. (2) That on December 27, 1895, said Early made his will, which was thereafter duly admitted to probate, and which is made part hereof, in which he devised his said lands as follows: 'Sixth. I give and bequeath to my sons Andrew Early and Tobias Early, after the death of my wife Mary Early, to be equally divided in acreage, giving my youngest son Tobias Early the place on which my dwelling and out-house now stand.' (3) Mary Early, the life tenant, survived her husband, Andrew, her son Tobias, and the child Tobias, named hereafter, and died before this action began. (4) Tobias died intestate before this action commenced, and before the said Mary, leaving him surviving, his widow, the defendant, Ella Early, and his infant child by said Ella, and also his brothers and sisters of the whole blood, the plaintiffs above named, except T. T. Wynns, the husband of Annetta. (5) That the said infant child of Tobias and Ella died intestate without issue, and without brother or sister, or issue of such capable of inheriting, leaving his mother the said Ella him surviving." Upon the foregoing facts the court rendered judgment against the plaintiffs, to which they excepted and appealed.

The plaintiffs' counsel moved in this court for judgment on the pleadings, because it is alleged in sections 5 and 7 of the complaint that the plaintiffs are the owners of the land, and that the defendant has no interest therein; to which allegation the defendant answers "that, as in plaintiffs' complaint alleged, sections 1, 2, 5, and 7 are not true." No such motion was made in the court below. Admitting, for the purpose of the argument, that the answer is defective in that it does not contain a sufficient denial of the material allegations of the complaint under section 253 of the Code, as construed in Rumbough v. Improvement Co., 106 N. C. 461, 11 S. E. 528, cited by the plaintiffs' counsel in support of his motion, we are yet of the opinion that the plaintiffs cannot now take advantage of the formal defect, as their motion comes too late. If they were entitled to judgment upon the pleadings, they should have asserted their right to it before the case was submitted to the judge below to find the facts and declare the law arising thereon. When the plaintiffs agreed that the facts of the case should be found by the judge, and a judgment rendered thereon, any and all defects in the answer were thereby waived, and all irregularities cured. Foreman v. Hough, 98 N. C. 386, 3 S. E. 912; Greensboro v. Scott, 84 N. C. 184; Robbins v. Killebrew, 95 N. C. 19; Hines v. Railroad, Id. 484, 59 Am. Rep. 250.

The plaintiffs contend that they are the owners of the land, because there was a failure of lineal descendants of Tobias Early, Sr., and therefore the inheritance descended to them as the next collateral relations of the person last seised, who are of the blood of Andrew Early, the ancestor of Tobias Early, Sr., and from whom the latter, who would have been one of the heirs of Andrew Early, received the inheritance by devise. Code, c. 28, rule 4. The plaintiffs' right to recover turns, therefore, upon the question whether Tobias Early, Sr., or Tobias Early, Jr., was the person last seised at the time of the death of the latter. If Tobias Early, Jr., was the person seised at the time of his death, the inheritance vested in his mother, who survived him, and who is defendant in this action, as we will presently show; but, if he was not thus seised, then his father, Tobias Early, Sr., was the person last seised of the inheritance, and the plaintiffs, as his next collateral relations, are entitled to the land for the recovery of which this action is brought. The plaintiffs' counsel relied upon the case of King v. Scoggin, 92 N. C. 99, 53 Am. Rep. 410, in support of the position that Tobias Early, Sr., was, at the time of the death of Tobias Early, Jr., the person last seised, and not the latter, as Tobias Early, Sr., was the first purchaser of the remainder and the only one of the two who could have had any seisin, and as Tobias Early, Jr., acquired the inheritance by descent from his father during the continuance of the particular estate—that is, the life estate of Mary Early—and the remainder thus descended created no seisin in Tobias Early, Jr., and consequently no new stock of descent. The case, abstractly considered, is full authority for the contention of the plaintiffs, and seems to have established the following rules to determine who will take when the remainder or the reversion, during the continuance of the particular estate, descends to an heir who dies without issue, namely: "(1) When the reversion or remainder expectant upon a freehold estate comes by descent, and the reversioner or remainderman dies during the continuance of the particular estate, he who would claim the estate by inheritance must make himself heir to the original donor, who erected the particular estate, for it is the old inheritance. (2) Where the reversion or remainder comes by descent, and before the determination of the particular estate it is conveyed by deed or devise to a stranger, the donee takes by purchase. He becomes a new stock of descent, and the estate will descend to his heirs. (3) Where the remainder or reversion is acquired by purchase, he who would claim the estate must make himself heir to the first purchaser of the remainder or reversion at the time when it comes into possession; for the remainderman or reversioner, by such purchase, has become a new stirps of descent." Under the third of the rules stated by the court the plaintiffs claim that they are entitled to the land, as there was no seisin in Tobias Early, Jr., and the defendant, Ella Early, though heir to him, could not make herself heir to the first purchaser or person last seised, Tobias Early, Sr., at the time the remainder vested in possession by the death of Mary Early, the life tenant.

The question as to what will constitute sufficient seisin to make a new stock or stirps of inheritance (seisina facit stipitem) is exhaustively and learnedly discussed by Ashe, J., in King v. Scoggin, and the rules and principles applicable to the special facts of that case and to the particular matter then under investigation were correctly stated by him. It will be observed that he was endeavoring to show that the plaintiffs in that case, who could recover only upon the strength of their own title, and not upon the weakness of their adversary's, had failed to show any title as the heirs of George Hay, Jr., who was held to be the new stock of inheritance, or the person last seised, within the meaning of the rules of descent then in force. He expressly says that it was not necessary to investigate the defendant's title, and the court was therefore not even called upon to decide whether, under the law of descent in this state as it then existed, George Wesson, under whom the defendant claimed, did not have such actual seisin, or its equivalent in law, as to constitute a new stock of inheritance. That case was decided upon the old law, which has been greatly modified by the amendments to be found in the Revised Code, chapter 38, and the present Code, chapter 28.

The plaintiffs also relied upon the case of Lawrence v. Pitt, 46 N. C. 344, which presented the very question we now have under consideration. The inheritance there was claimed by the father from his son, who, in his turn, had inherited it from his mother, and she, in her turn, from her mother; the estate being a reversion in land expectant on the termination of a life estate. The son died before the expiration of the life estate, and it was held that the inheritance did not vest in the parent or father under the sixth canon of descent. That case, like the case of King v. Scoggin, is not in point, as both of them were decided upon descents which occurred before the year 1851, and to the facts of those cases, therefore, the law as first amended by the enactment of the Revised Code of 1854 did not apply. In the case of Lawrence v. Pitt the court laid down the following principle: "Where the estate descended is a present estate in fee, no person can inherit it who cannot, at the time of the descent cast, make himself heir of the person last in the actual seisin thereof. But of estates in expectancy, as reversions and remainders, there can be no actual seisin during the existence of the particular estate of freehold; and consequently there cannot be any mesne actual seisin which of itself shall turn the descent so as to make any mesne reversioner or remainderman a new stock of descent, whereby his heir, who is not the heir of the person last actually seised of the estate, may inherit. The rule, therefore, as to reversions and remainders expectant upon estates in freehold, is that, unless something is done to intercept the descent, they pass, when the particular estate falls in, to the person who can then make himself heir of the original donor who was seised in fee and created the particular estate, or, if it be an estate by purchase, the heir of him who was the first purchaser of such reversion or remainder. It is no matter in how many persons the reversion or remainder may, in the intermediate period, have vested by descent; they do not, of course, form a new stock of inheritance. The law looks only to the heir of the donor or first purchaser." And this is the law as stated by Blackstone, who says: "So, also, even in descents of lands by our law, which are cast on the heir by act of the law itself, the heir has not plenum dominium, or full and complete ownership, till he has made an actual corporal entry into the lands; for, if he dies before entry made, his heir shall not be entitled to take the possession, but the heir of the person who was last actually seised. It is not, therefore, only a mere right to enter, but the actual entry, that makes a man complete owner, so as to transmit the inheritance to his own heirs. Non jus, sed seisin, facit stipitem." The court, in applying this rule to the facts in that case, held that, as descent was cast upon the son during the continuance of the particular estate of freehold, the father could not take as his heir, nor could the inheritance vest in him under the sixth canon of descent, as he could not make himself heir to him who was the first purchaser or person last seised of the reversion.

It would be vain and useless now to discuss at any length the principles of the common law in regard to seisin as applied to the canons of descent in force prior to the enactment of the Revised Code, for by the latter the law in that respect has been so radically changed as to require almost a reversal of these principles in ascertaining who is entitled to the inheritance when descent is to be traced from the person last seised; but a brief review of the old law in regard to seisin will not be out of place, and may enable us the better to understand and construe the law as amended by the Revised Code. At the common law seisin signified the possession or occupation of the soil by a freeholder, one who has at least a life estate in the land. This seisin was of two kinds—seisin in deed or in fact, which was when the person had the actual seisin or possession or occupation of the land with the intent, as is sometimes said, to claim a freehold interest; and seisin in law, which was a bare right to possess or occupy the land or freehold, or, as otherwise defined, a right of immediate possession according to the nature of the estate. 2 Blk. 104-129; 1 Washburn, R. P. 33, 34. The difference between the two is thus illustrated: "Where a freehold estate is conveyed to a person by feoffment, with livery of seisin, or by any of those conveyances which derive their effect from the statute of uses, he acquires a seisin in deed and a freehold in deed. But where a freehold estate comes to a person by act of law, as by descent, he only acquires a seisin in law, that is, a right to the possession; and his estate is called a freehold in law. For he must make an actual entry on the land to acquire a seisin or a freehold in deed." 1 Cru. Digest, tit. 1, § 24; Coke, Lit. 266b; and section 448, H. & B.'s Notes, 1.

The essential principle of the ancient law of inheritance was that the stock of descent could not be established except by actual seisin of the freehold of inheritance, and the rule is thus comprehensively stated by Blackstone: "We must also remember that no person can be properly such an ancestor as that an inheritance of lands or tenements can be derived from him, unless he hath the actual seisin of such lands, either by his own entry or by the possession of his own or his ancestor's lessee for years, or by receiving rent from a lessee of a freehold; or unless he hath had what is equivalent to corporal seisin in hereditaments that are incorporeal, such as the receipt of rent, a presentation to the church in case of an advowson, and the like. But he shall not be accounted an ancestor, who hath had only a bare right or title to enter or be otherwise seised. And therefore all the cases which will be mentioned in the present chapter are upon the supposition that the deceased (whose inheritance is now claimed) was the last person actually seised thereof. For the law requires this notoriety of possession as evidence that the ancestor had that property in himself, which is now to be transmitted to his heir, which notoriety had succeeded in the place of the ancient feudal investiture, whereby, while feuds were precarious, the vassal on the descent of lands was formally admitted in the Lords' court (as is still the practice in Scotland), and there received his seisin, in the nature of a renewal of his ancestor's grant, in the presence of the feudal peers, until at length, when the right of succession became indefensible, an entry on any part of the lands within the country (which, if disputed, was afterwards to be tried by those peers) or other notorious possession was admitted as equivalent to the formal grant of seisin, and made the tenant capable of transmitting his estate by descent. The seisin, therefore, of any person, thus understood, makes him the root or stock from which all future inheritance by right of blood must be derived, which is very briefly expressed in this maxim, 'Seisina facit stipitem.'"

We must conclude, after carefully reading Lawrence v. Pitt, 46 N. C. 344, which was decided in 1854, that it was thought the then existing law, as declared by the court, which had its origin in the feudal system, and which was applied in that case, should be changed, and brought more into harmony with modern conditions and requirements. It was manifestly in consequence of that decision that the amendments to the Revised Statutes of 1836 were made in the Revised Code of 1854, which amendments are as follows: Rule 1 of chapter 38 of the Revised Statutes provides that: "Inheritances shall lineally descend to the issue of the person who died last actually or legally seized, forever, but shall not lineally ascend, except as is hereinafter provided for," while section 1 of chapter 38 of the Revised Code provides that: "When any person shall die seized of any inheritance, or of any right thereto, or entitled to any interest therein, not having devised the same, it shall descend under the following rules: Rule 1. Every inheritance shall lineally descend forever to the issue of the person who dies last seized, entitled or having any interest therein, but shall not lineally ascend, except as hereinafter provided." By the proviso to rule 6 of the Revised Statutes, where the person last seized left no issue, nor brother, nor sister, nor the issue of such, the inheritance vested for life only in the parents of the intestate, or either of them, or the survivor of them; while by the corresponding rule in the Revised Code and the present Code it vests in the father, if living, and, if not, then in the mother, if living, in fee. But, in order that the meaning of the Legislature, as expressed in section 1 of the Revised Code, might be made plain and unmistakable, it was enacted by rule 13 of chapter 38 that "every person in whom a seisin is required by any of the provisions of this chapter shall be deemed to have been seized, if he may have had any right, title or interest in the inheritance." We therefore see that the seisin, either in law or in deed, of the common law, is not the seisin of the statute. The former requires that there shall be either actual possession or the right of immediate possession, while the latter requires that there need be only a right to or interest in the inheritance, with or without actual possession or the present right of possession, in order to establish a stock sufficient as a source of descent. It is therefore perfectly clear that under the law applicable to our case—that is, the law of the Revised

Code as brought forward in the present Code—all that is required to constitute a sufficient seisin for the creation of a new stock of inheritance or stirps of descent is that the person from whom the descent is claimed should have had, at the time of the descent cast, some right, title, or interest in the inheritance, whether vested in possession or not, for the language of the statute is explicit that a person having any such right, title, or interest shall be deemed to have been seised thereof. We are not entirely without what we regard as an authoritative interpretation of this new provision of the law. In Sears v. McBride, 70 N. C. 152, the plaintiff, Thomas Sears, claimed title to the land as heir of his son. The original owner of the land, or propositus, was Eliza McPherson, who intermarried with Isaac Fanshaw, and died, leaving issue by him, a son, William Sears, who died in 1852, leaving his father surviving him. In 1871, Isaac Fanshaw, who had a life estate in the land as tenant by the curtesy, died, the plaintiff surviving him. The defendants were the next collateral relations of Eliza McPherson, from whom the estate descended. This case, in its facts, is substantially like the case of Lawrence v. Pitt, supra. The court held that as the law stood in 1852, and by which the case must be governed, the defendants were entitled to recover, and in discussing the question involved uses this language (Settle, J., speaking for the court): "If this case were governed by the rules of descent to be found in the Revised Code, c. 38, the plaintiff would be entitled to the land in controversy in fee simple; but since it is governed by the rules as found in the Revised Statutes, c. 38, he can take nothing. The learning on this subject is so fully and satisfactorily stated in Lawrence v. Pitt, 46 N. C. 344, that we shall not discuss the subject further than to apply the law to the facts before us." "But the law has been materially changed, as will be seen by reference to the Revised Code, which enacts: 'Rule 1. Every inheritance shall lineally descend forever to the issue of the person who died last seised, entitled or having any interest therein,' etc. And, further, as if to remove all doubt, rule 13 is enacted, which declares: 'Every person in whom a seisin is required by any of the provisions of this chapter shall be deemed to have been seised if he may have had any right, title or interest in the inheritance.' So that now neither actual nor legal seisin is necessary to make the stock in the devolution of estates." "And it will be observed that while the proviso to rule 6 in the Revised Statutes gives in certain contingencies only a life estate to the parents, etc., yet in the Revised Code, under the same contingencies, an estate in fee simple is given to the father, if living, and, if not, then to the mother, if living." While the precise point we are considering was not presented in that case so as to impart to the judgment of the court controlling authority as a precedent, the emphatic language of the court, which we have quoted, and which is singularly applicable to our case, induces us to regard it as if it had the force and effect of an actual decision, even if the language of the law was not in itself plain or unambiguous. In addition to this, it will be observed that in the case of Lawrence v. Pitt, Battle, J., referring to the contention of the plaintiff's counsel that in pleadings and other proceedings at the common law a person is often said to be seised of the reversion, and that, therefore, the term "seised" may well be applied to reversions under our statute of descents, says that, if our statute used only the word "seised" or "seisin," the argument would be a strong one; but that it used the words "actually or legally seised," and those words must be construed as they were used at common law in the case of dower, curtesy, and descent. It is clear that the court would have regarded the use of the term "seised" without the other words "actually" and "legally" as sufficient to describe the right, title, or interest which a person even at common law had in a reversion or a remainder expectant upon an estate of freehold. The words "actually and legally" were omitted from the Revised Code, c. 38, and the present Code, c. 28, and we cannot avoid the inference that this was done designedly in deference to the intimation of the court in Lawrence v. Pitt, for the purpose of conforming the statute in this respect to the other amendments of it, so that "there will be left no hinge or loop to hang a doubt on" as to the true intent and meaning of the Legislature.

Our conclusion must be that in this case the infant son of the defendant Ella Early, at the time of his death, though it occurred when the particular estate of freehold was still outstanding, had that right, title, or interest in the inheritance, remainder as it was, which in law is deemed to be a sufficient seisin to create a stock of inheritance in him; and, he having died, as stated in the facts found by the court, without any issue capable of inheriting, nor brother, nor sister, nor the issue of such, the inheritance, under rule 6, c. 28, of the Code, vested in the defendant, Ella Early, and she is the owner of the land as between herself and the plaintiffs, the life tenant Mary Early having died before this action was commenced. For this reason the judgment of the court below was right, and must therefore stand.

WOODARD v. SAULS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 1, 1904.)

ACTIONS—VENUE—NECESSARY PARTIES.

1. Where a complaint alleged, among other things, that defendant had transferred to plaintiff a debt against S. as collateral, which S. had refused to pay on the ground that defendant had notified him not to pay the same, and asked judgment for the recovery of such debt, S. was a necessary party, unless a nonsuit was entered as to that part of the complaint.

2. A complaint alleged that defendant was liable to plaintiff on a promissory note, and for other sums in which plaintiff had incurred liability as defendant's surety. It also alleged that defendant had turned over certain notes as security, but had got possession of, and failed to apply the same on the indebtedness, and ancillary process in claim and delivery was sued out. Held, that a personal judgment against defendant, a determination of the liability incurred by plaintiff as surety, and an adjudication that the collaterals should be applied thereto, were the chief causes of action, and not the recovery of the specific notes demanded; and hence the venue was not governed by the situs of the notes, under Code, § 190 (4), providing that actions for the recovery of personal property shall be brought in the county where the property is situated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Wilson County; Ferguson, Judge.

Action by S. A. Woodard against J. R. Sauls. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pou & Brooks and Finch, Pou & Fuller, for appellant. F. A. & S. A. Woodard and Shepherd & Shepherd, for appellee.

CLARK, C. J. This action was brought in Wilson superior court by plaintiff, who resides in that county, and summons was served on the defendant by the sheriff of Johnston. The complaint avers that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff by promissory note, and for further large sums in which the plaintiff is liable as surety for defendant, and that to secure such indebtedness the defendant had turned over to the plaintiff sundry notes, a large portion of which were due by residents of Wilson county, and secured by property in said county; that the defendant afterwards got possession of a portion of said notes to be collected by him as agent of plaintiff, and applied on said indebtedness, which defendant has not done; and that defendant got possession of another portion of said collaterals surreptitiously without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, and retains the same, to recover which notes the plaintiff sued out the ancillary proceeding of claim and delivery. Further, the complaint avers that the defendant transferred to him a debt against one Lee Sauls, which the latter refused to pay on the ground that the defendant has notified him not to pay the same, and that the defendant is a resident of Wilson, but temporarily in Johnston, county, and asks judgment for the recovery of the sum due by said promissory note, and for liability on the other indebtedness as to which plaintiff is surety; also for the recovery of the Lee Sauls debt, and for recovery of said collateral notes by claim and delivery, and judgment upon the replevin bond given by defendant in said claim and delivery proceedings. The defendant filed an affidavit averring that he is a resident of Johnston county, and the notes sought to be recovered are situated in that county, and asking a removal of the cause. The judge did not find the fact whether defendant was a resident of Johnston county or not, and refused to remove the cause. Had he found that the defendant was in fact a resident of Wilson, the finding would have been final, and the cause might well be sent back to the end that this fact might be passed upon, as the court does not pass upon questions of law upon a hypothetical state of facts. It is also clear, though no objection has been made on that ground, that Lee Sauls is a necessary party to the action, unless a nonsuit is entered as to that part of the complaint, or by amendment he be now made a party. But, passing by these matters, the only point presented by the appeal is the refusal to remove, the defendant contending that by Code, § 190 (4), as amended by chapter 219, p. 232, Laws 1889, this, being an action for "recovery of personal property," should be brought in the county of Johnston, and hence is removable thither, the defendant having demanded a removal in apt time under Code, § 195. This would be true if it had been found as a fact that the defendant was a resident of Johnston county, and the notes were there, and the recovery of the personalty was the sole relief demanded, or even the chief relief, the others being incidental, as in Mfg. Co. v. Brower, 105 N. C. 440, 11 S. E. 818; Connor v. Dillard, 129 N. C. 50, 39 S. E. 641. But here the obtaining personal judgment for the amount due and the determination of the liability incurred by the plaintiff as surety and adjudging the collaterals named should be applied thereto were the chief causes of action. The recovery of possession of the collateral notes was incidental. Action for the recovery of the debt against Lee Sauls was necessarily brought in Wilson.

EWBANK v. TURNER et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 18, 1903.)

DENTIST — BOARD OF EXAMINERS — POWER — PLEADING — AMENDMENT — JURISDICTION AT CHAMBERS — MANDAMUS.

1. When the summons in a case of which the superior court has jurisdiction is returnable at chambers, but the complaint shows a cause of action which should be heard at term, it may be amended so as to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the judge at chambers, especially in view of Code, §§ 623, 256, and section 255, as amended by Laws 1887, p. 518, c. 276, providing for a transfer of causes from the judge to term, from the clerk to term, and from the judge to the clerk.

2. In an action in which the only relief demanded is a writ of mandamus to compel the board of dental examiners to issue to the plaintiff a certificate of proficiency in dentistry, an allegation that the board's wrongful refusal to issue such certificate has damaged him in the sum of $5,000 or more does not take the case out of the jurisdiction of the judge at chambers.

8. Under Code, §§ 3149-3153, and Laws 1887, p. 402, c. 178, amended by Laws 1891, p. 203, c. 251, providing for examination of applicants for a certificate authorizing them to begin the practice of dentistry by a board of examiners to be elected by the North Carolina Dental Society, where the board has given an examination, and refused a certificate on account of incompetency of the applicant, mandamus will not lie to compel the issuance of a certificate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Henderson County; B. F. Long, Judge.

Action by Fred W. Ewbank against V. E. Turner and others, composing the board of examiners of the North Carolina Dental Society. From a judgment dismissing the action for want of jurisdiction, plaintiff appeals. Action dismissed.

Davidson, Bourne & Parker, Jones & Rec-tor, and E. W. Ewbank, for appellant. Bus-bee & Busbee, for appellees.

CLARK, C. J. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff graduated with distinction in the dental department of the Baltimore Medical College, an institution of high and well-recog-nized standing, after prosecuting his studies in dentistry therein for the prescribed period of three years; that thereafter he made ap-plication to the proper authorities for license to practice dentistry in South Carolina, and after examination he was found duly pro-ficient and qualified, and license was issued to him, under which he practiced in that state; that thereafter, on removal to this state, he made application for examination and license under our laws; that, the board not being in session, under the provision of the statute he was examined by a single member of the board, was found duly qual-ified and proficient, and was given a tem-porary license 26th January, 1902, which for certain reasons was renewed by a second temporary license till the meeting of the full board, 19th June, 1903; that under these licenses he practiced dentistry for nearly a year and a half, and built up a lucrative practice; that on 19th June, 1903, he was examined by the full board, and, though he, as he avers, showed on such examination that he "possessed the necessary and required proficiency in the knowledge and practice of dentistry, and underwent a satisfactory ex-amination, as required by the statute in such case made and provided, as will abundantly appear from an inspection of his examina-tion papers, the said board, and the majority of the defendants composing said board, un-lawfully, unjustly, and arbitrarily, and with-out just cause or reason, and abusing the discretion with which they were clothed by the laws of North Carolina, refused, and yet refuse, upon the repeated demands of the plaintiff, to issue and grant to him a certificate of proficiency, to which he was and is entitled, and which it was and is the duty of the defendants to issue and grant." The above is the gist of the complaint, which further avers that, by reason of such re-fusal to issue him a certificate of proficiency upon such examination, the defendants com-posing the board of examiners of the North Carolina Dental Society "thereby wrongfully, arbitrarily, unjustly, and unlawfully pre-vented him from engaging in the practice of dentistry in this state, to his great damage, to wit, in the sum of five thousand dollars or more," and prays for a mandamus to com-pel said board to issue to the plaintiff "a certificate of proficiency in the knowledge and practice of dentistry," and that "he have such other and further relief as he may be entitled to in the premises." An answer was filed, denying that the plaintiff had passed a satisfactory examination, or was entitled thereon to a certificate of proficiency, and denying that the action of the board could be reviewed by the courts. The summons was made returnable at chambers. The plaintiff moved (1) that the court submit the issues raised by the pleadings to a jury at the next term, under the proviso in Code, § 623; (2) that the plaintiff be permitted an inspection and to take a copy of his ex-amination papers; (3) that he be permitted to take a copy of the examination papers pre-pared and submitted by certain parties named, which were submitted to the board upon their examination to practice dentistry at the same time and place when the plaintiff was rejected. These motions were each refused, and the plaintiff excepted. The defendants moved to dismiss for want of jurisdiction, on the ground that this was an action for a money demand, and the summons had been made returnable before the judge at cham-bers. The plaintiff thereupon moved to strike out the words "to his great damage, to wit, in the sum of five thousand dollars or more." The court denied this motion upon the ground that it had no power to allow such amend-ment, and the plaintiff excepted. The court thereupon dismissed the action on the ground that it had no jurisdiction thereof. The plaintiff again excepted, and appealed.

When the summons in a case of which the superior court has jurisdiction is brought before the clerk, to term, or before the judge at chambers, it is equally in the superior court, and there is no defect of jurisdiction. If brought before the clerk, when it should have been brought to term, it is said in El-lott v. Tyson, 117 N. C., at page 116, 23 S. E. 103, when it gets "into the superior court by appeal or otherwise the latter has juris-diction of the whole cause, and can make amendment of process to give effectual juris-diction. Such amendment will be presum-ed, or the Supreme Court, even, can amend the process, if necessary." Quoting McLean v. Breece, 113 N. C. 390, 18 S. E. 694; citing Capps v. Capps, 85 N. C. 408; Cheatham v. Crews, 81 N. C. 343; Robeson v. Hodges, 105 N. C. 49, 11 S. E. 263; and adding, "Un-like the court of the justice of the peace, the clerk is really a part of the superior court, and a case wrongfully instituted before him, upon appeal, only needs an amendment of process to justify the original service." The same principle as to the jurisdiction of the superior court is recognized by chapter 276, p. 518, Laws 1887, amending section 255 of the Code (see Clark's Code [3d Ed.] § 255), and cases cited in Roseman v. Roseman, 127 N. C., at page 497, 37 S. E. 518, reaffirmed in Re Hybart's Estate, 129 N. C., at page 131, 39 S. E. 779; Ury v. Brown, 129 N. C. 271, 40 S. E. 4; In re Anderson, 132 N. C., at page 247, 43 S. E. 649; Railroad v. Stroud, 132 N. C., at page 416, 43 S. E. 913. For the same reason, if a case is before the judge at chambers, if there are issues of fact appearing upon the pleadings, the cause should not be dismissed, but should be transferred to term for trial before a jury (Code, § 623), just as the clerk might so transfer it (Code, § 256). As said in cases above cited, it would be strange to dismiss an action already in the superior court because before the clerk, or the judge at chambers, and tell the plaintiff to come back into the same court before the same judge, the same clerk being present, at term, by service of another summons upon the same parties. The remedy is not to dismiss, but (the parties being already in court by service of summons) simply to transfer the cause to the proper docket. This does no one any detriment, saves time and costs, and avoids the unseemly countermarching incident to the old practice when a plaintiff was put out of court by one door if he wrongly brought an action for assumpsit, for instance, and was left to guess by which door he should come back into the same room—whether by labeling his action "trover," "trespass," "detinue," or other process, the correctness of which guess he could only prove by a costly process of elimination. Even when an action is brought in the superior court, but in the wrong county, there being general jurisdiction, the action is now not dismissed, but is transferred to the court in the proper county.

The court erred in dismissing the action for want of jurisdiction. It was in the court that had jurisdiction. No amendment was necessary, but, if it were desirable, it was error to hold that the court had no power to allow it. Piercy v. Watson, 118 N. C. 976, 24 S. E. 659; Thomas v. Womack, 64 N. C. 657. Besides, the incidental averment that the plaintiff "was damaged five thousand dollars or more" did not make it an action for a money demand. It was, certainly in view of the disclaimer of the plaintiff, an action solely for a mandamus to obtain the "certificate of proficiency," and hence it presented only matter of which the judge had jurisdiction at chambers.

The defendants move in this court to dismiss the action because the complaint does not state a cause of action, in view of the plaintiff's averment that he does not seek to recover damages. The requirements as to examination and procurement of a certificate before beginning the practice of dentistry in this state are set out in chapter 178, p. 402, Laws 1887, amended by chapter 251, p. 203, Laws 1891 (which are substituted for Code, § 3148), and Code, §§ 3149-3156. The power of the Legislature to require examination and certificate as to the competency of persons desiring to practice professions or skilled trades is upheld, after a review of the authorities, in State v. Call, 121 N. C. 643, 28 S. E. 517. That decision was reaffirmed in State v. McKnight, 131 N. C. 717, 42 S. E. 580, 59 L. R. A. 187, the court calling attention to the fact that the state exercises this police power for the protection of the public from imposters and incompetents, and not to the end of conferring exclusive privileges upon any particular body of men, for to do the latter is prohibited by the state Constitution, §§ 7, 31, art. 1, which forbids exclusive privileges and monopolies. It is a power to be exercised for the public good, and the Legislature is to judge of the method of appointing the examiners, and can prescribe the nature of the examination, unless it appear plainly that the power to regulate is used in reality in violation of the guaranties in the above-cited article of the Constitution, and for the purpose of conferring exclusive privileges, and not solely for the protection of the public. State v. Biggs (at this term) 46 S. E. 401. No such violation of these constitutional guaranties appears or is alleged in this case. Code, § 3149, provides for a board of examiners, to consist of six members of the North Carolina Dental Society, to be elected by said society. The presumption is that this honorable body will elect six of its ablest and most prominent members for the important duty of keeping up the standard of their profession by a just, reasonable, and impartial examination of applicants. Should this important duty be neglected, and incompetent or unworthy members be chosen, the remedy is by legislative repeal, or change of the method of selecting the board. Section 3151 provides that "said board shall grant a certificate of proficiency in the knowledge and practice of dentistry to all applicants who shall undergo a satisfactory examination, and who shall receive a majority of votes of said board upon such proficiency." The lawmaking power having intrusted such examination to the board thus constituted, and required that the examination shall be satisfactory to them, and such requirements being reasonable and in violation of no constitutional provision, the courts cannot intervene, and direct the board to issue a certificate to one who the majority of the board have held has not passed a satisfactory examination, because, upon the examination of experts, the court or jury might think the examination of the plaintiff ought to have been satisfactory to the board. That is a matter resting in the consciences and judgment of the board, under the provisions of the law, and the courts cannot by a mandamus compel them to certify contrary to what they have declared to be the truth. Had the board refused to examine the applicant upon his compliance with the regulations, the court could by mandamus compel them to examine him; but it cannot compel them to issue him a certificate, when the preliminary qualification required by law, that the applicant shall be found proficient and competent by the examining board, is lacking. Burton v. Furman, 115 N. C. 166, 20 S. E. 443; Loughran v. Hickory, 129 N. C. 281, 40 S. E. 46.

But the plaintiff contends that, suppose his averment is true, that the defendants "wrongfully, unlawfully, unjustly, arbitrarily, and without just cause or reason," declined to issue him license; has he no remedy? Certainly he has a remedy, for no one is authorized to discharge a public trust in that manner. But the remedy is not by mandamus to compel the board to certify contrary to their consciences and judgment, and no certificate of proficiency can issue, under the statute, except upon a certificate of satisfactory examination by the board. One remedy, if there should ever happen such abuse of trust, is, as already stated, by the Legislature repealing the act, or providing a different method of selecting the board, or regulating the method or course of examination, or prescribing a review of the finding of the board by some other body, if the General Assembly should think proper. Another remedy would be to follow the precedent set by applicants for license to practice law, who, when rejected, study their prescribed course over again, and stand for examination at the next regular day. This is perhaps the most sensible course, for no man ever knows his profession too well.

Another remedy still: If the applicant avers his rejection was caused by improper motives, his remedy is an action for damages against the individuals composing the board; alleging bad faith or arbitrary disregard of their duties, or improper animus against the plaintiff, or other malversation in their discharge of duty. In such action it might be difficult to prove the charges, unless by declarations made by the defendants themselves, for certainly the examination paper of the plaintiff himself would not be competent, in the first place, since, though experts might testify to its sufficiency in their judgment, that does not negative the good faith of the board, whose judgment, if exercised in good faith, is a protection to them. Malicious, illegal, or arbitrary action must be shown by direct evidence, and not by inference to be drawn by the jury from the fact that the opinion of witnesses introduced as experts may differ from the opinion of a legal board of examiners as to the sufficiency of the examination. It is only when there shall be other evidence first introduced, laying a sufficient ground, aliunde, for a charge of bad faith and misconduct, that the examination paper of the plaintiff could possibly be competent, and then only in corroboration of the evidence first introduced. And in no aspect could the papers of other applicants at the same time and place be put in evidence, for, even if they had been admitted to practice on insufficient answers, the plaintiff was not hurt thereby, and the introduction of irrelevant matter would only confuse the issue, which would be whether the plaintiff was refused a certificate, though he was shown to be qualified by his answers, by the arbitrariness, improper animus, and misconduct of the examining board. We mention this point, as the refusal of the motions to permit the inspection and copying of the examination papers was discussed before us and ably presented in the argument of counsel. The granting a certificate to practice involves matters of judgment and discretion on the part of the board, and will not be enforced by mandamus. State v. Gregory, 83 Mo. 123, 53 Am. Rep. 565; Hart v. Folsom, 70 N. H. 213, 47 Atl. 903.

The complaint, alleging as ground of misconduct merely the fact that the examination should have been found sufficient by the board, does not state a cause of action authorizing the issuing of a mandamus. People v. Dental Examiners, 110 Ill. 180; Dental Examiners v. People, 123 Ill. 227, 13 N. E. 201; Williams v. Dental Examiners, 93 Tenn. 619, 27 S. W. 1019, and cases therein cited at page 628, 93 Tenn., 27 S. W. 1019; State v. Coleman, 64 Ohio St. 377, 60 N. E. 568, 55 L. R. A. 105. Mandamus cannot be used as a writ of error to revise and reverse erroneous judgments of a subordinate tribunal (in that case, a board of health), and the court "will not and cannot look into the evidence of fact upon which the judgment of the board was based, for the purpose of determining whether the conclusions drawn from it were correct or incorrectly formed." Kirchgesner v. Board of Health, 53 N. J. Law, 594, 22 Atl. 226.

Let it be entered: Action dismissed.

RAPE—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF PROSECUTRIX—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS—CORROBORATION—PRESUMPTIONS—INSTRUCTION—RESTRICTING EVIDENCE TO SPECIAL PURPOSE.

1. It will be presumed in favor of a conviction of rape, where declarations of prosecutrix as to the acts of defendant were introduced "for the purpose of corroborating the prosecutrix," that an attempt had been made to impeach the credibility of prosecutrix on her cross-examination, or that witnesses had been introduced by defendant for that purpose.

2. In a prosecution for rape, where declarations of prosecutrix were admitted to corroborate her testimony, the court should have instructed the jury, without any special request, as to the purpose and effect of such corroborative testimony, and it was not sufficient merely to charge that such statements were claimed by the state to corroborate her evidence on the stand.

3. In a prosecution for rape, declarations of prosecutrix as to the acts of defendant are not substantive evidence in proof of the fact, but are admissible merely as corroborative of prosecutrix as a witness after an attempt has been made to impeach her.

4. In a prosecution for rape, the court should have charged as to the nature and meaning of corroborative evidence, and not have merely called attention to the argument and contention of the state's counsel as to the effect of such evidence, without instructing the jury as to whether such contention properly stated the law.

Clark, C. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Durham County; W. R. Allen, Judge.

John Parker was convicted of rape upon a child less than 10 years of age, and appeals. Reversed.

James Fuller, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

MONTGOMERY, J. The crime of which the prisoner has been convicted—rape upon a little girl of less than 10 years of age—is a most unusual one and most revolting. The evidence is not before us. It would be difficult to imagine a case in which the rules (1) that the evidence should be such as to satisfy the jury beyond a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, (2) that none but competent evidence should be received by the court, and (3) that evidence competent for a special or restricted purpose should be confined to that end and clearly explained by the court to the jury, were more in point than the present case. The only exception that appears in the record is one directed to the alleged failure of his honor to properly instruct the jury in respect to certain evidence that was offered and received as corroborative in its nature. The prosecutrix had been examined as a witness for the state. The solicitor then put in evidence the examination of the prosecutrix, taken by the justice of the peace, D. C. Gunter, when the matter was being investigated by him, "for the purpose of corroborating the prosecutrix." The solicitor then introduced W. A. Cobb "for the purpose of corroborating Lilly Lyon," who testified substantially that he was a policeman of the city of Durham, and that on the evening of the 22d of February, 1902, about 10 days after the crime was said to have been committed, at the home of the mother of the prosecutrix, the prosecutrix told him that the prisoner came to her home and hired her to go with him to his home to wait on his wife, who was then sick; that he started with her, and took her out of the way into the woods, and then violently and against her will ravished her; that he then carried her to his home, and on the next day took her with him to the same woods and did the same thing to her. If the above was all that there is in the case, there would be no error in the proceeding; for we must presume, nothing to the contrary appearing in the record, that the prosecutrix, when on the witness stand, had been assailed on her cross-examination to such a degree as to amount to an attempt to impeach her credibility, or that witnesses had been introduced by the defendant for that purpose. But after the case was made out and agreed upon by the solicitor and the counsel of the prisoner, counsel applied to the judge who tried the case for an amendment to the statement of the case on appeal, so that it might appear that his honor did not explain to the jury in the charge that the statement referred to in the evidence of Gunter and the evidence of Cobb was to be considered as corroborative evidence only. His honor stated that he could not say with certainty whether he did so or not, but that he was willing for Mr. Foushee (acting solicitor) to make the amendment if he thought proper to do so, provided the statement was made as follows: "Upon objection being made to the statement referred to in the evidence of Gunter and to the evidence of Cobb, the court stated in the presence of the jury that the evidence would be admitted only as corroborative of the evidence of the prosecutrix. In the charge to the jury the court recited the evidence of the prosecutrix, and said substantially, 'The state contends that the jury ought to believe her, etc., and that she is corroborated.' The state says that she made the same statement before Gunter and to Cobb, and that these statements corroborate her evidence upon the stand. In other words, the state argues that she made the same statement before, and that this should lead the jury to believe what she now testified to." We are of the opinion that upon the amendment made to the case on appeal, in the language required by his honor, the jury was not properly instructed upon the matter of the corroborative evidence of Gunter and Cobb. Of course, when the evidence was introduced, and when it was received as corroborative evidence, it was in the presence of the jury, for it was for their consideration, but that did not satisfy the demands of the law.

In Sprague v. Bond, 118 N. C. 551, 18 S. E. 701, the evidence there introduced was only competent for the purpose of corroboration, and that was conceded when it was offered, and for that purpose alone did his honor admit it. The court there, discussing the same question which had been decided in Bullinger v. Marshall, 70 N. C. 520, said: "The learned justice who delivered the opinion of the court in that case was evidently loath to yield to this innovation as he considered it, foreseeing, as he no doubt did, that it would be most difficult to restrain the effect of such evidence and prevent it from operating on the minds of the jury as substantive proof of the facts in dispute. Because there is this danger of its exercising an improper influence on the jury, it is incumbent on the judge presiding at the trial, where such corroborative evidence is introduced, to see to it, even without any request for special instructions, that the jury fully understand the use they are permitted to make of it, and we must hold that the failure to caution them in this particular, when such a request is made as was done by the defendants here, entitled them to a new trial." It is true that in the case before us there was no exception taken in the trial below to his honor's failure to further instruct the jury on the matter under discussion, and it was not called to the attention of the court at the time he was delivering the charge nor in the motion for a new trial. It was, however, incumbent on him to do so without any special request at the hands of counsel, as we have seen in the case of Sprague v. Bond, supra; and, if it was incumbent on him to have done so without a special request to that end, then his failure to do so, that fact appearing before us, was error. This is a life and death matter, and we cannot agree that evidence which was purely corroborative should have been received on the trial as corroborative evidence, and then submitted to the jury without a sufficient explanation of the nature and character of that kind of evidence, simply because counsel omitted to make a special request for that purpose. But again, upon the amendment as allowed by his honor, it is apparent that the evidence of the prosecutrix was the matter corroborated, and not the witness. The evidence of a witness cannot be strengthened—cannot be corroborated—by the repetition of the same statement made to others at different times. A falsehood may be as often repeated as the truth; and corroborative evidence of this kind has no force as substantive evidence to prove the facts, but only to remove the imputation which has been cast upon the witness upon his cross-examination, or by an attack upon his credibility by other witnesses. Associate Justice Reade, in the case of State v. Parrish, 79 N. C. 610, said, "It is like to evidence of character, which only affects the witness." That judge further said in the same case: "The rule is that when the witness is impeached (observe that, when the witness is impeached) it is competent to support the witness by proving consistent statements at other times, just as a witness is supported by proving his character, but it must not be considered as substantive evidence of the truth of the facts any more than any other hearsay evidence. The fact that supporting a witness who testifies does indirectly support the facts to which he testifies does not alter the case. That is incidental. He is supported, not by putting a prop under him, but by removing a burden from him, if any has been put on him. How far proving consistent statements will do that must depend upon the circumstances of the case. It may amount to much or very little." It appears further upon the amendment that his honor did not say one word himself to the jury as to the nature and meaning of corroborative evidence. He only called attention to the argument and the contention of the counsel for the state, without instructing them as to whether that argument and contention embraced the law as it should have been given. The jury never got his explanation of corroborative evidence. They got only the contention of the state; that contention being, as we have seen, not the law. It made no difference that counsel for the prisoner and the solicitor for the state argued the evidence of Cobb and Gunter as corroborative evidence. His honor not having explained what such evidence meant, the jury had to choose between the strength and soundness of the arguments and contentions of the respective counsel. They should have had the guidance under the law of his honor.

New trial.

CLARK, C. J. (dissenting). The prisoner was convicted of a most revolting crime, but this court felt compelled to grant a new trial upon a technical ground that could hardly be conceived to have affected the verdict. State v. Parker, 132 N. C. 1014, 48 S. E. 830. Again convicted, the prisoner again asks a new trial upon the purely technical ground that the judge in his charge to the jury did not tell them that certain evidence was offered as corroborative, and not as substantive, testimony, though the solicitor had so stated when the testimony was offered, and the judge stated in the presence of the jury that he admitted it only as corroborative, and not substantive, testimony, and in his charge to the jury told them that the state relied on such evidence as corroborative of the testimony of the prosecutrix. Every presumption is in favor of the correctness of the proceedings below, and appellate courts should not be astute to find reasons for a new trial. It should plainly appear that the appellant was prejudiced by the alleged error, and that but for such error, in all reasonable probability, the conviction would not have occurred. There have been decisions, it is true, of recent origin, that the judge in his charge to the jury should single out the corroborative testimony, and tell the jury that it is corroborative and not substantive; but certainly failure to do so should not be held reversible error unless the attention of the court was called to it by a prayer to so instruct, especially when, as in this case, the judge and solicitor both stated, when the evidence was introduced, that it was merely corroborative, and the judge in his charge to the jury stated that the state relied upon such evidence as corroborative of the evidence of the prosecutrix. By virtue of our amendment to rule 27 (46 S. E. v.), the court will henceforward hold it not reversible error to fail to repeat in the charge that the evidence is merely corroborative when it is so stated on its admission, unless specifically prayed to so charge. The rule heretofore held is not a vested right, and a failure to observe it should not, in the absence of all other ground of exception, authorize us to set aside this second time the solemn verdict and judgment of the trial court. Besides, no exception of this kind was taken at the time or appeared in the case as first settled by the judge. Finally yielding to the importunity of counsel for the prisoner, the judge admitted an amendment, saying, after the lapse of months, "I cannot say with certainty whether I did so or not"—i. e., charge that the evidence was to be considered as corroborative only. As he could not recollect, he certainly could not authorize an amendment that he did not so charge. If it was error, and even prejudicial error, to fail to charge upon the corroborative evidence more explicitly, such failure should have positively and affirmatively appeared, and the failure of the judge merely to recollect, after a great lapse of time, "whether I did so [charge] or not," should not be taken as proof that he did not. A trial is too solemn and expensive a matter to have a conviction—especially a second conviction—set aside because the judge could not recollect whether a certain phrase, which would not have affected the verdict in all human probability, was positively and certainly used by him.

In State v. Powell, 106 N. C. 635, 11 S. E. 191, it was held that while the court should instruct the jury that corroborative evidence should not be considered in any other light, yet, unless it affirmatively appeared that this was not done, it will be presumed that it was. This was reiterated and reaffirmed. State v. Brabham, 108 N. C. 796, 13 S. E. 217; Byrd v. Hudson, 113 N. C. 211, 18 S. E. 209. Here, no exception for failure to so charge was made till after the case on appeal had been settled. It should have been called to the attention of the court by a prayer to charge. Even if an exception for failure to so charge had been set out in the prisoner's case on appeal, the recollection of the judge would have been fresh. But if the mere fact that after the lapse of months he cannot recollect positively "whether he did so charge or not" should be allowed hereafter—as in this case—as valid ground for a new trial, few verdicts, especially in state cases, will stand. It is too much to expect trial judges to carry such details in their memories.

MILLER v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 1, 1904.)

COURTS—SUPREME COURT—ORIGINAL JURISDICTION—CLAIMS AGAINST STATE.

1. A claim of the clerk of the superior court for fees in actions instituted by the state, for which it has been adjudged liable, is not a "claim against the state," within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 9, giving the Supreme Court original jurisdiction to hear such claims.

2. Const. art. 4, § 9, giving the Supreme Court jurisdiction to hear claims against the state, and report to the Legislature thereon, does not apply to cases involving no question of law, but merely questions of fact upon which the Legislature has already passed.

Original proceedings in the Supreme Court on a claim of Mollie A. Miller, administratrix of Festus Miller, against the state. Dismissed.

Busbee & Busbee and Womack & Hayes, for plaintiff. The Attorney General, for the State.

MONTGOMERY, J. Under the terms and provisions of chapter 119, p. 218, of the Public Laws of 1887, several hundred persons made entries of certain oyster lands subjected to entry by that act, and received grants therefor. By the provisions of chapter 287, p. 237, of the Public Laws of 1893, the solicitor of the First Judicial District was directed to institute proceedings in ejectment against such persons as had received grants for natural oyster or clam beds; and under the directions of that statute the solicitor commenced suit against 694 of those persons, who had received grants under the provisions of the act of 1887. One of the suits was tried, and the plaintiff's action was not sustained, and nonsuits were taken in all of the other actions. In the case of Blount, Solicitor, v. Simmons et al., 119 N. C. 50, 25 S. E. 789, this court held that the state, under section 536 of the Code, was liable for the costs. Afterwards the plaintiff in this action, in a certain judgment rendered in the superior court of Pamlico county against the state, for the sum of $4,096.60, on account of fees due the officers in the above-mentioned actions, was adjudged entitled to $3,872.20 thereof for fees due to Festus Miller, clerk of the superior court of Pamlico county, her intestate. Before that judgment was rendered, Festus Miller, the plaintiff's intestate, received an auditor's warrant to the amount of $4,851.41 for fees due him in these cases, but the treasurer declined to pay the same, or any part of it. The plaintiff's intestate, at the session of the General Assembly of 1899, presented her claim against the state for these fees, and the matter received a full and careful investigation of that body. The whole proceedings were laid before this court, and, if this was a case where the court had jurisdiction under article 4, § 9, of the state Constitution, we could not conscientiously recommend to the General Assembly a settlement of this matter different from the one which was made. We are of the opinion, however, that we have no jurisdiction in the premises. In the first place, the demand of the plaintiff is not such a claim against the state as is in contemplation of article 4, § 9, of the Constitution. In the case of Blount v. Simmons, 119 N. C.

50, 25 S. E. 789, this court said: "The costs in this case are not strictly a claim against the state, as contemplated by article 4, § 9, but only an incident of an action by the state for which its agent has assumed that it will be liable to the same extent as private persons." In the next place, there is no question of law involved in this matter. Only matters of fact were in dispute, and they have been passed upon by the General Assembly; and where such a condition of things exist we are not called upon to recommend any line of conduct to the legislative body. In the case of Reynolds v. The State of N. C., 84 N. C. 460, this court said: "We are fully satisfied, on a perusal of the papers in the proceeding, of the correctness of the view taken in Bledsoe v. State, ante [64 N. C.] 392, to wit, that our 'recommendatory jurisdiction' in regard to claims against the state does not embrace cases involving mere matters of fact, and that it was not the intention of the framers of the Constitution to impose upon the court the labor of the trial of facts, and that the jurisdiction is confined to claims where, the facts being agreed on, it was supposed an opinion of the Supreme Court on important questions of law would aid the General Assembly to dispose of such cases; it having been before a question whether the judges could, consistently with their constitutional duties, communicate an opinion to the Legislature." In Horne v. The State, 82 N. C. 382, the court said: "This provision of the Code is very broad in its terms—'any person having any claim'; and, regarded in the light of a contemporaneous exposition of the Constitution, would seem to embrace all claims against the state; but this court, in construing the section of the Constitution referred to (section 9 of article 4) held that it was intended to apply only to cases wherein questions of law were involved, and that the jurisdiction of this court ought not to be exercised in small matters of small value, particularly when there is no doubt about the law." In Reeves v. The State, 93 N. C. 257, the same view was expressed, and the court added: "If the claim is a plain one, only involving questions of fact, it ought to be taken at once before the Legislature, unless its nature be such as that it may be presented to the auditor, or some other appropriate authority, for adjustment and allowance." This case, as we have said, does not involve any question of law, for this court had, at its February term, 1897, in the case of Blodnt v. Simmons, 120 N. C. 19, 26 S. E. 649, not only reaffirmed a former ruling that the state was liable for the costs involved in the oyster-bed suits, but had particularly specified the amount of fees which each officer was entitled to for his services; and the Legislature therefore could not stand in need of any recommendation from us as to its duty under the law; and the facts they had already passed upon. Counsel for the plaintiff took this view of their duty in connection with their client's claim, knowing that there was no grave question of law involved, and went directly before the Legislature, as they should have done under the intimation of the court in the case of Reeves v. State, 93 N. C. 257, to have the facts ascertained, and an act passed making an appropriation to their client. We do not feel called upon, therefore, to make any recommendation to the General Assembly in the premises. If we should do so, the members of that body would have the right to feel justly offended that we should seek to point out their duty to them in a matter where there was no law question involved, and where they had already investigated and passed upon the facts.

Dismissed.

DAVIS v. SEABOARD AIR LINE R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 1, 1904.)

RAILROADS—KILLING CATTLE—TITLE—GIFTS—QUESTION FOR JURY—PRIMA FACIE CASE—REBUTTAL—NONSUIT.

1. Where, in an action against a railroad company for killing a cow, plaintiff testified that, though he purchased the cow with his own money, he gave her to his wife, and placed metal tags in the cow's ear, with his wife's name stamped on them; that the cow ran on the farm which belonged to the wife, with plaintiff's other cattle, and that, notwithstanding the wife accepted the gift, plaintiff regarded the cow as belonging to both him and his wife—whether there was a completed gift of the cow to the wife, so as to vest the title in her, was properly submitted to the jury.

2. Where, in an action against a railroad company for killing a cow, plaintiff brought his action within six months after the killing, and thereby established a prima facie case of negligence, as provided by Code, § 2326, and the only direct testimony as to the manner in which the cow was killed was given by defendant's engineer, testifying as defendant's witness, defendant was not entitled to a nonsuit on the ground that the engineer's evidence rebutted the prima facie case so made.

Montgomery, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Bertie County; Justice, Judge.

Action by H. C. Davis against the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This is an action for damages for killing a cow. As the action was brought within six months after the cow was killed, a prima facie case of negligence arose, under section 2326 of the Code. Both sides introduced testimony, and the issues and answers thereto were as follows: "(1) Was the plaintiff the owner of the cow in question? Yes. (2) Did the defendant company negligently and wrongfully kill said cow? Yes. (3) If so, what damage has the plaintiff sustained thereby? $40."

All the exceptions before us relate to the refusal to nonsuit, the charge, and the refusal to charge. Upon these questions the following proceedings appear from the record:

After the testimony was closed, the defendant renewed its motion to nonsuit upon the grounds, first, that the title to the cow was not in the plaintiff, but in his wife, Cora; second, because the defendant had rebutted the prima facie case of negligence made out by the statute. Motion refused, and defendant excepted. (Exception No. 2.)

The defendant in apt time requested the judge to charge the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they should answer the first issue, "No." Refused, and defendant excepted. (Exception No. 3.)

That, upon the whole evidence, they should answer the second issue, "No." Refused, and defendant excepted. (Exception No. 4.)

That, if they believed the evidence, the defendant had rebutted the prima facie case of negligence made out by the statute, and they should answer the second issue, "No." The court did not give the charge in the language requested, but charged the jury as herein-after stated, and the defendant excepted. (Exception No. 5.)

The court charged the jury that they should pass upon the title to the cow, and they should determine from the testimony as to whether the cow was the property of the plaintiff or of his wife.

The court charged the jury upon the second issue that the question of negligence would be left to them upon all of the testimony; that when the plaintiff showed to their satisfaction that the defendant had killed the cow in question, if they found the plaintiff owned her, that was prima facie evidence, under the statute, and, nothing else appearing, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and they should answer the second issue, "Yes;" but if the defendant had satisfied them that the killing was without negligence, and unavoidable, as testified to by the defendant's witness, then they should answer the second issue, "No." To this charge the defendant excepted, and assigned as error, first, the refusal to charge as requested; and, second, for error in the charge as given.

The following testimony given by the plaintiff is the only evidence relating to the ownership of the cow: "The railroad runs across my land. The cow was killed on the 18th December, 1902. The defendant's train was two hours behind time. I went home from Lewiston, N. C., and saw my cow. She was dead, lying in a ditch. I saw tracks of the cow upon the defendant's road. Looked like it had struck and knocked her off. The cow was more gentle than my driving horse. I bought the cow, and gave her to my wife. I told my wife she could take her, and my wife accepted the gift." The witness was asked: "Why are you bringing suit for your wife's cow?" He replied: "The cow belonged to both of us. What is my wife's mine. I told my wife she could have the cow. There was no separation of the cow from the other cattle. I bought the cow, and paid for her with my own money. My wife claimed her. The cow ran in the woods and on the farm. The farm belongs to my wife. I bought the land upon which we live, using part of the money received from the sale of my wife's land, and about $200 of my own money, and took the title in her name. I placed metallic tags in the cow's ear. The name of my wife was stamped on the tags. I had the tags on hand. I did not wish to change the marks of cattle I had bought, and put the tags on most of the cattle. I listed the cattle in my name, including this cow, for taxation." The only direct testimony as to the manner in which the cow was killed was given by the engineman, a witness for the defendant.

Day & Bell and Murray Allen, for appellant. Francis D. Winston, for appellee.

DOUGLAS, J. (after stating the case). We see no error in the action of his honor. The questions raised by the defendant have been so recently decided and fully discussed that but little more can be said. The defendant insists that the court should have found, as matter of law, that the plaintiff was not the owner of the cow. It is clear that the plaintiff, having bought the cow with his own money, became the owner thereof, and remained such owner, unless there was a completed gift to his wife, which was a mixed question of law and fact, for the determination of the jury. This question is directly decided in Gross v. Smith, 132 N. C. 604, 44 S. E. 111, where the court says: "We think there was evidence sufficient to be submitted to the jury upon the question of the parol gift. There can be no doubt that delivery of possession is essential to constitute a valid gift. 'The necessity of delivery,' says Chancellor Kent, 'has been maintained in every period of English Law.' 2 Kent, Com. 438; 2 Blk. 441. But the question in this case is whether there was a delivery in fact. The declarations or admissions of the intestate and the other testimony are not conclusive upon that question, but the jury must find the fact of delivery from all of the evidence. * * * All courts hold that delivery is necessary to the validity of the gift, but the fact of delivery may be found by the jury from the acts, conduct, and declarations of the alleged donor, just as any other material fact may be found in the same way from the acts, conduct, and declarations of a party to be affected thereby. What is a gift is a question of law, but whether or not there was a gift in any particular case is a question for the consideration of the jury upon the testimony." The defendant further contends that the court should have held, as matter of law, that the prima facie case created by the statute had been rebutted by the testimony of the defendant's witness. This question is directly decided in Baker v. Railroad, 133 N.

C. 31, 45 S. E. 247, wherein the court says: "This was an action for negligently killing a horse. At the close of the evidence the defendant moved to nonsuit the plaintiff. The action was brought within six months, and, the killing having been shown, the statute raised a presumption of negligence; and, the burden to rebut such presumption being upon the defendant, the judge could not find affirmatively that the defendant's evidence had been sufficient to do this. This was a matter for the jury. The judge could instruct the jury, as he did in this case, that a certain state of facts, if believed by them, would rebut the presumption, but not that certain evidence, though uncontradicted, would do so. The burden is on the defendant to rebut the presumption, and the jury alone can pass on its credibility; otherwise, if the only eyewitness is witness for the defendant, the plaintiff will be at his mercy, and would be deprived altogether of the benefit of the statute, because he did not happen to see the killing. It would be a novelty to nonsuit the plaintiff on the defendant's evidence." We gave careful consideration to both of the above-cited cases, and see no reason now to reverse our ruling.

The wife of the plaintiff was permitted to become a party to the action after verdict. This was proper, to the extent of binding her by the verdict to the future exoneration of the defendant; but it would not relate back to the bringing of the action, so as to have the effect of raising in her favor the prima facie case created by the statute. As she disclaims any interest in the subject-matter of the action, we do not see how the defendant can be injured in any way, especially in the view we take of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONTGOMERY, J. (dissenting). This action was brought in the name of H. C. Davis. On the trial he testified for himself that he had given the cow to his wife; that he had placed metallic tags in the cow's ears, with the name of his wife stamped on the tags; that the cow ran in the woods and on the farm, and that the farm belonged to his wife; and that there was no separation of the cow from the other cattle. That evidence, in my opinion, constituted a gift, and the court should have dismissed the action upon the motion of the defendant.

SKINNER v. TERRY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 1, 1904.)

EJECTMENT—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—DEED—PROVISIONS—NONCOMPLIANCE—RECORD—EFFECT.

1. A decree in a suit for specific performance of a contract to convey land in favor of D., under whom plaintiff claimed, adjudging that D. was the equitable owner in fee of the land, describing it, and that he was entitled to present possession thereof and to a deed in fee from defendants in such suit which they were thereby ordered to execute, and that such decree should effect a transfer to D. and his heirs of all the legal title to the land aforesaid, etc., was not a conveyance of the land, within Acts 1885, p. 233, c. 147, § 1, providing that no conveyance of land nor contract to convey shall be valid to pass any property as against creditors or purchasers for a valuable consideration, until after registration thereof in the county where the land lies.

2. Where a decree in a suit for specific performance adjudged that the purchaser was the equitable owner of the land in fee, and was entitled to present possession and a deed of conveyance, which it ordered to be executed, it was not necessary to a complete adjudication of the rights of the holder of the naked legal title that the decree should also provide that it should operate to transfer the title to the purchaser and his heirs.

3. The holder of an equitable title under a decree for specific performance is entitled to maintain ejectment or trespass for injury to his possession.

4. A decree in a suit for specific performance, which provided that the purchaser was the equitable owner of the land in fee and entitled to a conveyance, was binding against a subsequent purchaser of the land under an execution against the holder of the naked legal title, without regard to whether the decree contained a provision that it should operate as a conveyance, as authorized by Code, § 426, or whether the direction that the decree be recorded was complied with.

Appeal from Superior Court, Perquimans County; Council, Judge.

Action by T. G. Skinner against Harvey Terry. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The locus in quo, being a large tract of land situate in the counties of Perquimans and Pasquotank, known as the "Great Park Estate," was on April 1, 1884, the property of Timothy Ely. On the 24th day of April, 1884, said Ely and wife entered into a contract with John F. Davis whereby they bound themselves, upon the payment of a certain amount of money and the performance of certain stipulations, to convey the land to said Davis. At fall term, 1892, of the superior court of Pasquotank county, the said Davis instituted an action against Ely and wife and Harvey Terry and wife for the purpose of enforcing specific performance of said contract. In the complaint therein it was alleged that the plaintiff, Davis, had paid the amount of the purchase money, and in all other respects performed the stipulations in the contract. The plaintiff further alleged that since the execution of the contract the said Ely had conveyed said land to the defendant Terry, who had notice of the plaintiff's equities and rights. The defendant Terry, answering, denied the execution of a deed by Ely to him. The cause came on for trial at January special term of Pasquotank superior court, 1894, when, upon appropriate issues, the jury found that the defendants Ely and wife had executed the contract as alleged; that the plaintiff, Davis, had on his part complied with said contract; that Ely had not complied with his part thereof; that "the defendants Terry and wife were not seised of any title or interest in said land"; that the plaintiff, Davis, was the equitable owner of the land, and entitled to a conveyance thereof from the defendants Ely and wife. Thereupon it was adjudged "that the plaintiff, John F. Davis, is the equitable owner in fee of the land [describing it], and that he is entitled to the present possession thereof, and to a deed of conveyance in fee therefor from the defendants Ely and wife, and that they are hereby ordered and commanded to execute, prove, and deliver to the said John F. Davis a good and sufficient deed of conveyance in fee; * * * and it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the force and effect of this order, judgment, and decree is and shall be to transfer to the said John F. Davis and his heirs the legal title of the land aforesaid, and to that end it doth decree that from now and henceforth the said John F. Davis doth and shall have and hold that portion of the 'Great Park Estate' above described unto him and his heirs in fee simple." The court directed that the decree be recorded in the office of the register of deeds of Pasquotank county. The decree was recorded in Pasquotank county on January 23, 1900, and in Perquimans county on January 7, 1902. Thereafter the said John F. Davis died intestate, and his administrator duly filed a petition for the sale of said land for the purpose of making assets to pay debts. Pursuant to orders duly made in the cause, the said land was sold and purchased by the plaintiff, T. G. Skinner, and a deed therefor executed on December 11, 1900, and duly recorded in Pasquotank county on December 13, 1900, and in Perquimans county on January 7, 1902. On August 15, 1900, the defendant, pursuant to a purchase made by him at a sale made by the marshal of the Eastern District of North Carolina under an execution issued upon a judgment recovered by Harvey Terry against Timothy Ely, obtained a deed for said land from said marshal. It was duly recorded in Pasquotank county on December 10, 1900, and in Perquimans county on October 10, 1900. There was evidence tending to show that the land was situate in both Pasquotank and Perquimans counties. The plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury that upon the entire evidence they should answer the first and second issues, involving title and possession of the plaintiff and trespass by the defendant, in the affirmative. The court so charged the jury, and the defendant excepted. The defendant submitted a number of prayers for instructions, all of which were declined. The defendant excepted and appealed.

Rodman & Rodman, G. W. Ward, and B. G. Watson, for appellant. W. M. Bond and E. F. Aydlett, for appellee.

CONNOR, J. The exception to the instruction given in response to the plaintiff's prayer presents the questions raised by the defendant's prayers. The defendant says that the plaintiff cannot maintain this action for a trespass committed upon that portion of the Great Park Estate lying in Perquimans county, for that the decree in the case of John F. Davis against Timothy Ely and others was not recorded in said county until January 7, 1902, whereas his deed from the marshal was recorded October 10, 1900. This contention is based upon the theory that the judgment of the superior court of Pasquotank county, of January, 1894, operated as a deed from Ely to Davis, and came within the provisions of chapter 147, p. 233, of the Acts of 1885, regarding registration of deeds. The act provided (section 1) that "no conveyance of land nor contract to convey, or lease of land for more than three years, shall be valid to pass any property as against creditors or purchasers for a valuable consideration. * * *" This language does not include a decree or judgment of the court which declares the rights of the parties, and adjudges that, by virtue of the facts found by the court, the prevailing party is the owner of the land. The effect of the decree was to declare Davis the equitable owner of the land, and leave in Ely the naked legal title. It was not necessary to a complete adjudication of Ely's rights that the further provision in regard to the operation of the decree, as a deed, should have been added. This court in Farmer v. Daniel, 82 N. C. 152, through Dillard, J., says: "In this case it appears as a fact in the case agreed that the purchaser specifically performed the contract on his part by paying into the office of the clerk and master the purchase money, and thereupon the right arose to have performance on the part of the heirs acting through the agency of the court. And the court of equity, on report of full payment by the master, in recognition of this right, ordered that the title of the heirs be conveyed by the master to the purchaser." It was further held in that case that the decree vested in the purchaser a perfect equitable title upon which he could defend against one holding the naked legal title. That the owner of the perfect equitable title may maintain ejectment or other possessory action, under our system of procedure, may be regarded as settled beyond controversy. Taylor v. Eatman, 92 N. C. 601; Condry v. Cheshire, 88 N. C. 375.

If, as we have seen, the effect of the decree was to vest a perfect equitable title in Davis, and that the defendant Terry was bound by said decree, it is immaterial whether the provision that it should operate as a deed, as provided by section 426 of the Code, be complied with. It will be observed that the provision of that section is that after the court shall have declared the rights of the parties "it shall have power also, to be used in its discretion, to declare in the order then made, or, in any, made in the progress of the cause, that the effect thereof shall be to transfer to the party, to whom the conveyance is directed to be made, the legal title of the said property. * * * We think that the failure to insert this clause, or to comply with the directions that the decree be recorded, in no manner affects the equitable title which the plaintiff Davis acquired by the decree declaring him to be the equitable owner in fee.

We would not feel authorized to extend the language of chapter 147, p. 233, Acts 1885, to include a decree of the character before us in this record. But that point is not before us. The effect of this decree is to vest all of the equitable title in Davis, which was outstanding in Ely or in the defendant Terry. Certainly, the rights of Davis could not be affected by a deed executed thereafter by Ely to Terry, or, as in this case, by the marshal undertaking to sell the naked legal title outstanding in Ely to his codefendant Terry. Taken in the strongest light for the defendant, the decree of January, 1894, declared the equitable title in Davis, leaving a naked legal title outstanding in Ely. Terry could acquire no other or better title than was in Ely at the time of his purchase, and, as we have seen, Davis could have maintained an action against Ely for possession of the land or for trespass thereon; so, the plaintiff, who has succeeded to his title may maintain an action against Terry for injury to his possession. Stith v. Lookabill, 78 N. C. 465.

Whether we place the plaintiff's right to maintain the action upon the theory of an estoppel against Terry or upon the view above suggested, that Ely had but a naked legal title, and that the purchaser under such sale took subject to all outstanding equities, we would be brought to the same result. In either aspect of the case, his honor's charge to the jury was correct, and the judgment must be affirmed.

AVERY v. STEWART.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. March 1, 1904.)

WRITTEN INSTRUMENTS — SECONDARY EVIDENCE — LOSS OF WRITTEN INSTRUMENT — SEARCH — QUESTION OF LAW — APPEAL — REVIEW — ACTION ON CONTRACT — BREACH — PLEADING — SUFFICIENCY OF ANSWER.

1. Testimony of a witness that he received a certain letter, and that it was lost, and he could not find it, was not a sufficient predicate for the introduction of secondary evidence of the contents of the letter, as it is necessary that there should be evidence of a diligent search.

2. The question as to the existence of facts rendering secondary evidence of the contents of a written instrument admissible is a question of law for the court, unless, in deciding the question, he would, in effect, decide the very matter in issue.

3. The decision of the trial court as to whether the facts authorized the admission of secondary evidence as to the contents of a written instrument is a question of law, reviewable on appeal.

4. Where the trial court rules that the facts are insufficient to warrant the introduction of secondary evidence of a written instrument, he must state such facts on request.

5. Findings of fact by the trial court cannot be reviewed on appeal.

6. Where on appeal nothing appears to the contrary, it will be presumed that the action of the trial court in admitting secondary evidence of the contents of a written instrument was based on proper proof of a diligent and fruitless search for the instrument.

7. A complaint alleged that plaintiff informed defendant of plaintiff's contract with a third person to purchase land from him, and requested defendant to buy the land for plaintiff, and allow him a specified time to pay the purchase money; that defendant agreed so to do, and purchased the land, but thereafter conveyed it to another, in violation of the agreement with plaintiff. On the trial the court submitted an issue as to whether defendant, prior to the conveyance of the land to him, contracted with plaintiff to buy the land for plaintiff. Held, that an issue as to whether defendant, knowing that the third person had contracted to sell the land to plaintiff, and before contracting with the third person agreed with plaintiff to buy the land for him, would have been more nearly conformable to the allegations of the complaint.

8. Code, § 243 (1), provides that an answer must consist of the general or specific denial of each material allegation controverted, or of information sufficient to form a belief. A complaint alleged that plaintiff informed defendant of plaintiff's contract with a third person for the purchase of land by plaintiff from the third person, and then contracted with defendant that the latter should buy the land from the third person for plaintiff, and allow plaintiff a specified time to pay for it. The answer merely stated that defendant was informed and believed that the allegations of the complaint were not true, and denied the same. Held, that the answer was insufficient to raise an issue, since whether defendant had been informed by plaintiff as to plaintiff's contract was a matter within defendant's knowledge, which should have been met by a direct denial.

9. The answer might be amended, in the discretion of the court, on proper application.

Appeal from Superior Court, Craven County; Moore, Judge.

Action by A. W. Avery against J. W. Stewart. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

O. H. Gulon, for appellant. D. L. Ward and W. D. McIver, for appellee.

WALKER, J. This action is brought to establish and enforce a parol trust. The plaintiff alleges that John Humphrey and his wife, being the owners of a tract of land in Craven county containing about 90 acres, contracted to sell the same to him at the price of $500, and that he, not then being able to pay the stipulated price, informed the defendant, Stewart, of his contract with the Humphreys, and requested the defendant to buy the land for him, and allow him three years to pay him the purchase money; that the defendant agreed to this proposal, with the proviso that the plaintiff should pay him $100 for the "accommodation," and the plaintiff assented to this proviso, and thereupon promised and agreed to pay to the defendant the $100 and the purchase money within three years, at 6 per cent. interest; that afterwards, on the 28th day of October, 1901, Humphrey and wife conveyed the land to the defendant, and on the 10th day of December of the same year the defendant, in violation of his agreement with the plaintiff, and of the trust assumed by him, conveyed the land to one W. J. Arnold, who has taken possession of the premises under his deed; that Arnold agreed to pay for the land much more than the defendant paid the Humphreys for the same, and more than the plaintiff was required to pay the defendant under their contract; and that Arnold has made certain payments upon the purchase money which he agreed to pay to the defendant, the amount of which payments is not set forth. The plaintiff prayed judgment that the defendant be required to account for the profit which he has realized from the sale to Arnold. The material allegations of the complaint were denied in the answer of the defendant. The court submitted to the jury two issues, as follows: "(1) Did John Humphrey and wife contract with the plaintiff to sell him the land, as alleged in the complaint? (2) Did the defendant, prior to the conveyance of the land to him by Humphrey and wife, contract with the plaintiff to buy the land described in the complaint for him?" There was evidence tending to sustain the plaintiff's allegations, and there was also evidence tending to show that the defendant bought the land from Humphrey without any understanding or agreement that the purchase was made for the plaintiff, though the allegation of the complaint, which is supported by proof, that the defendant bought the land from Humphrey with the knowledge of the latter's prior contract with the plaintiff, is not distinctly and positively denied by the defendant in his testimony. The jury, under the instructions of the court, returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, answering both issues "Yes," and upon the verdict judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, to which the defendant excepted and appealed.

At the close of the testimony the defendant moved to nonsuit the plaintiff, and, the motion being denied, he excepted. He also excepted to the refusal of the court to submit certain issues which were tendered by him, and to certain instructions given by the court to the jury; but these exceptions we do not deem it necessary to consider.

In order to prove that he made a contract with Humphrey to buy the land before the latter conveyed it to the defendant, the plaintiff proposed to show by his own testimony the contents of a letter or postal card which he had received from Humphrey, and which he alleged had been lost. This letter or postal card contained evidence of the fact that the plaintiff had an agreement with Humphrey to buy the land. The defendant objected to this testimony upon the ground, among others, that it had not been shown and did not appear that the plaintiff had made any search for the letter. In regard to the loss of the letter, the plaintiff testified: "I received a letter from Humphrey, which is lost. I cannot find it." This was all the testimony relating to the loss of the letter or postal card. The defendant's objection was overruled, and he excepted. This ruling was erroneous. There must be at least some evidence of a search for the paper alleged to be lost, before parol evidence of its contents can become competent. The rule of the law is: "If the instrument is lost, the party is required to give some evidence that such a paper once existed, though slight evidence is sufficient for this purpose, and that a bona fide and diligent search has been unsuccessfully made for it in the place where it was most likely to be found, if the nature of the case admits such proof. What degree of diligence in the search is necessary, it is not easy to define, as each case depends much on its peculiar circumstances; and the question whether the loss of the instrument is sufficiently proved to admit secondary evidence of its contents is to be determined by the court, and not by the jury. But it seems that, in general, the party is expected to show that he has in good faith exhausted, in a reasonable degree, all the sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case would naturally suggest, and which were accessible to him." 1 Greenleaf, Ev. (16th Ed.) §§ 553, 563b. In Bradner on Evidence, p. 130, § 18, the rule is thus stated: "The burden of showing the loss of a written instrument is upon the party seeking to introduce secondary evidence. He must establish its loss by proof that he has made diligent but unavailing search for the paper in places where it would be most likely to be found, and the degree of diligence necessary to be shown must depend upon the value and importance of the lost document. But it is sufficient if he has in good faith exhausted, in a reasonable degree, all the sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case would naturally suggest. If the instrument was executed in duplicate, due diligence must be shown to ascertain whether any counterpart exists, and, if so, to obtain it to be used upon the trial. Where it may be in either of two or more places, all the places should be searched; and, if it be in the custody of either of two or more persons, inquiry should be made of all of them. The search should have been made as recent as possible." Wharton says: "The production of proof satisfactory to the court that it is out of the power of the party to produce the document alleged to be lost, and of its prior existence and genuineness, is a prerequisite condition of the admission of secondary evidence of its contents. The question of such admissibility is for the court. Loss, like all evidential facts, can be only inferentially proved. In one sense, no instrument can be spoken of as lost that is not destroyed, or irrevocably out of the power of the party desiring to produce it. A check or promissory note may be carefully put away in a book, and the place of deposit forgotten. Every effort may be honestly made to find it; it is all the time in the seeker's library, in the very place where he put it; yet, after all, it may be hopelessly lost. It is not necessary, therefore, to prove exhaustively that the paper exists nowhere. It is sufficient if the party offering parol proof shows such diligence as is usual with good business men under the circumstances." Wharton on Evidence, §§ 141, 142.

The principle upon which secondary evidence is admitted to prove the contents of a lost document, though stated by the textwriters with some difference in phraseology, is not substantially changed thereby, and it has frequently been recognized, approved, and applied by this court. In one of the earliest cases relating to the question, this court said: "It is a rule of evidence that the best which the nature of the case will admit of must be produced. When that cannot be produced, and the nonproduction of it is accounted for, the next best evidence in the party's power is required. It is that rule of evidence which required the production of the bond upon the trial. In order to dispense with the production of it, it was incumbent on the plaintiff to give all the evidence reasonably in his power to prove the loss of it." Dumas v. Powell, 14 N. C. 104. See, also, Harven v. Hunter, 30 N. C. 464; Governor v. Barkley, 11 N. C. 20; McFarland v. Patterson, 4 N. C. 421; Harper v. Hancock, 28 N. C. 124; Smith v. Railroad, 68 N. C. 107; Gillis v. Railroad, 108 N. C. 441, 13 S. E. 11, 1019; Murphy v. McNiel, 19 N. C. 244; Threadgill v. White, 33 N. C. 591; McCracken v. McCrary, 50 N. C. 399.

The difficulty is not so much in determining or stating what the rule is, as in deciding how it should be applied. It is undeniably true that questions as to the existence of facts rendering secondary evidence of the contents of written instruments admissible are to be decided in the first instance by the court, unless in deciding such a question the judge would, in effect, decide the very matter in issue. Stephens' Dig. Ev. (May's Ed.) 118; Hendon v. Railroad, 125 N. C. 124, 34 S. E. 227. But while it is a preliminary question for the judge to pass upon, it is not one for him to decide according to his discretion, but according to the law. Important legal rights may depend upon the correct decision of such a question, and it cannot be that the law has left it to the irreviewable discretion of the presiding judge to say when parol evidence shall be competent in such cases. We think the law is the other way, and it has been held to be so in numerous cases decided by this court. In those cases where the court must decide prelimiinary questions as to the admissibility of evidence, such as whether a confession was voluntary, or whether a conspiracy or combination has been shown sufficiently to let in the declarations of the alleged conspirators, or whether a witness is competent as an expert, or whether the loss of a written instrument has been sufficiently shown to render competent parol evidence of its contents, this court, by Pearson, C. J., in all cases like those just mentioned, has thus clearly stated the rule: "It is the duty of the judge to decide the facts upon which depends the admissibility of testimony. State v. Dick, 60 N. C. 440 [86 Am. Dec. 439]. What facts amount to such threats or promises as make confessions not voluntary and admissible in evidence is a question of law, and the decision of the judge in the court below can be reviewed by this court. So, what evidence the judge should allow to be offered to him to establish these facts is a question of law. So whether there be any evidence tending to show that confessions were not made voluntarily is a question of law. But whether the evidence is true and proves these facts, and whether the witnesses giving testimony to the court touching the facts are entitled to credit, or not, and, in case of a conflict of testimony, which witness should be believed by the court, are questions of fact to be decided by the judge; and his decision cannot be reviewed in this court, which is confined to questions of law." State v. Andrew, 61 N. C. 211; State v. Dula, Id.

It is the duty of the judge to state the facts found by him from the evidence, if requested to do so by the party excepting to his ruling (Holden v. Purefoy, 108 N. C. 163, 12 S. E. 848; Millhiser v. Balsley, 108 N. C. 433, 11 S. E. 314), and his findings of fact cannot be reviewed in this court; but, if he does state the facts, either of his own motion, or at the request of a party, this court can review his conclusion which is based upon the finding, for this presents necessarily a question of law. We are, of course, aware of the decision of this court in Gillis v. Railroad, 108 N. C. 441, 13 S. E. 11, 1019, that "it is within the sound discretion of the court to determine what is sufficient evidence of the loss or destruction of an original paper to make testimony as to its contents competent," but to this statement of the law we are unable to give our assent, as we think it is not correct on principle or authority. It is true, as stated by the court in that case, that we will always assume, when nothing appears to the contrary, that the court, in admitting secondary evidence of the contents of a document, acted upon plenary proof that a sufficiently diligent but fruitless search had been made. This is so, not because the law does not require sufficient or plenary proof of the loss of the document, nor because the court's decision upon the matter is not the subject of review, but because, as neither the evidence-nor the finding of facts is stated in the record, this court must necessarily affirm the ruling, not for the reason that it is right, but because we are unable to see that it is wrong, and for the further reason (perhaps a correlative of the other) that error in the rulings of the court is never presumed, and he who alleges error must show it. The party excepting has the right to require the facts to be found by the court and stated in the record (Holden v. Purefoy, supra), and, if he fails to insist upon this right, he, of course, waives it, and must abide the consequences. For these reasons, we do not think, because it was decided in Mauney v. Crowell, 84 N. C. 314, cited by the court in Gillis v. Railroad, supra, that, where there is no finding of the facts, the ruling of the court is conclusive, it thereby recognized "the discretionary power of the court to pass finally upon the question as to whether proper search had been made." If there is sent with the record the evidence of the loss, instead of the judge's findings of fact, this court will consider the evidence in the most favorable light for the appellee (Holden v. Purefoy, supra), but will, of course, pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence to show that proper search has been made. While the court in Gillis v. Railroad, supra, says, "Where the facts upon which the nisi prius judge acted are found, it is competent for this court to review his ruling, and determine whether the testimony was sufficient, in law, to justify his conclusion," the general trend of the decision in that case is that the matter lies solely within the discretion of the presiding judge; and it was so understood and construed by one, at least, of the dissenting justices, whose view is sustained by the reference of the court to the case of Bonds v. Smith, 106 N. C. 565, 11 S. E. 326, in which it is said that "It is always within the sound discretion of the judge who tries a case to determine what is sufficient proof of the loss or destruction of an original paper to make evidence of its contents competent." There are some expressions in the opinion which we think may lead to misapprehension of what we conceive to be the true rule, unless they are limited somewhat in their scope and effect. If it was intended to decide that, when the facts are found by a judge and stated in the record, his ruling is the subject of review, but, when no evidence or finding of facts appears in the case, this court will assume either that sufficient facts were found, or that there was plenary evidence of the essential facts, we fully concur in the decision, and, thus restricted, we believe that it is correct and sustained by authority; but if it was intended to lay down the rule, as the dissenting justices seemed to understand that it did, that the question is one that is addressed solely to the discretion of the court, we are unable to adopt that view of the law, and to that extent the case is disapproved. It appears in that case that the court actually passed upon the sufficiency of the testimony to establish the loss of the letters, as matter of law, and ruled that it was sufficient for the purpose of letting in parol evidence of their contents. There was evidence that the plaintiff generally kept the letters in his trunk, but sometimes in his wife's trunk. He had made search only in his own trunk, and it was held, as we have said, to be a sufficient search. We cannot assent to this ruling, as we think the law requires that search should have been made in both places, for the party who proposes to produce the parol evidence of the contents of the instrument alleged to be lost must have exhausted, in a reasonable degree, all sources of information and means of discovery which the nature of the case would naturally suggest, and which were accessible to him. 1 Greenleaf, Ev. § 558; Blair v. Brown, 116 N. C. 631, 21 S. E. 434; Simpson v. Dail, 3 Wall. 460, 18 L. Ed. 265; Johnson v. Arnwine, 42 N. J. Law, 451, 36 Am. Rep. 527; Richards v. Lewis, 5 Eng. Law & Eq. 400; Cook v. Hunt, 24 Ill. 550. Some of those cases are, in respect to their facts, like the case of Gillis v. Railroad, supra. We are of the opinion that the decision in the latter case, so far as the court held that the judge merely exercises his discretion in passing upon the sufficiency of the search for the lost paper, is opposed to the rule as stated and applied in the cases decided by this court, and which we have already cited. The case of Gillis v. Railroad cannot be distinguished in principle from the case of Dumas v. Powell and Harven v. Hunter, supra. See, also, Bligh v. Wellesly, 2 C. & P. 400 (12 E. C. L. 189).

In our case the witness testified that the paper was lost, and he could not find it. This was all the evidence, and we must pass upon its sufficiency, as matter of law, to show that a proper search was made for the original; and we have concluded, after a careful review of the authorities, that it was not sufficient for that purpose. The witness does not testify distinctly or positively that he ever made any search. If there was a search, the fact is not stated, but left merely to inference, and it does not, therefore, appear what kind of search was made. As to this important matter, we can do nothing but conjecture.

There is another objection to the proof of loss: The fact to be found by the court is that the paper is lost, and cannot be found or produced; and the witness, instead of testifying as to what kind of search he had made, so that the court could find the ultimate fact of loss, testified directly to the fact itself, and thereby substitutes his opinion or judgment upon the question for that of the court. This certainly is not a compliance with the rule. In order to show the loss of the paper, it was necessary that a diligent search should have been made for it where it was most likely to be found (Simpson v. Dall, supra), and this must be shown by evidence, and not by the mere opinion of the witness, nor by his deduction from the facts as they may have appeared to him, but which were not disclosed to the court.

In Parks v. Dunkle, 3 Watts & S. 294, the court said: "It is indispensable that the legal proof required to warrant secondary evidence should be satisfactorily made out. Here all that the defendant produced afterwards was the oath of Dunkle that he received the letter spoken of by Messrs. Smith, and it was lost. This we think was not sufficient. The party relying on secondary evidence must go further, and show what became of the original, and that due diligence was made to find it, or, at all events, ought to furnish reasons for believing that the document is irretrievably lost, and not merely mislaid, and still within the power of the party to recover by an exertion of proper diligence. A thing is often, in common parlance, lost, and yet found on a search. More especially is this incumbent on the party when he has himself had the document in his custody, and is called on to show that it cannot be produced." In Justice v. Luther, 94 N. C. 793, the defendant proposed to prove the declaration of a party who was shown to have had the custody of the paper in question that it was lost, in order to introduce secondary evidence of its contents. The evidence was excluded, not only because it was hearsay, but for the further reason that it was not in its nature reasonably sufficient to account for the absence of the original. Blair v. Brown, supra. In Harven v. Hunter, supra, the court says: "The case does not profess to set forth the affidavit itself, but its contents. It states, not that he did not have the deeds in his possession, but simply that the affiant did not know where they were, and that he had made due inquiry for them, and was unable to procure them. It may be that his possession is substantially and sufficiently denied, but the affidavit ought to have set out what inquiries he had made, where, and of whom, that the court might judge whether they were sufficient." In Lyon v. Washburn, 3 Colo. 204, the court says: "To show, in general terms, that a writing is lost, without showing search or inquiry for it, has never been regarded as sufficient to admit secondary evidence of its contents." In McFarland v. Patterson, 4 N. C. 423, it is said: "The case now before the court stands upon the long-established rule that parol evidence cannot be admitted to prove the contents of the written contract, unless it shall be clearly made to appear that the written contract is lost by time or accident. The plaintiff not having shown that the written contract was lost in either of the above ways, he should not have been permitted to prove the same by parol."

The counsel for the plaintiff contended that the ruling upon this evidence was immaterial, as the finding upon the second issue was sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a judgment. This may, or not, be so; but, however it may be, the issue certainly does not embrace all of the facts upon which the plaintiff originally relied for a recovery, and we deem it best not to decide what the rights of plaintiff are, if he has any, until his case has been fully developed.

As the case must go back for a new trial, we would suggest that the second issue be amended so as to read substantially as follows: "Did the defendant, knowing that Humphrey and wife had contracted to sell the land to the plaintiff, and before contracting with Humphrey for the purchase of the land, and before receiving a deed therefor, agree with the plaintiff to buy the land for him, as alleged in the complaint?" This issue, it seems to us, more nearly conforms to the particular allegations of the complaint than the one submitted at the last trial, and there was evidence to support an affirmative finding upon it.

It may be well to call attention to the fact that the allegations of the third section of the complaint are not sufficiently denied in the answer. The plaintiff alleges in the third section of his complaint that he informed the defendant of his agreement with Humphrey to buy the land from him, and then contracted with the defendant that the latter should buy the land from Humphrey for the plaintiff, and allow him (the plaintiff) three years to pay for it, and also to pay the additional sum of $100, which the defendant was to receive as the consideration for his undertaking. In the answer the defendant merely states that "he is informed and believes that the allegations of the third article are not true, and therefore denies the same." Whether he had been informed by the plaintiff of the Humphrey contract was a matter which was necessarily within his personal knowledge, and the allegation in regard to it should have been met by a direct denial, or at least the statement of a "want of recollection" of it, if he intended to raise an issue in regard to it. Gas Co. v. Mfg. Co., 91 N. C. 74. The answer in this respect was not sufficient, under Code, § 243 (1), to raise an issue. It may be amended, in the discretion of the court, upon proper application, if the defendant wishes to contest the matters alleged by the plaintiff.

There was error in the ruling of the court below upon the evidence, for which there must be another trial. New trial.

BOSSARD v. VAUGHN.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 18, 1904.)

CLAIM AND DELIVERY—VERDICT.

1. A verdict in claim and delivery is sufficient as to identity where there was a more particular description of the property in the pleadings to which the verdict will be referred.

2. A verdict in claim and delivery, fixing the right of the plaintiff to have the property, or its value, if he could not find it, and the right of defendant to deliver the property, rather than pay the value, if he chose to do it, is in full compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 77.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Sumter County; Gage, Judge.

Action by Wesley Bossard against Edward Vaughn. From judgment of the circuit court sustaining the judgment for plaintiff of a magistrate's court, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. D. Jennings, for appellant. Lee & Moise, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action of claim and delivery was instituted in a magistrate's court to recover possession of property described as one white and black cow and one red calf. The property remained in the possession of the defendant. The verdict was, "We find for the plaintiff for property in question, one cow and calf, or the value thereof, twenty dollars." The defendant appealed to the circuit court on the ground that the verdict was not in conformity to the statute, which provides: "The judgment for the plaintiff may be for the possession or for the recovery of the possession or the value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had and of damages for the detention. If the property have been delivered to the plaintiff and the defendant claim a return thereof, judgment for the defendant may be for a return of the property or the value thereof, in case a return cannot be had, and damages for taking and withholding the same. * * * In all actions for the recovery of the possession of personal property, as herein provided, if the property shall not have been delivered to plaintiff, or the defendant by answer shall claim a return thereof, the magistrate or jury shall assess the value thereof, and the injury sustained by the prevailing party by reason of the taking or detention thereof, and the magistrate shall render judgment accordingly with costs and disbursements." Code Civ. Proc. § 77. From an order of the circuit court adjudging the verdict to be sufficient, the defendant appeals to this court.

As to the first position—that the verdict does not sufficiently identify the property—it is sufficient to say there was no issue of identity, but, on the contrary, the property was very clearly identified by the pleadings, to which the verdict will be referred.

The section of the Code of Civil Procedure above quoted relates to actions of claim and delivery in magistrates' courts, but in the last clause almost the same language is used as in section 283 of the Code, which provides the form of verdicts in such actions in the court of common pleas. The verdict was in the alternative, and in it the jury assessed the value of the property. Thus was fixed the right of plaintiff to have the property, or its value, if he could not find it, and the right of the defendant to deliver the property rather than pay the value, if he chose to do so. The verdict in this case therefore met all the ends of the legislation prescribing the form of the verdict as stated by Chief Justice McIver in construing section 283 in Finley v. Cudd, 42 S. C. 127, 20 S. E. 32. See, also, Bardin v. Drafts, 10 S. E. 493, and Parish v. Smith, 66 S. C. 432, 45 S. E. 16.

The judgment of the court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

STATE v. STILL et al.

(68 S. C. 37)

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 8, 1903.)

ADULTERY—PROOF OF MARRIAGE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In a prosecution for adultery, marriage may be proved by general repute or declarations of the parties.

2. Where a judge, in stating the issues to the jury, erroneously states that certain facts are admitted by the defendants, in order to make such error the basis of an exception his attention should be called to it at the time.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Barnwell County; Gary, Judge.

Lavinia Still and J. M. Lewis were convicted of crime, and appeal. Affirmed.

J. O. Patterson and C. A. Best, for appellants. Asst. Atty. Gen. Townsend, for the State.

GARY, A. J. The defendants were convicted of adultery, and have appealed to this court upon exceptions, the first two of which raise the question whether it was competent for the state to prove the fact of marriage by general reputation and the declarations of the parties. The defendants contended that "marriage, in a criminal action, cannot be proved by hearsay evidence, but that the witnesses who were present are the proper parties to prove it by, if there was ever any marriage." The rule of evidence in cases of adultery is the same as that in bigamy, and, whatever may be the rule elsewhere, it is settled in this state that the fact of marriage may be proved by general reputation and the declarations of the parties. State v. Briton, 4 McCord, 256; State v. Hilton, 3 Rich. Law. 434, 45 Am. Dec. 783. This principle is also sustained by numerous other decisions, among which may be mentioned Miles v. United States, 103 U. S. 311, 26 L. Ed. 481, and Wolverton v. State (Ohio) 47 Am. Dec. 373.

The next assignment of error is: "Because his honor erred in charging the jury that 'the defendants at the bar admit they are married.' Whereas it is respectfully submitted that this was erroneous, as the defendants did not testify or make any admissions." This will be considered in connection with the remaining assignment of error, which is as follows: "Because his honor erred in charging the jury: 'Was Lavinia Still lawfully married at the time that she and her codefendant married?' Whereas we respectfully submit that this was charging upon an assumed fact, which was erroneous, and calculated to mislead the jury, in that it indicated that the fact of the marriage was established by evidence." If, in stating to the jury the issues involved, the presiding judge erred in supposing that the defendants admitted they were married, it was their duty to have called the alleged error to his attention, and, having failed to do so, they cannot make his charge in this respect the basis of an appeal to this court. We reach this conclusion with less reluctance, as the jury might have found very properly from the testimony that the defendants were guilty of adultery, even if they were married, provided they also found that Lavinia Still and Bud Still were previously married. All the exceptions are overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

(68 S. C. 55)

CARSON v. SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 26, 1903.)

APPEAL—EXCEPTIONS—INJURY TO SERVANT—COMPLAINT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—PROXIMATE CAUSE—OPINION EVIDENCE—NONSUIT—KNOWLEDGE OF DEFECTS—RAILROADS—AUTOMATIC COUPLERS—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—INSTRUCTIONS—JOINT TORT.

1. An exception that the court erred in overruling a demurrer to the complaint, as not stating a cause of action, is too general.

2. Where, in an action for injuries to a servant, the complaint alleges negligence in the master in furnishing appliances, and negligence in his servants in using them, it states a cause of action of joint and several negligence.

3. A servant who disobeys a rule of the master in compliance with the instruction of the representative of the master on the spot is not guilty of contributory negligence.

4. Where a complaint states several causes of injury, it was a matter for the jury to determine whether any or all of the acts of the defendant, viewed jointly or separately, was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

5. In an action for injuries to a servant, the opinion of a witness as to whether the accident would have happened if plaintiff had reported a defect in the machinery to the master, is incompetent.

6. Where a complaint in an action for personal injuries alleges several acts of negligence, it is error to grant a nonsuit on failure to prove that one of them was the proximate cause of the injury.

7. In an action for injuries to a railroad employé, evidence held to show that a servant was not guilty of contributory negligence in going between the cars to couple them, under instructions of the conductor, in disobedience of the rules of the company.

8. Where an action is brought for a joint and several tort, and there is evidence as to the negligence of one defendant, a nonsuit cannot be granted.

9. In an action for injuries caused by defects in machinery, knowledge by the servant of the defects is no defense, under Const. 1895, art. 9, § 15.

10. The circuit court, in the trial of a case, is bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court.

11. Under Act Cong. March 2, 1893, c. 198, § 1, 27 Stat. 53 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 8174], providing that carriers engaged in interstate commerce shall equip their cars with automatic couplers, if defendant railroad company was a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and the cars were not equipped with such couplers, whereby plaintiff was injured, defendant was liable.

12. A railroad company must furnish an employé with safe appliances, and see that they are kept in proper repair; and, where the duty is negligently performed, and the employé suffers injury thereby, the railroad company is liable.

13. The risk which a railway employé assumes when he enters the employment does not extend to risks by reason of defective machinery.

14. An instruction that, where a servant's work is done in the presence and under the direction of a conductor of a train, it is equivalent to an assurance by the master that the servant may safely do the work required of him, and is not bound to search for danger, is not erroneous, as a charge on the facts.

15. The granting of an instruction against arriving at a quotient verdict is in the discretion of the trial court.

16. Where, in an action by a railroad employé for personal injuries, the complaint alleges a joint and several tort, consisting of the defective appliances and negligence on the part of the servants, and the jury finds in favor of the servants, but against the master, the verdict should not be set aside.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Greenville County; Watts, Judge.

Action by J. L. Carson against the Southern Railway Company, J. C. Arwood, and J. D. Miller. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Southern Railway Company appeals. Affirmed.

T. P. Cothran, for appellant. McCullough & McSwain, for respondent.

POPE, C. J. This action was commenced in the court of common pleas for Greenville county, in this state, to recover damages on account of personal injuries received by the plaintiff at Converse, S. C., August 16th, in the year 1902, to wit, the plaintiff's arm was crushed between two cars (while in the service of the defendant) which he was attempting to couple, and was amputated. The defendant demurred to the complaint because it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This was overruled. The defendant objected to testimony, which objection was overruled. The defendant moved for a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's testimony in chief. This motion was overruled. The defendant objected to the charge of the circuit judge. The defendant moved for a new trial, which motion was denied. The defendant then moved in arrest of judgment, and this motion was refused. The defendant then, and lastly, made a motion for the circuit judge to direct a judgment in its favor on the verdict. This was denied. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff for $8,500. After entry of judgment, the defendant appealed, alleging error in all the matters or steps in the trial above enumerated. To understand these exceptions, it may be stated that the defendant has numbered its exceptions from 1 to 48, inclusive, and we will treat these exceptions in the same way. Inasmuch as the first eight exceptions complain of the order of the circuit judge overruling the demurrer, it will be proper to reproduce the complaint, which is as follows:

"(1) That the defendant Southern Railway Company is a railway corporation chartered under the laws of the state of Virginia, and as such is, and was at the times hereinafter mentioned, doing business in the counties of Spartanburg, Greenville, and other counties of the state of South Carolina, as a common carrier of passengers, and also of freight; running its railroad track and trains, both passenger and freight, in and through the said counties of Spartanburg, Greenville, and other counties in the said state.

"(2) That the defendants J. O. Arwood and J. D. Miller are now, and were at the dates hereafter mentioned, citizens and residents of Greenville county, state of South Carolina.

"(3) That the plaintiff is a resident of the county and state aforesaid, is thirty-five years of age, and has a wife and four children dependent upon his daily labor for support; his eldest child being twelve years of age.

"(4) That since December 8, 1901, plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant Southern Railway Company, and was on that day assigned the duties of flagman, and on the 15th day of August, 1902, was assigned by defendant to duty on a freight train belonging to the defendant Southern Railway Company, in charge of its agents and employees, known as second section of No. 43, and running between Spencer, North Carolina, and Greenville, South Carolina, and plaintiff was assigned the duty of flagman on said freight train.

"(5) That plaintiff entered upon and performed the duties of such position, and on the 16th day of August, 1902, was ordered by the conductor in charge of said freight train, and whose orders he was required to obey, to do the work of a brakeman on the said freight train; the regular brakeman on the said train having been assigned other duties.

"(6) That while the said freight car was at the station known as Converse, in Spartanburg county, state aforesaid, the right arm of plaintiff was crushed by a collision of two freight boxes, whereby plaintiff suffered great and excruciating pain and mental anguish, and, as a result, lost entirely the said right arm, which had to be amputated, and that said collision and injury which plaintiff sustained by reason thereof were due to the joint and concurrent negligence, carelessness, and fault of the defendants, and to their joint and concurrent recklessness, carelessness, willfulness, and wanton disregard of the plaintiff's rights and safety, in the following manner, to wit: That between Charlotte, North Carolina, and Greenville, South Carolina, at the said station of Converse, said freight train of the said defendant Southern Railway Company stopped for the purpose of shifting to the side track of the said defendant Southern Railway Company, which side track was upon a steep grade, and near the main line of defendant company, five freight cars or boxes. That there were at that time standing upon the side track three other freight cars or boxes, and, in order to prevent the said cars or boxes from rolling down the said steep grade, it was necessary to couple the said three cars or boxes to be shifted and left upon the said side track, and this plaintiff was directed by the defendants to make the said coupling. That the defendant J. O. Arwood was conductor, and the defendant J. D. Miller was engineer, upon the said freight train. That the said freight boxes or cars were provided with what is commonly known as automatic couplers, and, when said couplers are in good condition, it is unnecessary for one, in order to make the said coupling, to go between the said cars; but the said couplers worked with a pin and iron crank, the handle of which iron crank projects to the side of the said boxes or cars, and the said pin by which the said cars are coupled is manipulated by using the said crank. That after having effectually made one coupling between the said cars, as directed by the defendants, plaintiff approached to make the other coupling, as directed by the defendants; and before doing so he warned the defendants to hold said car steady until he (the plaintiff) was ready to make such coupling, and until plaintiff should so signify. That, when plaintiff reached the said car, then to be coupled, he ascertained that the coupling pin was out of, and lying upon, the drawhead of the coupler, and thereby ascertained that the said coupler was out of order, in that when the said coupler is in proper condition there is what is known as a cotter pin running through the said coupling pin at the lower end, thereby preventing it from being drawn entirely out of the said drawhead, and the defendants knew, or ought to have known, that the said coupling pin was out of order; and this fact made it necessary for the plaintiff to go between the said cars for the purpose of adjusting the said pin with his hand, and to carry out the order of the defendants, since he could not, while it was in that position, adjust it with the iron crank above described; and this plaintiff went between the said cars for the purpose of adjusting the said pin in order to make the said coupling, and as he was directed by the said defendants, when he heard the cars of said train in motion and knocking together before he had effected the said coupling, or had sufficient time to do so, and, in order to save himself from being crushed between the said cars, the plaintiff attempted to get out from between the said cars on which he was engaged in the work of coupling, and, as he did so, his right arm was caught between the dead blocks of the said freight cars, between which he was standing, and was horribly mangled. That, at the time plaintiff heard the cars in motion, he had only time to go between the cars, and had placed his left hand upon the iron crank, and his right hand upon the pin, for the purpose of placing it in the proper position, and had not had time to place the pin in proper position, or to couple the said cars. That the defendants, by their joint and concurrent negligence, and by their joint and concurrent carelessness, recklessness, wantonness, negligence, and willfulness, backed the said engine, to which was attached the said freight cars, without any signal or warning from this plaintiff, and without giving this plaintiff time to effect the coupling of the said cars, and without giving this plaintiff any notice or warning whatsoever that the said engine and cars were to be moved.

"(7) That, in consequence of the said injury, it was necessary to amputate plaintiff's right arm just below the elbow, and in consequence of the said injury and amputation plaintiff has suffered great mental anguish and pain, and has been deprived of the use of his strong right arm for the support of himself and family, all to his damage $15,000."

The exceptions are as follows, as relating to the demurrer:

"(1) The error of the presiding judge in overruling the demurrer to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

"(2) Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the first ground of demurrer to the complaint, which was as follows: 'The complaint does not show negligence on the part of the defendants, or either of them.'

"(3) Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the second ground of demurrer to the complaint, which was as follows: 'The complaint shows contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff.'

"(4) Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the third ground of demurrer to the complaint, which was as follows: 'So far as the allegation of negligence in regard to the absence of the cotter pin (defective machinery appliances) is concerned, the complaint does not show that the injury complained of resulted therefrom as a proximate cause thereof.'

"(5) Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the fourth ground of demurrer to the complaint, which was as follows: 'So far as the allegation of negligence in regard to the backing of the engine without signal, warning, or notice is concerned, the complaint shows that this was the act of the engineer or conductor, or both. It was therefore the negligence (if any at all) of the servant or servants of the railway company, for which the railway company, in a proper action, may be held responsible. This action, however, is based upon an allegation of joint and concurrent tort on the part of master and servant. To constitute such a tort, it must appear that the master and servant each had a direct share therein; that they each actually participated therein. The imputed liability of the master for the wrong of the servant, in which the master has not participated, and which he neither authorized nor ratified, does not, in connection with the personal liability of the servant for the wrong, present a case of joint and concurrent tort.'

"(6) Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the fifth ground of demurrer to the complaint, which was as follows: 'The complaint alleges an act of negligence on the part of the master (failure to provide suitable appliances), and an act of negligence on the part of the servant or servants (backing the engine without notice, signal, or warning). It does not charge any participation by either in the negligence of the other, and therefore does not present a case of joint and concurrent tort.'

"(7) Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the sixth ground of demurrer to the complaint, which was as follows: 'The principles contended for in specification 4 are particularly applicable to the charge of joint willful tort. The master cannot be held liable jointly with the servant for the willful tort of the servant unless the master authorized or ratified it.'

"(8) Error of the presiding judge in not sustaining the seventh ground of demurrer to the complaint, which was as follows: 'The complaint alleges that the acts of the defendants complained of were both negligent and willful. This is an impossibility. Negligence and willfulness are the opposites of each other.'

(1) This exception is too general. It is therefore overruled.

(2) It seems to us that the allegations of the complaint directly charge negligence to the defendants, both jointly and severally. It alleges directly that the master erred in keeping the plaintiff supplied with proper machinery, and in keeping such machinery in proper repair. The conductor was acting directly for the master when he failed to notice the want of any signal from the servant before ordering its train to move back. This exception is overruled.

(3) No doubt, the exception relies at this point upon the failure in the plaintiff to carry out the rule of defendant which forbids the servant from going between the cars to couple cars. But the allegations of the complaint cure this apparent difficulty, when the presence and directions of the conductor as vice principal are remembered. This exception is overruled.

(4) A little reflection will show that this exception cannot be sustained. The complaint in paragraph 6 is careful so to link the causes of the injury that the absence of the cotter pin from its proper place is not made the causa causans of his injuries. It was a matter for the jury to determine whether any or all of the acts of the defendants, viewed jointly or separately, was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. The quotations of authorities may include Pickens v. S. C. & G. R. R., 54 S. C. 498, 32 S. E. 567; Marsh v. Western Union Tel. Co., 65 S. C. 430, 43 S. E. 953.

The fifth, sixth, and seventh exceptions are conclusively answered by the recent decisions of Schumpert v. R. R., 65 S. C. 332, 43 S. E. 813; Gardner v. Southern Ry. Co., 65 S. C. 341, 43 S. E. 816. The appellant, in his argument, says: "They appear to be concluded, so far as this court is concerned. * * * We do not waive them." It declines to argue these exceptions, and we think very properly so. These exceptions are overruled.

(8) The appellant concedes that this exception is concluded by the case of Schumpert v. R. Co., supra, and formally abandons the same. Hence we sustain the circuit judge in overruling the demurrer.

2. The single exception as to alleged error of the circuit judge in sustaining plaintiff's objection to the question asked plaintiff by defendant is in these words: "(9) Error of the presiding judge in sustaining plaintiff's objection to the following question asked the plaintiff by defendants' counsel: 'Don't you know that, if you had reported that [fact that the pin was out of order] to the conductor, this accident would not have occurred?' The question was competent and relevant. It was plaintiff's duty, under rule 12, to report said defect, and his knowledge of the rule and its purpose had material bearing upon defendants' plea of contributory negligence." This exception cannot be sustained. Appellant did not argue it. It was purely asking for an opinion. How did witness know what effect such a report by him to the conductor would produce? It is overruled.

3. We will next consider the group of exceptions relating to the nonsuit that was refused.

"(10) Error of presiding judge in overruling the first ground of defendant's motion for a nonsuit, as follows: 'The alleged negligence in regard to the absence of the cotter pin (defective machinery appliances) is not shown, but any testimony tending to establish that fact, to have been a proximate cause of the injury complained of.'

"(11) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the second ground of defendant's motion for a nonsuit, as follows: 'The testimony shows that the proximate cause of the injury was the plaintiff's voluntary and unnecessary exposure of his person to the moving cars.'

"(12) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the third ground of defendant's motion for nonsuit, as follows: 'The complaint alleges the plaintiff's injuries were caused by the joint and concurrent tort of the defendants. The evidence does not tend to sustain this allegation. On the contrary, if it tends to show any actionable negligence, it is the negligence of either the engineer or conductor, for which, in a proper action, the defendant company may be held liable, but which does not make out a case of joint and concurrent tort.'

"(13) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the fourth ground of the defendants' motion for a nonsuit, as follows: 'The plaintiff having alleged a joint and concurrent tort of all the defendants, the defendant Southern Railway Company has been deprived of the privilege of removing this cause to the United States court. He should be required to prove the facts alleged. To allow him to proceed in the state court without some evidence of this fact would deprive the defendant of a substantial right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.'

"(14) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the fifth ground of defendants' motion for a nonsuit, as follows: 'To allow the plaintiff, after alleging a joint and concurrent tort by the railway company and its servants, to recover without evidence of such joint and concurrent tort, but simply on evidence of a negligent act of the servant, in which the master did not participate, and which he neither authorized nor ratified, would deprive the defendant railway company of its property without due process of law, contrary to amendment 14, Constitution of the United States, for this reason: It would deprive said company of the right of reimbursement from the defaulting servant, which would otherwise exist.'

"(15) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the sixth ground of defendants' motion for a nonsuit, as follows: 'The defendant company is not liable in punitive damages for a willful tort of one of its servants. To hold otherwise would deprive said company of its property without due process of law, contrary to the Constitution of South Carolina, and article 14 of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States.'

"(16) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the seventh ground of defendants' motion for a nonsuit, as follows: 'Even if the evidence tends to show an act of negligence on the part of the master (defective appliance), and an act of negligence on the part of the servant or servants (backing the train without notice, etc.), it does not tend to show any participation by either in the act of the other, and therefore does not present a case of joint and concurrent tort.'

"(17) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the eighth ground of the defendants' motion for a nonsuit, as follows: 'The testimony does not tend to show any negligence, as alleged, on the part of the engineer; and even if it shows negligence, as alleged, on the part of the company, the action being based upon an alleged joint concurrent tort of the defendants, it must for this reason fail.'

"(18) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the ninth ground of the defendants' motion for a nonsuit, as follows: 'The testimony does not tend to show any negligence on the part of the engineer.'

"(19) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the tenth ground of the defendants' motion for a nonsuit, as follows: 'The evidence shows that the defect in the coupler was known by the plaintiff before he attempted to go in between the cars.'

"(20) Error of the presiding judge in holding: 'I am bound by the decision of the Supreme Court of this state, and I will overrule the motion for a nonsuit.'"

Before passing upon these exceptions, it might be well to state that the appellant considers that the exceptions numbered 12, 13, 14, 16, and 17, including, as they do, the question, in various phases, of the joint liability of master and servant for the single tort of the servant, are, or seem to be, concluded, so far as this court is concerned, by the recent decisions of Schumpert v. Railway Co., supra, and Gardner v. Railway Co., supra. The appellant does not waive them, but has declined to argue them. This is a wise step on its part, for we hold that these decisions, so recently made, are conclusive as to these exceptions. So, therefore, we overrule said exceptions numbered 12, 13, 14, 16, and 17. We will now examine the remaining exceptions, under the head of nonsuit:

(10) We have already held that, under the allegations of the complaint, the absence of the cotter pin was not alone, of itself, the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. It was to be taken by the jury, under the testimony here offered by the plaintiff, as one of the elements of the proximate cause of such injuries. There was testimony offered by the plaintiff in this matter. Hence the circuit judge was precluded, under many decisions of this court on the subject of nonsuits, from granting the nonsuit as here suggested. Exception overruled.

(11) We do not regard that the testimony shows that the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries was the plaintiff's voluntary and unnecessary exposure of his person to the moving cars. We distinctly remember that the testimony tended to show that there were co-operating causes for these injuries. It was shown, or, rather, there was testimony offered tending to show, that the conductor ordered this servant (the plaintiff) to couple those cars; that such conductor, in this matter, represented the master; that the servant called to such conductor to hold fast the train until he signaled; that this servant did not signal the conductor to move the train; that it was under these circumstances that the train was moved so that the two cars bumped against each other, thus causing his injuries; that, when the cotter pin was out of its place, it would be necessary for a servant to go between the cars to arrange it; that it was necessary to go between the cars to open the instrument by which the coupling was to be made. This exception is overruled.

(15) We think the decisions of the state hold an opposing view. It has been held in this state that the master is liable for the willful torts of its servants, without the master authorizing or ratifying such torts. It ought to exist when these torts occur while such servants are carrying out the directions or plans of the master. Cobb v. R. Co., 37 S. C. 194, 15 S. E. 878; Skipper v. Clifton Manufacturing Co., 58 S. C. 143, 36 S. E. 509. And there are other cases to the same effect. This exception is overruled.

(18) It must be remembered that the complaint charged a joint and several tort. There was testimony as to what the engineer did. He certainly moved the engine. Being testimony in the case connecting the engineer with the wrong alleged by the plaintiff, it was not the circuit judge's duty to pass upon the sufficiency of such testimony. This exception is overruled.

(19) Suppose the plaintiff saw that the cotter pin was out of its place; the circuit judge was bound by the case of Youngblood v. R. Co., 60 S. C., at page 22, 38 S. E. 236, 85 Am. St. Rep. 824, where it is said: "Furthermore, the only fact upon which the defendant relied to show that the plaintiff did not act with due care was that he voluntarily operated the appliances after the knowledge of their unsafe condition, and, as we have stated, this could not defeat his action." Besides, it is provided in the Constitution of 1895: "Knowledge by any employé injured of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways or appliances, shall be no defense to an action for injury caused thereby." Section 15, art. 9. Besides, a railroad employé may recover for injuries caused by the carelessness of a fellow servant directing him. Bussey v. R. Co., 52 S. C. 438, 30 S. E. 477; Wilson v. Ry. Co., 51 S. C. 79, 28 S. E. 91; Bodie v. R. Co., 61 S. C. 468, 39 S. E. 715. This exception is overruled.

(20) The circuit judge was quite correct in declaring that he was bound by the decision of the Supreme Court. Being the court of last resort in this state, as is the Supreme Court, its decisions govern the members of that court, and all other persons in authority, as well as other people. This exception is overruled.

We have thus passed upon all the phases of nonsuit as here presented. We sustain the circuit judge in refusing such motion.

4. We will next consider the group of exceptions relating to the alleged errors of the circuit judge in his charge to the jury:

"(21) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows: 'The law requires them [railroads] to keep suitable appliances for running such trains, and to keep them in good condition. I charge you that any railroad engaged in running trains from state to state, under the law, they are required to have automatic coupling; and I charge you, further, that they are required to keep these appliances in good order—that is, in safe and suitable order.' The error consisting in this: First. The duty of a master to a servant is to exercise ordinary care in keeping machinery and appliances in order. The charge of the judge imposes this duty absolutely upon the railway company, practically making it a guarantor of the safe and suitable condition of the coupling apparatus. Second. The car upon which the defective coupler was, is shown by the testimony to have been an empty car on the side track, not used to move interstate commerce. The act of Congress, therefore, did not apply to it. (This subdivision is an amendment to the exceptions, and was allowed by respondent upon condition that it be accompanied with the statement that the point was not raised before the circuit judge that the act of Congress did not apply to the cars on side track.)

"(22) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows (the same being No. 1 of the plaintiff's request): 'By an act of Congress it is provided [Act March 2, 1893, c. 196, § 1, 27 Stat. 531 (U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3174)] that "on and after the first day of January, 1898, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier engaged in interstate commerce to haul, or to permit to be hauled or used, on its line any car used in moving interstate traffic, not equipped with couplers coupling automatically by impact, and which can be uncoupled without the necessity of men going between the ends of the cars." I charge that if you believe the defendant railway company was a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and was using for the purpose of moving interstate traffic the cars mentioned in the complaint as causing the plaintiff's injury, and that said cars were not equipped with couplers coupling automatically by impact, so as to obviate the necessity of plaintiff going between them to effect the coupling, such failure to provide such automatic couplers was negligence on the part of the railway company, which negligence continued up to the very moment of the collision, if you believe there was such a collision, and injury in consequence thereof; and, if you believe that such negligence was the proximate cause of such injury, your verdict should be for the plaintiff. The rule of the defendant company forbidding employees going between cars for the purpose of coupling or uncoupling them may be waived by it. I charge you that the conductor is the representative of the railway company, and, if said company fails to furnish appliances to brakemen by means of which they may effect said coupling without going between the cars, or furnish them appliances which make it necessary for them to go between the cars to perform the work required of them, and without objection, then it is for you to say whether or not such conduct on the part of the railway company amounts to a waiver of the said rule; and, if you do find that it amounts to waiver, then I charge you that in such a case the railway company cannot invoke the said rule in its behalf.' The errors consisting in: (a) The act of Congress applies only when the railway company fails to use cars equipped with automatic couplers. It does not apply where the railway company has equipped its cars with such couplers, one of which is temporarily out of repair. The complaint alleges, and the plaintiff's evidence shows, that the cars were equipped with automatic couplers, but that one of them was temporarily out of repair; that it could have been repaired in two minutes. The question, therefore, was whether the railway company had violated its duty to exercise ordinary care in keeping the coupler in repair, and not whether it had complied with the act of Congress. The latter had no application to the case. (b) It was error to charge that the failure to provide automatic couplers was negligence, which continued up to the very moment of the collision, for the reason that rule 12 made it the duty of the plaintiff to examine the coupler, and, if defective, report such fact immediately. The plaintiff admitted that he knew it was defective before he attempted to make the coupling. (c) The act of Congress requires that the cars be equipped with couplers coupling automatically by impact, and which can be uncoupled without the necessity of men going between the ends of the cars. It does not require that they be so arranged as to obviate the necessity of men going between the ends of the cars for the purpose of adjusting the knuckles for a coupling. The charge of the judge stamped it as negligence if the plaintiff, in order to make a coupling or to adjust the knuckles, had to go between the ends of the cars.

"(23) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows (the same being No. 2 of the plaintiff's requests): 'I charge you that it was the duty of the railway company in this case to furnish the plaintiff with safe and suitable appliances with which to perform the work required of him, and also see that the same were kept in proper repair, and if this duty was negligently performed, and the plaintiff sustained any injury thereby, the railway company is responsible in damages. I charge you that, provided the negligence of the railway company was the direct and proximate cause of the injury, and the plaintiff did not contribute to the direct and proximate cause of the injury.' The error consisting in this: The duty of a master to a servant is to exercise ordinary care in keeping machinery and appliances in repair. The charge imposes this duty absolutely upon the railway company, practically making it a guarantor of the safe and suitable condition of the coupling apparatus.

"(24) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows (the same being No. 3 of plaintiff's requests): 'I charge you that the risk which a railway employé assumes when he enters the employ of a railway company does not extend to such risks as he is exposed to by reason of defective machinery or appliances.' The error consisting in this: An employé assumes all risks except those which flow from the master's negligence in his duty in furnishing safe machinery, and in keeping the same in repair. The charge was erroneous in not so stating.

"(25) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows (the same being No. 6 of plaintiff's requests): 'I charge you that contributory negligence on the part of the servant, by using appliances obviously defective, furnished by a railway company, is no longer of force in South Carolina, under the Constitution of 1895.' The error consisting in this: The defendant contended that, under rule 12, it was the duty of the plaintiff to examine the coupler before attempting to effect the coupling, and to report any defect therein immediately. The charge eliminated this defense.

"(26) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows (the same being No. 7 of plaintiff's requests): 'The fact that the servant's work is done in the presence and under the immediate direction of the master's foreman, or the conductor in this case, is equivalent to the assurance by the master that the servant may safely proceed to do the work required of him, and he is therefore not bound in such a case to search for danger. He may rely for his safety upon the conduct of the conductor.' The error consisting in this: (a) It is a charge upon the facts, in violation of Const. art. 5, § 26. (b) It erroneously assumes that it was the conductor's duty to inspect the coupling. (c) It excludes from the jury inquiry as to the manner in which the plaintiff may have done the work. (d) Under rule 12, it was plaintiff's duty to examine the coupler and report defects immediately. (e) It relieves the plaintiff from the obligation to exercise ordinary care in avoiding danger. (f) It erroneously declares that, no matter what the conditions are—whether known to the conductor or not—the plaintiff may blindly go ahead and do what he is told to do. (g) It states an erroneous principle of law. (h) It destroys the defense of contributory negligence and of sole negligence of the plaintiff.

"(27) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows (the same being No. 8 of the plaintiff's requests): 'I charge you that a rule forbidding railway employes going between railway cars in motion, for the purpose of coupling or uncoupling them, or where attached to an engine, within itself, is a reasonable requirement; but such rule must be taken with the qualification that the company will provide other means for performing the necessary service, and, if it fails to do this, the rule is no protection to the company against liability for damages for injury sustained in doing the work required to be done, and in the performance of which said rule is violated.' The error consisting in this: The rule prohibits the brakemen from going between the cars while coupling or uncoupling them, either (1) while the cars are in motion; or (2) while an engine is attached to them. The charge declares that when the brakeman is injured while violating this rule, in either particular, the company cannot invoke the rule in its defense unless it has provided other means for the service, which renders it unnecessary for the brakeman to go between the cars. In this, error is assigned. As applied to (1), it means either that the company must stop the cars, or that it must provide means for the brakemen to make the coupling without going between the cars while they are in motion. If the former, the means were at hand. All that was necessary was a word from the brakeman. If the latter, it presents the anomaly of requiring the company to furnish the means of performing the service in a way prohibited by it. As applied to (2), the same objections apply mutatis mutandis. The charge is erroneous for another reason: The plaintiff had stipulated in form 607 that he would not violate this rule, and would not obey any order to that effect. And for the further reason: The conditions which made it apparently necessary for the plaintiff to violate the rule may have been brought about by the negligence of a fellow servant of the plaintiff.

"(28) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows (the same being No. 11 of the plaintiff's requests): 'I charge you that the rule of the railway company with reference to coupling or uncoupling cars with a pin and stick while the cars are attached to an engine or in motion has no application to a case where the master fails to furnish to the servant a pin and stick sufficient to effect the said coupling.' The error consisting in this: It should have been left to the jury to say whether or not the plaintiff had obligated himself, under rule 10 and form 607, to supply himself with a stick, even if it was not the duty of the court to so construe the rule and form, which defendant claims.

"(29) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows (the same being No. 14 of the plaintiff's requests): 'If the jury find that the rule forbidding the going between the cars in motion or when attached to an engine, and forbidding the setting of pins and links except with a stick, was adopted by defendant railway company when a method of coupling cars prevailed by the use of a pin and link, and if the jury find that the said method of coupling cars has been superseded by a method whereby no pins need be set, or pins and links need be used, then it is for the jury to say whether or not said rule was at the time of the injury complained of in force, and whether or not plaintiff was then bound by the same.' The error consisting in this: No matter what system may have been adopted, the danger of going between the cars while making a coupling was great, and the company had the right to provide by rule and contract against it. The charge makes this right depend upon the continuance of the link and pin method of coupling.

"(30) Error of the presiding judge in charging the jury as follows (the same being No. 21 of the plaintiff's requests to charge): 'Notwithstanding plaintiff has alleged in his complaint joint and concurrent negligence on the part of all the defendants, I charge you that if the proof fails to show such joint and concurrent negligence on the part of all the defendants, yet shows negligence on the part of one or more of the defendants, which negligence resulted in injury to plaintiff, as the sole and proximate cause thereof, then you may find a verdict against such defendant or defendants as the proof shows was guilty of such negligence.' The error consisting in this: (a) By the simple allegation of joint and concurrent tort, the defendant Southern Railway Company, a foreign corporation, has been deprived of the right to remove the cause to the federal court. The plaintiff should prove the allegations of his complaint. To allow a recovery against one only of several alleged tort feasons put it in the power of the jury to do as they did—find against the railway company, and in favor of the servants whose negligence is alleged to have caused the injury. The defendant railway company is thus deprived of a substantial right—that of removal—guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States. (b) A plaintiff has no right to come into court upon one alleged cause of action—for instance, a joint and concurrent tort—and recover upon proof of a several tort.

"(31) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendants' first request to charge, as follows: 'The plaintiff having alleged a joint and concurrent tort of the defendants, the defendant Southern Railway Company, a foreign corporation, has been deprived of the right, where the tort was not joint and concurrent, to remove this cause to the United States court. To sustain this action, the plaintiff must therefore prove that the acts complained of were the joint and concurrent negligence and tort of the railway company and at least one of the other defendants.' Said request contained a correct principle of law applicable to the case.

"(32) Error of the presiding judge in modifying the defendants' second request to charge, which was as follows: 'The negligence of a servant, for which, and on which account only, the master is liable, is not the joint and concurrent negligence of the master and servant.' The modification was as follows: 'I charge you that, with this modification: Unless the servant represents the master so that his acts will bind him, and that you find that the servants of the company were negligent.' The error consisted in this: The request contained a correct principle of law applicable to the case. The modification emasculated the request. It was error to hold that where the servant represents the master, so that his acts will bind him, the negligence of the servant makes out a case of joint and concurrent negligence on the part of both master and servant.

"(33) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendants' third request to charge, which was as follows: 'To constitute a joint and concurrent tort on the part of master and servant, it must appear that each had a direct share in such tort; that each actively participated therein. The imputed liability of the master for the wrong of the servant, in which the master has not participated, and which he neither authorized nor ratified, does not, in connection with the personal liability of the servant for the wrong, present a case of joint and concurrent tort.' Said request contained a correct principle of law applicable to the case.

"(34) Error of the presiding judge in refusing defendants' fourth request to charge, which was as follows: 'To allow the plaintiff, after alleging a joint and concurrent tort by a foreign corporation and its servant or servants, to recover damages without proof of such joint and concurrent tort, would deprive such corporation of the right of removal to the United States court—a right guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States, and which would exist were the tort several, and not joint and concurrent.' Said request contained a correct principle of law applicable to the case.

"(35) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendants' fifth request to charge, which was as follows: 'To allow the plaintiff, after alleging a joint and concurrent tort by a railway corporation and its servant or servants, to recover damages without proof of such joint and concurrent tort, but simply upon proof of a negligent act on the part of such servant or servants, would deprive the railway company of its property without due process of law, contrary to amendment 14, Constitution of United States, for this reason: It would deprive said company of the rights of reimbursement from the defaulting servant or servants, which would exist were the tort not joint and concurrent, but simply the wrong of the servant or servants, for which the company may be liable.' Such request contained a correct principle of law applicable to the case.

"(36) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendants' sixth request to charge, which was as follows: 'Even if the railway company was negligent in the matter of the alleged defective coupling, and the servant or servants were negligent in the matter of backing the train without signal, etc., they could not be held jointly liable for the combined results of their acts, if they acted independently in producing the injury, and neither participated in the several act of the other.' Such request contained a correct principle of law applicable to the case.

"(37) Error of the presiding judge in modifying the defendants' seventh request to charge. The request was as follows: 'If the sole proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was the negligence of the engineer, the jury must find for the defendant railway company, for an engineer or brakeman or flagman upon the same train, while employed in the duties usually pertaining to their respective positions, are fellow servants. A master is not liable to a servant for injuries received in consequence of the negligence of a fellow servant.' The modification was as follows: 'I charge you that, with this modification: If the plaintiff was not performing the ordinary duties for which he was employed, he does not assume the risk of negligence of fellow servants.' The error consisting in this: The request contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case. Inasmuch as the evidence showed that the ordinary duties for which the plaintiff was employed were those of a flagman, and that he was pro tempore performing, not those duties, but those of a brakeman, the modification was calculated to mislead the jury. Although the plaintiff may have been employed as a flagman, yet, if he for the day had undertaken the duties of a brakeman, the rule of fellow servants would apply.

"(38) Error of the presiding judge in modifying the defendants' eighth request to charge. The request was as follows: 'If the railway company furnished the plaintiff a rulebook with the following rule: "Cars must not be coupled or uncoupled or pin set by hand. For this purpose brakemen will use sticks, which will be furnished them on application; and every brakeman is required to supply himself with one of these sticks, and see that it is long enough to prevent his going between the cars to couple or uncouple them or to set pins. Any employé going in between cars while such cars are coupled to the engine or being so coupled, for the purpose of coupling or uncoupling cars or to set pins or links, or for any other purpose while the train or cars are in motion, does so at his own risk." And if the plaintiff violated this rule, and such violation was a proximate cause of his injury, or contributed thereto, with the negligence of the defendants, as a proximate cause thereof, he is not entitled to any damage.' The modification was as follows: 'I charge you that, with this modification: Provided, the rule is not contrary to law, has not been waived by the defendants, and the violation of the same was negligence, and the proximate cause of the injury.' The error consists in this: (a) The court, not the jury, should have passed upon the question, whether or not the rule was contrary to law. (b) The negligence of the plaintiff need not be the proximate cause of the injury. It will relieve the defendant if it be a proximate cause contributing with the negligence of the defendant.

"(39) Error of the presiding judge in modifying the defendants' ninth request to charge. The request was as follows: 'If the railway company furnished the plaintiff with a rulebook, containing a rule warning him that going between cars in motion to couple or uncouple them was dangerous, and violation of duty, and if they do so it will be at their own risk, and if the plaintiff violated this rule, and such violation was a proximate cause of his injury, or contributed thereto, with the negligence of the defendants, as a proximate cause thereof, the plaintiff is not entitled to any damage.' The modification was as follows: 'I charge you that, with the same modification as above.' The error consisted in this: (a) The court, not the jury, should have passed upon the question whether or not the rule was contrary to law. (b) The negligence of the plaintiff need not be the proximate cause of the injury. It will relieve the defendant if it be a proximate cause, contributing with the negligence of the defendant.

"(40) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendants' tenth request to charge, which was as follows: 'If the railway company furnished the plaintiff with a rulebook, containing a rule requiring him, before exposing himself in working with the cars, to examine for his own safety the condition of such cars, or whatever he may undertake to work on or with, and to promptly report to his immediate superior officer any defect therein affecting the safety of any one using or operating upon or with the same, and if the plaintiff violated such rule, and such violation was the proximate cause of the injury, or contributed thereto, with the negligence of the defendants, as the proximate cause thereof, the plaintiff is not entitled to any damage.' Such request contained a correct principle of law applicable to the case.

"(41) Error of the presiding judge in modifying the defendants' eleventh request to charge. The request was as follows: 'If the plaintiff executed the paper in evidence marked "Form 607," and violated the agreement on his part contained therein, and such violation was the proximate cause of his injury, or contributed thereto, with the negligence of the defendants, as a proximate cause thereof, the plaintiff is not entitled to any damage.' The modification was as follows: 'I charge you that, with this modification: Provided, under the circumstances, his violation thereof was negligence, and such negligence proximate cause of the injury.' The error consisted in this: The negligence of the plaintiff need not be the proximate cause of the injury. It will relieve the defendant if it be a proximate cause, contributing with the negligence of the defendant.

"(42) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendants' sixteenth request to charge, which was as follows: 'A quotient verdict is illegal; that is, a verdict arrived at by agreement that each juror should name his estimate of the damages, and that the sum of all the several estimates, divided by twelve, shall be the verdict. This is an improper way to arrive at a verdict.' Such request contained a correct principle of law, and was an instruction proper to be given.

"(43) Error of the presiding judge in modifying the defendants' eighteenth request to charge. The request was as follows: 'If the plaintiff was not injured directly by the alleged defective coupling, but by a cause remotely, indirectly, connected therewith, and the plaintiff, before he was hurt, knew that it was out of repair, so that attempt to use it was dangerous, and he nevertheless attempted to use it after such knowledge, it is for the jury to say whether, under the circumstances, he failed to exercise ordinary care and prudence, and was thereby guilty of negligence. If so, he is not entitled to any damages.' The modification was as follows: 'I charge you that, with this modification: Provided, there can be no negligence by use of appliances obviously defective.' The error consisted in this: (a) The constitutional provision in reference to a servant's knowledge of defective machinery applies only to cases where the injury is caused directly by the defective condition of such machinery. Hence, when the injury is not so caused, the servant may be guilty of contributory negligence in the uses of machinery which he knew was defective. A servant may be guilty of contributory negligence in the use, or in the method of use, of appliances obviously defective.

"(44) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendants' nineteenth request to charge, which was as follows: 'If the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiff has failed to prove any negligence on the part of either the railway company or either of the other two defendants, they must find for the defendants. The complaint being based upon a joint, concurrent tort, the plaintiff must stand or fall by this allegation. He cannot recover upon proof of negligence upon the part of any one or any two of the defendants.' Such request contained a correct proposition of law applicable to the case.

"(45) Error of the presiding judge in refusing defendants' twentieth request to charge, which was as follows: 'If the injury was caused directly by the act of the conductor or alone, and remotely by the negligent act of the railway company, the railway company is entitled to a verdict.' Such request contained a correct principle of law applicable to the case."

of our investigation of the exceptions that the appellant here, in his printed agreement, announces that its exceptions 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 44, and 45 involve the question, in various phases, of the joint liability of master and servant for the single tort of the servant, and that such exceptions appear to be concluded, so far as this court is concerned, by the recent decisions of this court in the two cases of Schumpert v. R. Co., supra, and Gardner v. R. Co., supra. But they, while making this admission, do not waive their said exceptions. For the reasons set out in those two decisions, which are so recently made as to render it unnecessary to repeat the argument thus used, we overrule these said exceptions. We will now proceed to pass upon the remaining exceptions of this group.

(21) Our decisions of Gunter v. Graniteville Manufacturing Co., 18 S. C. 262, 44 Am. Rep. 573; Lasure v. Graniteville Manufacturing Co., 18 S. C. 275; Bussey v. Charleston & Western Carolina Railway Co., 52 S. C. 438, 30 S. E. 477; Youngblood v. South Carolina & Georgia R. Co., 60 S. C. 9, 38 S. E. 232, 85 Am. St. Rep. 824—and other cases in this state, all hold that it is the duty of the master to furnish safe machinery and appliances to its servants, and also to keep such machinery and appliances in good order. The master is not made a guarantor, strictly. But it is his duty to furnish safe machinery and appliances, and to preserve it in good order and repair. The circuit judge did not use the word "guarantor" as to the master. He correctly stated the rule in this state. The act of Congress in relation to couplings to cars engaged in interstate commerce peremptorily demands that carriers of interstate commerce shall use automatic couplings to the cars used by them. This defendant was a carrier of freight of interstate commerce, and, of course, it was bound by the act of Congress, no matter what rules they may have adopted for the government of their servants. The circuit judge properly stated the rule. It is well known that Congress took control of these matters for wise purposes, among which was the protection of railroad employes. This exception is overruled, especially as no specific requests were made for fuller instructions.

(22) We cannot sustain this exception, and it is overruled. The circuit judge had the act of Congress governing couplers in trains engaged in interstate commerce. It would be a want of wisdom and a disregard of law for this act of Congress to be emasculated. Courts and the people of this country are obliged to adhere to, and be governed by, acts of Congress. Of course, Congress intended, when they directed these automatic couplers should not only be provided and attached to cars, that such appliances should be kept in proper repair for constant use. It is the law of this state, even if the act of Congress in question had overlooked this duty of keeping such appliances in good order, which includes proper repairs, that master shall keep all machinery and appliances in repair. This exception is overruled.

(23) We do not see that the judge's charge was improper. He charged the law of this state. He did not use language which made the master a guarantor of the machinery and appliances, especially as the circuit judge was careful to say, "Provided, the negligence of the master was the direct and proximate cause of the injury," etc. This exception is overruled.

(24) There was no error here. The servant does not assume the risks of the master, and, as we have seen it, it is the master's duty to furnish safe machinery and appliances, and keep the same in proper repair. Confine your criticism to what the judge actually charged. If a party wishes a fuller charge, he must ask for it. Then, if the circuit judge is in error, there is just ground of complaint. This exception is overruled.

(25) The Constitution is a full protection of the servant as to defective machinery and appliances. See section 15 of article 9, which has been construed in the case of Rutherford v. Southern Ry., 56 S. C. 446, 35 S. E. 136, especially at pages 454 and 455, 56 S. C., and pages 138, 139, 35 S. E. This exception is overruled.

(26) We do not regard the charge of the judge as a charge upon the facts. He is only laying down the law to govern the jury. He nowhere refers to the testimony itself; he nowhere tells the jury that the testimony in this case is such; and it has been frequently held by this court that a master may waive the most stringent rules. Take the policies of life insurance companies. How often is there found to be a waiver of the most stringent rule by their agent! Why may not a conductor or a vice principal, in the absence of the master, but in the discharge of his responsible duties, waive the performance of a duty required of a servant under a particular rule? This exception is overruled.

(27) It is said that this charge is taken bodily from Boswell's Law of Personal Injuries, at page 279. Be that as it may, it is well-known law that the master, or his personal representative, the conductor, may waive rules which have been formulated for the general conduct of its business. Exigencies arise when instant action must be taken. "Red tape" cannot be obtained. Prompt action must be taken. Rules must give way. This can be done, and is done, whenever the necessity arises which makes it either necessary or expedient. This exception is overruled.

(28) This exception cannot be sustained. Coupling or uncoupling cars with a stick, when the servant has never had a stick furnished him by the master, of course, is not law. Let this exception be overruled.

(29) Of course, it should have been left to the jury to say whether any change had been made. This was all the circuit judge held. This exception is overruled.

(37) The circuit judge left it to the jury to say whether the plaintiff was performing his ordinary duties. It will be recalled that the duties of the plaintiff were those of a flagman on this train, and not of those of a coupler of cars or a brakeman. Having to obey the orders of the masters, on that day he was required to couple cars. The latter was not his ordinary or usual duty. The servant only assumes the risk of negligence of fellow servants. State v. Telephone Co., 61 S. C. 96, 39 S. E. 257, 55 L. R. A. 139, 85 Am. St. Rep. 870; 20 A. & E., 132; 12 A. & E., 989. This exception is overruled.

(38) The modification of a request as made by the circuit judge was properly made to meet the issues here presented. It was his duty to do so. This exception is overruled.

(39) This exception must be overruled upon the same ground set out in 38.

(40) We think the circuit judge fairly presented the issue, and it would have been improper to have made this charge. The request assumed that the violation of the rule by the servant would be negligence. This exception is overruled.

(41) The modification of the request made by the circuit judge was proper. This exception is overruled.

(42) We think the circuit judge very properly refused to charge the quotient verdict would be illegal. Never suggest evil to a jury. Let them understand that 12 jurors must agree to a verdict, and that such verdict must be based upon the law and the evidence. It was within the judge's discretion, at any rate. This exception is overruled.

(43) The modification of the request to charge was in strict conformity to the rule set up in our Constitution of 1895. See section 15, art. 9. This exception is overruled.

5. Having overruled all the exceptions in this group, we will now dispose of the appeal relating to new trial:

"(46) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendants' motion for a new trial upon the following grounds: (a) The verdict in favor of the conductor and the engineer settled in the railway company's favor the question of its liability by reason of the alleged negligence of those servants. There was nothing left in the case then, except the alleged negligence regarding the defective coupler. The evidence as to that showed that it was not the proximate cause of the injury. (b) The plaintiff knew of the defective coupler before he went in between the cars, and, that defect not having been the proximate cause of the injury, he assumed the risk, and was guilty of negligence which caused or contributed to the injury. (c) The plaintiff, by stipulation, agreed not to go in between cars, while in motion or attached to an engine, for the purpose of coupling. He did so, was injured, and is now precluded from recovering damages. (4) The rules likewise for-bld this action. He violated them, was injured, and is now precluded from recovering damages. (f) The verdict shows that there was no joint and concurrent negligence, as alleged." We should state that the appellant admitted that our recent cases of Schumpert v. R. Co., supra, and Gardner v. R. R., supra, seem to conclude these questions of appeal. We hold that they do. Accordingly we overrule these exceptions.

6. We will next consider the exceptions relating to motion in arrest of judgment. The following is the exception: "(47) Error of the presiding judge in overruling the defendants' motion in arrest of judgment upon the following grounds: (a) The alleged cause of action was the joint and concurrent negligence of the defendants. The verdict in favor of the conductor and engineer conclusively settles this question against the plaintiff. (b) The verdict is inconsistent with the plaintiff's cause of action." We remark that the appellant did not argue this exception. He alleged that it appeared to be governed by the two late decisions of this court—Schumpert v. R. Co., supra; Gardner v. R. Co., supra. He does not abandon these grounds, but still he does not argue them. We think these points are ruled by the principle upheld by those two cases just cited, and, for the reasons therein given, we overrule these exceptions.

7. Lastly, we will pass upon the questions made in the exceptions under the head, "Motion for Judgment." The exceptions are as follows: "(48) Error of the presiding judge in refusing the defendant's motion to direct judgment to be entered in its favor on the verdict upon the following grounds: (a) The alleged cause of action was the joint and concurrent negligence of the defendants. The verdict in favor of the conductor and engineer conclusively determines that the injury was not so caused. (b) The complaint and the testimony both showing that the alleged negligence of the railway company in the matter of defective coupling was not the proximate cause of the injury, there is nothing left in the case, except the alleged negligence in backing the train without signal, notice, or warning. This is shown in like manner to have been the act of the conductor or engineer, or both. The jury having found that neither of these servants was negligent in that or any other particular, no responsibility attaches to the railway company, their employer, for any act committed by them, or by either of them. When the act of the servants is determined not to have been negligence, the same act, treated as the act of the master, through the instrumentality of the servant, cannot be so. (c) In an action against master and servant for an injury caused by the alleged negligence of the servants, and a verdict is rendered in favor of the servants and against the master, the verdict in favor of the servants precludes a recovery against the master, and judgment should be rendered in favor of the master."

This exception must be overruled for these reasons: The master is responsible for the tort of his servants, committed by them during the administration of the duties of their offices, respectively. That the servants are not held responsible personally is because such torts were committed in the master's service. "One may be taken, and the other left." (b) We do not except the doctrine that the defective coupler was to be considered as the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. It was a compound made of several things or parts which made up the proximate cause of injury. This we have hereinbefore announced. (c) We do not hold with the plaintiff in this subdivision of his exception. We do not think that a verdict in favor of the servants turns the master loose thereby. This exception is overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be, and it is hereby, affirmed.

WOODS, J., concurs in the result.

MARION v. BARNWELL.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 8, 1903.)

APPEAL—MOTION TO REINSTATE—DELAY.

1. Where an appeal was dismissed, a motion to reinstate it on the ground that a motion for further time to perfect the appeal was dismissed on default on account of illness of counsel for appellant will be denied where the delay of more than a year in making the motion is unexplained.

2. A motion to reinstate an appeal from an order refusing a temporary injunction against a sale which has since actually occurred will be denied, the appeal being of no practical value.

Action by Sophia S. F. Marion against Joseph W. Barnwell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed. Motion to reinstate dismissed.

Julian Fishburne, for the motion. Burke & Erckemann, opposed.

PER CURIAM. After the order of sale was made in this case, the plaintiff appealed to Hon. D. A. Townsend, Circuit Judge, for an order enjoining the sale. The motion was refused, and the sale was made. Notice of appeal was given, and the plaintiff gave notice that she would move before this court at the November term, 1902, for an order extending time to perfect this appeal. This motion was dismissed for failure of plaintiff to appear. Nothing further was done in the cause, although the April term of the court intervened, until November 20, 1903, when notice was given of this motion "for an order to reinstate the appeal taken in this cause from the order of his honor Judge D. A. Townsend, made March 24, 1902, said appeal having been dismissed for default of appearance." The ground upon which the motion is based is the illness of the plaintiff's attorney at the November term, when the former motion was dismissed. This is, of course, ordinarily good ground for relief; but we do not think it should be granted where there has been such long delay, especially when, in the meantime, the rights of the third parties who purchased at the sale would be disturbed. It is no answer to this to say no notice of the former order of the court was given, for the plaintiff was the moving party, and is charged with notice of disposition of her motion at a time and place fixed by herself. Rule 20 has no application, for the order made at the November term, 1902, only refused further time to perfect the appeal, and was not an affirmance of a decree or order, or dismissal of an appeal.

Aside from the foregoing considerations, this being an appeal from an order refusing a temporary injunction against a sale which has since actually occurred, the review of the order appealed from by this court could have no practical effect.

The motion is therefore dismissed.

MUCKENFUSS v. FISHBURNE et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Aug. 3, 1903.)

FORECLOSURE—JUDGMENT—MOTION TO OPEN—DELAY—APPEAL—STAY.

1. Where, on foreclosure, an application to open the judgment was based on the same ground which had been presented to another judge on an application to continue the case, which application was denied, and the application to open the judgment was not made until after a sale of the property, and no excuse was given for the delay, a refusal to open the sale was proper.

2. Unless a bond is given on appeal from an order of sale in foreclosure, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 352, the sale is not stayed.

3. Where an appeal from an order is dismissed, it is conclusive on all questions raised thereunder.

4. An appeal from a nonappealable order does not stay further proceedings below.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Dorchester County; Gary, Judge.

Foreclosure by Harriet E. Muckenfuss against Helen M. Fishburne and Sophie F. S. Marion. Defendants appeal from order refusing to set aside judgment of foreclosure. Affirmed.

Julian Fishburne, for appellants. Burke & Erckemann and Simons, Siegling & Cappelmann, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This action was instituted January 3, 1901, for the foreclosure of a mortgage on two lots situated in the town of Summerville, S. C., given by Helen M. Fishburne, March 3, 1894, to secure the payment of a bond executed to the plaintiff by Helen M. Fishburne and Sophie F. S. Marion. Plaintiff also demanded judgment against the defendants for the amount due on the bond. Mrs. Fishburne, in her answer, denies all liability under the bond and mortgage, alleging that she signed the same, at the request of her husband, as guarantor or surety of her codefendant, Mrs. Marion; that the money borrowed on said security was borrowed and used for the payment of the individual debts and liabilities of Mrs. Marion, and that no part thereof went into her hands, or was used for her individual benefit or that of her separate property; that at the time of signing the bond and mortgage she was a married woman, and that under the law then in force she could not bind or make herself liable on any contract or obligation except those relating to and for the benefit of her separate estate. The answer of Mrs. Marion, as far as it goes, is to the same effect. By consent of the parties, it was referred to the master of Dorchester county to take the testimony in the cause and report the same to the court. The master's report was filed February 1, 1902. Mr. D. H. Behre, who was defendants' counsel at that time, filed exceptions to this report. The cause came on for trial at the February term, 1902, of the court of common pleas for Dorchester county, Judge Townsend presiding. Messrs. Izlar Bros., who originally represented the defendants, had withdrawn from the case, and had been succeeded by Mr. D. H. Behre. An accident had recently befallen Mr. Behre, which prevented his attendance, and no counsel appeared for defendants. In view of the circumstances the case was continued, and, to speed the hearing of the cause upon its merits, the court ordered that, besides the testimony already taken and filed, the master take and report such additional testimony as might be offered, and file his report of same at least 10 days before the next term of court. The defendants appealed from this order, and upon the hearing in this court the judgment below was affirmed. See Muckenfuss v. Fishburne, 65 S. C. 573, 44 S. E. 77.

While this appeal was pending at the May term of court, 1902, Judge Gage presiding, the case was again called for trial. Mr. Julian Fishburne, agent of the defendants, appeared in their behalf, and asked for a continuance, stating that he had employed Maj. Jas. F. Hart as counsel, and as explanatory of his absence exhibited a telegram from him, of which the following is a copy: "Yorkville, S. C., May 17th, 1902. To Julian Fishburne, Summerville, S. C. Cannot go to Georges, been sick all week. Sorry. [Signed] Jas. F. Hart." The presiding judge refused the motion on the ground that he was satisfied it was for delay, and without merit, and proceeded to a trial of the cause on the pleadings and testimony, holding that the appeal from the order of Judge Townsend did not arrest the further progress of the action. In a decree filed May 19, 1902, the exceptions to the master's report were overruled, and it was ordered, that judgment be entered against the defendants for the amount found due on the bond and mortgage, and that the mortgaged property be sold by the master on sales day in July, 1902. The defendants gave notice of appeal from this order and decree, but failed to perfect their appeal within the required time. Notice was afterwards given of a motion in this court to extend the time in which to serve the case and exceptions, but, the defendants failing to appear, the motion was dismissed November 25, 1902.

Pursuant to the order of Judge Gage, the master sold the mortgaged property on July 7, 1902, and executed a deed for the same to the purchaser. His report of sale and disbursements was filed August 16, 1902. The defendants thereupon gave notice that they would object to the confirmation of the report, setting out a number of exceptions thereto. Prior to the sale, Julian Fishburne, husband of the defendant Helen M. Fishburne, gave notice to the master that, as the head of a family, he was entitled to a homestead in the lands and buildings advertised to be sold, and that the same should be set off and assigned to him.

At the October term of court, 1902, Judge Gary presiding, the cause came on for a hearing on a motion by plaintiff to confirm the report of sale and a motion by defendants upon exceptions that the same be not confirmed. Defendants also moved to be relieved from the judgment, order, and decree taken in the cause, and that the master's deed be canceled, setting up in an affidavit that the said order and decree was taken through their surprise and excusable neglect by reason of the illness and nonappearance of their counsel, Maj. Hart, and that at the times the decree and the sale were made an appeal from a previous order was pending in the Supreme Court. The defendants' motions were overruled, and the master's report of sale confirmed in an order filed November 3, 1902, the presiding judge holding that there were no facts which would justify him in refusing to confirm the report; that the matters and things referred to in defendants' exceptions were before Judge Gage on the hearing of the main cause, and therefore were not subject to review by him; and that the judgment, order, and decree was not taken against the defendants by reason of their mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. From this order defendants appeal.

The first, second, third, fourth, fifth, and eighth exceptions charge abuse of discretion and error of law by Judge Gary in refusing to open the judgment of foreclosure and sale made by Judge Gage on the ground of inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect. The record disclosing this application to Judge Gary was based on practically the same grounds which had been presented to Judge Gage on the application to continue the cause. In addition to this, the application to open the judgment was not made till after the master had sold the property, and no excuse was given for the delay. It is quite clear it would have been very improper in Judge Gary to attempt to open the judgment under these circumstances.

No reason is stated, and we can discern none, why Judge Gage did not have jurisdiction of the cause when he ordered the sale. Besides, no question of this sort could be considered except under appeal from the decree of Judge Gage, and that appeal was dismissed. The sixth exception is therefore overruled.

When the court orders property to be sold to satisfy a mortgage, notice of appeal from the order does not stay the sale, unless an undertaking is given as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 352. No undertaking was given, and hence the seventh exception must fail.

The right of homestead, and the question whether Mrs. Fishburne was bound by the mortgage, being a married woman, claiming the mortgage was given for the exclusive benefit of Mrs. Marlon, her codefendant, were necessarily adjudged by Judge Gage's decree, and could not be reconsidered by Judge Gary. When the appeal from the decree of Judge Gage was dismissed, all the questions which appellants attempt to make in the ninth and tenth exceptions were finally determined.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

On Rehearing.

(Dec. 8, 1903.)

PER CURIAM. We are unable to find that any exception taken by defendants, or any material fact or principle of law, has been overlooked in the decision of the above-stated case. It seems hardly necessary to say the appeal from the order of reference made by Judge Townsend did not operate to stay further proceedings in the circuit court, or effect its jurisdiction to hear the cause, for the reason that such order of reference was not appealable. Muckenfuss v. Fishburne, 65 S. C. 573, 44 S. E. 77; 2 Cyc. 889. The petition for a rehearing is therefore refused, and the order heretofore granted staying the remittitur is revoked.

STATE v. JACKSON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 18, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. An instruction that circumstantial evidence, if it convinces the mind of the guilt of defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, is just as satisfactory evidence as any other evidence, and that, when one seeks to convict on circumstantial evidence, the jury must be satisfied of defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and the circumstances must point to his guilt to the exclusion of any other reasonable hypothesis, is not error.

2. Where there is any evidence to sustain a conviction, a refusal of a new trial will not be disturbed.

Appeal from General Sessions Circuit Court of Hampton County; Purdy, Judge.

Henry Jackson was convicted of stealing sheep, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Smith and Jno. S. Reynolds, for appellant. Asst. Atty. Gen. Townsend, for the State.

WOODS, J. At the fall term, 1902, of the court of general sessions for Hampton county, the defendant was convicted of stealing a sheep. In charging the jury the presiding judge said: "So far as circumstantial evidence is concerned, if it convinces your minds of the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, it is just as satisfactory evidence as any other evidence. I charge you in reference to that, however, that when one seeks to convict on circumstantial evidence, you must be satisfied of the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt, and the circumstances must point to his guilt to the exclusion of any other reasonable hypothesis. That means no more than this: Having carefully considered all the facts and circumstances, does your mind lead you, as reasonable men, to the conclusion that this defendant is guilty of the offense? If it does, and your minds come to that conclusion from the surroundings in which he was placed, in reference to this matter, then it would be your duty to write a verdict of 'Guilty.' But if, after having calmly and carefully considered all the facts and circumstances of the case, you have a reasonable doubt—that is to say, if you can say, 'We ought not to find the defendant guilty because we have a reasonable doubt, from the evidence, of his guilt'—then you will say, 'Not guilty,' because he is entitled to the benefit of every reasonable doubt. The state makes out its case beyond a reasonable doubt, and then, on the whole case as made out by the state and the defendant, he is entitled to such doubt."

There are several exceptions to the charge, but the only question raised is whether, in the latter part of the passage quoted, the presiding judge withdrew from the jury the proposition that conviction should not be based on circumstantial evidence, unless it is strong enough to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than guilt. Where circumstantial evidence is relied on, the absence of reasonable doubt implies impossibility of explaining the evidence on any reasonable hypothesis of innocence. The effect of evidence not being sufficient to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than guilt is to leave doubt of guilt more or less strong, according to the circumstances of the particular case. Taking all the language here used together, the jury could not have failed to receive the impression that the accused could be convicted only in case they were convinced no theory of the testimony could be adopted which could produce reasonable doubt. It is manifest this is the true view of the law. If the defendant thought the statement not sufficiently clear, he should have asked from the court more specific instructions. State v. Milling, 35 S. C. 16, 14 S. E. 284; State v. Davenport, 38 S. C. 348, 17 S. E. 37.

A careful examination of the record does not lead to the conclusion that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict, and we cannot say there was an abuse of discretion in refusing a new trial.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

MILSTER et al. v. CITY OF SPARTANBURG et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 8, 1903.)

MANDAMUS—PARTIES—CITIES—COLLECTION OF TAXES—SURRENDER OF CHARTER—EFFECT—ESTOPPEL—EXEMPTIONS—LIMITATIONS.

1. In a petition for mandamus to enforce the right of a citizen, the state is not a necessary party, where it is not concerned in its sovereign capacity.

2. Where a city ought to have enforced the collection of taxes against a resident corporation, mandamus will lie to compel such enforcement, without previous demand.

3. The surrender of a city charter and the incorporation of a city under a general law do not destroy the right of the city to collect taxes and other debts due to it under the old charter, nor prevent the enforcement of debts due by the city.

4. A city cannot be compelled by mandamus to levy taxes for years previous to the Constitution of 1895, there having been no power given by statute prior thereto to assess property for past years, when it had for any cause been omitted from the assessment for those years.

5. Under the Constitution of 1895, which made the city assessment of property the same as that for the state and county as to the years since the adoption of the Constitution, mandamus will lie to compel the city to assess unpaid taxes for such years.

6. A city is not estopped to enforce omitted taxes for the reason that the council, without any authority or power so to do, exempted certain property from taxation.

7. Where a city has failed to enforce taxes against a corporation on the erroneous ground that it was exempt from taxation, and taxpayers seek by mandamus to compel the enforcement of such taxes, the analogy of the statute of limitations will be applied to the corporation required to pay back taxes for six years prior to the commencement of the proceeding.

Application of J. H. Milster and A. J. Abbott for writ of mandamus against the city of Spartanburg and Spartan Mills. Writ granted.

Sease & Hoke, for petitioners. Simpson & Bomar, Sanders & De Pass, and Ralph K. Carson, for respondents.

WOODS, J. J. H. Milster and A. J. Abbott, as residents and taxpayers of the city of Spartanburg, by their petitions filed in this court, ask that a writ of mandamus be issued to compel the city of Spartanburg to assess unpaid taxes against Spartan Mills for 18 years, beginning with 1890 and including 1902, amounting to $52,226.06, and to require Spartan Mills to pay the amount so assessed. The petitioners have been consolidated, and no separate discussion of them is necessary.

Jas. Y. Culbreath, Esq., was appointed referee to take the testimony and report on the issues of fact made by the return of the respondents, and his full and lucid report is sustained throughout by the overwhelming weight of the evidence. No detailed discussion of the petitioners' exceptions to the findings of fact will be necessary, because, whatever view may be taken of the exceptions, the undisputed facts are, we think, conclusive of the case.

In 1888 a number of the citizens of Spartanburg had established in the city a cotton mill, under the charter of the Spartanburg Manufacturing Company. The enterprise was not profitable. The opinion was entertained by many, if not all the business men of the city, that its prosperity would be greatly advanced if a large manufacturing enterprise should be established within the corporate limits. A mass meeting of citizens was held to consider the matter, at which the statement was made that a large enterprise would be undertaken on the foundation of the Spartanburg Manufacturing Company, on condition that the city council would exempt all the property of the corporation, except its land, from taxation for 10 years. In furtherance of the plan, the city council passed an ordinance, February 27, 1890, providing that for the period of 10 years a sum equal to the city taxes on all the cotton mill company's property, except the land owned and used by it, should be paid to the company from the city treasury, and that the ordinance should be taken and construed as a contract with the city of Spartanburg. The Spartan Mills was induced by this ordinance to acquire the property of the Spartanburg Manufacturing Company, and, with a capital stock of $500,000, built a large cotton mill in the city, which, without this inducement, it would not have done. Instead of requiring a return of the property, making an assessment, and exacting payment of the taxes, and then paying to the mill company a like amount, as the letter of the ordinance directed, the city council omitted these formalities, treated the property as exempt from municipal taxation, and exacted no taxes for 10 years. Since the expiration of the period of 10 years, taxes have been regularly paid on all the property embraced in this intended exemption. In 1895 the directors of Spartan Mills determined to build another large mill, to be known as "No. 2," and were inclined to locate it some miles outside of the corporate limits, on account of some advantages claimed for mills operated away from towns and cities. To induce the company to build this mill in the city, and prevent the supposed diversion of business which would result from placing it a few miles away, the city council passed another ordinance of the same import as that above recited, the exemption period being for the term of 20 years, and applicable to the proposed new mill. The terms of this ordinance were accepted, and the new factory went into operation in 1897, and has paid no taxes on the property the ordinance was intended to exempt.

The evidence must convince any candid mind that the highest hopes of the result of the construction of the mills were realized, and that their operation imparted a great impulse to the city's progress. There is no evidence that the city council or the Spartan Mills had notice of any objection to the exemptions when the second mill was built, or at any time until these petitions were filed. The first ordinance was duly published, and the exemption provided by it seems to have been generally known to the people of Spartanburg, but no vote of the people was ever taken as to either attempted exemption. Milster testified he had known of the exemption several years—he could not tell how many, but before he commenced paying city taxes in 1898. Abbott could not say how long he had known of it. He has been paying taxes since 1879. Both petitioners have been benefited by the erection of the mills more than the entire city taxes paid by them since the exemption has been in effect. In the petition it is alleged that the proceeding is instituted, not only for the benefit of the petitioners, but of other taxpayers of the city of Spartanburg, who have had an additional burden placed upon them by reason of the alleged unjust discrimination. Some taxpayers who appeared as witnesses for petitioners testified to their dissatisfaction with the exemption, but the referee finds that a great majority of the citizens of Spartanburg are in favor of carrying out the contract of exemption which the council attempted to make, and this conclusion is well supported by the testimony. The respondents do not, in their returns or arguments, take the position that the city council had the legal right to grant the exemption or rebate, but insist the writ should be refused, on the facts above stated, for several reasons, which will be separately considered.

That the state is not a necessary party to a petition for mandamus, presented by a citizen to enforce a right in which the state in its sovereign capacity is not concerned, is settled by the case of Lord v. Bates, 48 S. C. 95, 26 S. E. 213. The state as a sovereign has no direct interest in the collection of the municipal taxes of the city of Spartanburg; only that portion of the public is concerned which is represented by the residents and taxpayers of the city.

The petition cannot be dismissed for lack of demand and refusal. If the Spartan Mills ought to have paid the taxes, and if the city of Spartanburg ought to have enforced their collection, the duty resting upon each was to the municipal public, and no one was specially charged to demand its performance; the obligation was imperative without demand. "The duty makes the demand, and the omission is the refusal." High on Extraordinary Remedies, § 41; Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 867; Attorney General v. Boston, 123 Mass. 460.

The next position taken is that the present city of Spartanburg did not come into existence until December, 1901, when the charter of 1880 was surrendered and the city reincorporated under the general law enacted in 1901. The last section of this statute is: "The provisions of this act shall not affect the rights and liabilities acquired by any city under a charter heretofore granted and obtained." 23 St. at Large, p. 659. But, even without this section, the reincorporation would not have marked the destruction of the municipality, but its continuance with altered rights and powers as to the future, and hence would not have the effect of destroying the right of the city to collect taxes and other debts due to it under the old charter, nor prevent the enforcement of debts due by the city; nor would the right of a citizen to require the municipal authorities to collect or pay its debts have been impaired. "Accordingly, the substitution of a new municipal charter in the place of a previous charter, or a change in such a charter, in whole or in part, where substantially the same territory and the same inhabitants are concerned, will not be presumed or be held to be the creation of a new corporation, but the assumption by the old one of new powers and privileges." 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 172; Neely v. Yorkville, 10 S. C. 151.

The respondents next insist that the purposes for which municipal taxes were levied for the past 13 years have been accomplished, and for this reason the city council cannot lawfully require the payment of any taxes the Spartan Mills may owe for those years. It is not asked that a tax shall be ordained or created, that is, "levied," in the sense in which the word is used in article 10, § 8, of the Constitution of 1895. That was done by the city council for each current year. The charge is that the Spartan Mills was not required to pay its share of the taxes so levied. It is manifest that, if it failed to pay taxes due to the city, it cannot claim exemption on the ground that sufficient revenue was collected from others. When the general levy is within the charter limits, one who fails to pay cannot be discharged on the ground that there is no need for his portion. The fact that the payment will make an unexpended surplus in the treasury is of no importance. This frequently happens in the ordinary course of affairs, and the only effect should be to lessen the future burdens of the taxpayers.

It should be observed, however, in this connection, that a mandamus cannot be issued requiring the city to assess property in order to collect taxes for past years. Prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1895, the city of Spartanburg, under its charter, made an annual valuation or assessment of property, for taxation, through its own tax machinery. No power is given by statute to the city to assess property for past years, when it had for any cause been omitted from the assessment of those years. No such power is to be implied, for even state tax officers make assessments for back taxes only in pursuance of express and very specific statutory direction. As separate municipal assessment or valuation was required for each current year as a basis of taxation for that year, and no such assessment of the mill property was made year by year, no valid assessment for back taxes can now be made for any year before the Constitution of 1895, which made the city assessment of property the same as that for the state and county, went into effect. The city has no machinery which it could legally put in motion to procure an assessment for these years, and the court has no power to provide it. 2 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 763; Id. § 81C, note; High on Extraordinary Remedies, §§ 140, 144; U. S. v. Clark Co., 95 U. S. 769, 24 L. Ed. 545; 1 Desty on Taxation, 466; Burroughs on Taxation, 197. Since assessment must precede payment and collection—for in no other way can the amount of the taxes be ascertained—the taxes for the years which passed before the Constitution of 1895 was adopted cannot be ascertained without legislative aid, and hence the court cannot order the Spartan Mills to pay them. This difficulty, of course, does not exist as to the municipal fiscal years in which the state and county assessment was the basis on which the city taxes should have been paid. As to these years, the mandamus requiring payment should issue, unless the other defenses are sufficient.

The next inquiry is whether the city of Spartanburg and the petitioners are estopped from asserting the liability of the Spartan Mills to pay taxes for the term for which the city council undertook to give the exemption or rebate. It is true, a city may be estopped to deny the validity of acts done by its city council for a public purpose by continuing to accept the benefits of such action, but this is where the act is merely an irregular or improper exercise of power conferred by law. Where there is an entire absence of power to do what it has undertaken because the contract or ordinance is forbidden by the Constitution or statute law of the state, the council in such action does not represent the municipality, and for this reason the city cannot be estopped to deny the validity of the contract or ordinance of the council, whatever may be the loss entailed on those who have acted on the faith of the supposed power, or the incidental benefit which accrues to the residents of the city. The effort to bind the city amounts to no more than if the council had undertaken to legislate or make contracts for another municipality or for the entire state. This conclusion is based on familiar legal principles, which apply with equal force whether the ordinances in this case be regarded attempts to exempt from taxation or donations by the council to the Spartan Mills. Feldman v. City Council, 23 S. C. 62, 55 Am. Rep. 6; Garrison v. Laurens, 54 S. C. 456, 32 S. E. 696; Dillon on Municipal Corporations, § 445; 4 Thompson on Corporations, § 5258. The numerous cases cited by respondents do not involve the distinction above stated, and hence are not applicable. The attempt to rebate the taxes, or exempt from taxation, were acts absolutely void of legal effect, because forbidden by section 8, art. 9, of the Constitution of 1868 (Garrison v. Laurens, supra), and because the attempted exemption or rebate was not for the public purposes of the municipality. Feldman v. City Council, supra. There is nothing in the testimony upon which the petitioners could be held estopped. If they had participated in the efforts made to induce the mill company to build in the city, and in any way assented to the exemption or rebate as a condition and consideration, they would be within the principle laid down in Ross v. Gaffney City, 57 S. C. 105, 35 S. E. 439, and their complaint should not now be regarded; but they are charged only with inaction and silence while the mill company was investing its money on the faith of the exemption from taxation. For conduct of one party to work an estoppel, it must be shown that without such conduct the other would not have acted. It is agreed on all hands that the city council and the directors of the Spartan Mills thought they were making a legal contract, binding upon all the citizens of Spartanburg. It is quite clear that the mills were built, not in reliance on the past or expected assent of any or all citizens as individuals, but, on the contrary, the reliance was on the contract with the city council being a protection against the future demands of individual citizens, as well as of the city itself. Besides, when the contracts were made and when the money was expended by the mill company in construction, the petitioners had no information, nor means of information, not possessed by the respondents. For these reasons, we think the mere inaction of the petitioners does not estop them. Bigelow on Estoppel, 570.

It is submitted by respondents the court should refuse to order the writ in the exercise of its discretion, in view of the great benefit received by the municipality and the petitioners themselves from the construction of the mills, the petitioners having for years accepted these benefits without complaint. The discretion of the court must be guided by law, and cannot be exercised in the denial of a plain legal right. Ex parte Mackey, 15 S. C. 328. Whether gratitude for the incidental benefits accruing to the petitioners from the building of the mills, on the faith of the exemption, should suggest a waiver of their rights as citizens to require the payment of the taxes, is an inquiry for the consideration of the parties themselves. The court can exercise no discretion on that ground. The serious question for the court is, did the inaction and delay amount to such laches as will make the granting of the petition unjust and inequitable? Myers v. Appleby, 25 S. C. 104; Gruber v. Knight, 31 S. C. 84, 9 S. E. 692; Cummings v. Kirby, 17 S. C. 566. If so, whatever may have been the rights of the petitioners, they should not now be enforced. Cummings v. Kirby, 17 S. C. 563; Spelling on Extraordinary Relief, § 1382; High on Extraordinary Remedies, § 38. In solving this question the important inquiries are: (1) Was the delay unreasonable? and (2) would its natural result be injury to the party against whom the relief is sought? The action of the city council attempting to exempt the mills from taxation being absolutely void, and the city taxes having been assessed and collected for each year separately, the failure of the mills to pay became each year a separate default. We venture to think there will be no question that the delay in endeavoring to enforce the collection of taxes for the year 1890, 13 years after they accrued, would be unreasonable. On the other hand, it is quite certain that a proceeding instituted in 1903 to enforce collection of taxes of 1902 would be regarded within the rule of due diligence. Where should the line between these dates be drawn? It cannot be doubted, if this were an action by the city council to recover past-due taxes from the Spartan Mills, the statute of limitations would be a complete bar to the recovery of all taxes due more than six years before the commencement of the action, for the reason that a municipal tax is a liability created by statute, and falls within subdivision 2 of section 112 of the Code of Procedure. Dillon on Municipal Corporations, §§ 668, 674; Bristol v. Washington Co., 177 U. S. 144, 20 Sup. Ct. 585, 44 L. Ed. 701; State v. Certain Lands in Redwood Co. (Minn.) 42 N. W. 478. We suppose the statute of limitations was not pleaded because it was not regarded applicable to a proceeding of this kind, under the authority of State ex rel. Cummings v. Kirby, 17 S. C. 566. Where, as in this case, however, an application is made for mandamus to require the payment of an aggregate amount arising from a distinct obligation accruing each year for a number of years, the safe and reasonable rule is to adopt the analogy of the statute in fixing the line of unreasonable delay amounting to laches. High on Extraordinary Remedies, § 30b; People v. Chapin (N. Y.) 10 N. E. 142. See, particularly, the well-considered case of State v. Certain Lands in Redwood Co., supra. The foundation of the statute of limitations is that the adjustments of business life would be unduly disturbed by allowing stale and perhaps forgotten demands to be pressed in the courts. The denial of relief on account of laches, even where there is a clear legal right, rests on the same ground. The petitioners are guilty of nothing tending to impair their legal rights except inaction; but during the time of their inactivity many shares of the Spartan Mills may have been acquired by the present stockholders without thought of this large aggregate of indebtedness to the city of Spartanburg. It seems, therefore, manifestly equitable to require the Spartan Mills to pay only such indebtedness for taxation as would not be barred by the policy of the law as expressed in the statute of limitations, if the city had brought a direct action for its recovery.

The petitioners are therefore entitled to the writ of mandamus to require Spartan Mills to pay all unpaid municipal taxes on its property in the city of Spartanburg which have fallen due within six years prior to the 12th day of March, 1903, when this proceeding was instituted, but not for such unpaid taxes as fell due more than six years before that date.

It is referred to Jas. Y. Culbreath, Esq., to ascertain the precise amount of municipal taxes of Spartan Mills unpaid, which have fallen due within six years prior to March 12, 1903. Upon the filing of his report, it is ordered that a writ of mandamus do issue commanding the Spartan Mills to pay the amount so ascertained into the treasury of the city of Spartanburg, unless exceptions shall be duly taken to the report within 20 days after filing.

REEVES v. SOUTHERN RY. ATTAWAY
v. SAME. WILLIAMS v. SAME. CON-NELLY v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 20, 1904.)

TORTS OF SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER—RAILROADS—REFUSAL TO STOP TRAIN—EVI-DENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—DAMAGES.

1. A master is liable in punitive damages for the willful tort of a servant.

2. In an action against a railroad company for willful and malicious refusal to stop its train, whereby plaintiff was obliged to walk many miles, sustaining physical injury and loss of time, statement by the engineer of the train that he had never disregarded a signal to stop is incompetent, as he was not a party to the suit, and there were no allegations in the complaint charging him with willful misconduct.

3. In an action for willful tort in refusing to stop a train at a station, an instruction that, if the act of defendant was done wrongfully and recklessly, plaintiff would be entitled to recover exemplary damages by way of punishment by adding to the compensatory damages a sufficient sum to prevent defendant from doing a like wrong to anybody else, is not erroneous as awarding compensatory damages on failure of plaintiff to prove the willful tort alleged.

4. A refusal to charge that a quotient verdict is illegal is not reversible error where there is nothing to show that appellant suffered prejudicial injury by such refusal.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Newberry County; Izlar, Special Judge.

Four actions tried together: (1) Thomas H. Reeves against Southern Railway, (2) James T. Attaway against same, (3) M. P. Williams against same, and (4) Willie Connelly against same. From judgments for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. P. Cothran, for appellant. Cole L. Blease and Johnstone & Welch, for respondents.

GARY, A. J. The following statement appears in the record: "The four plaintiffs above named, with Quincy Williams, brought several actions in the court of common pleas for Newberry county March 11, 1902, for damages each in the sum of $1,900, on account of the alleged 'willful, wanton, reckless, and malicious' failure and refusal of defendant to stop its passenger train at Old Town for plaintiffs on July 4, 1900, whereby they were forced to walk thirteen miles to Newberry, sustaining physical injury, personal discomfort, loss of time consequent thereon, etc. The case of Reeves was tried at Newberry, before Hon. J. F. Izlar, Special Judge, October 20, 1902. Verdict for plaintiff $450, upon which judgment was duly entered. The other cases were tried the following day. They were tried together by agreement. Verdict, each case, for $175, in favor of plaintiff. Verdict in the Quincy Williams case was set aside, and a new trial was ordered. Judgments in each of the other three cases were entered up upon the verdicts. Due notice of appeal in each case was served by defendant from said judgments. It is agreed by counsel that the appeals in the four cases be heard together in this court. The complaints, answers, testimony, motion for nonsuit, judge's charge, notice of appeal, and exceptions are practically the same in all four cases, and it is agreed that the four appeals be heard and considered upon one copy of each of said pleadings and proceedings, with this exception: Exception 4, under division 2, 'Evidence,' applies only to the Reeves case."

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit on the following grounds: "(1) The complaint charges a willful tort by the defendant. This is not sustained by evidence of a willful tort by one of the servants, for which it is claimed the defendant is answerable. (2) The defendant is not liable in exemplary or punitive damages for an illegal, wanton, or willful act by one of its servants, which it has in no way authorized or ratified. (3) There is no evidence at all tending to show that the defendant in any way authorized the alleged willful tort of its servants, or ratified the same. (4) To hold the defendant liable in punitive damages for the willful tort of its servant, in the absence of authorization or ratification, would deprive the defendant of its property without due process of law, contrary to the fourteenth amendment, Constitution of the United States. (5) There is no evidence tending to show any willful tort by the defendant or its servants." The motion was refused.

The following are the appellant's exceptions:

"(1) Motion for Nonsuit. First. Error in not sustaining the first, second, and third grounds, which present the point that a master is not liable in punitive damages for the willful tort of his servant in the absence of authorization or ratification, of which there is no evidence.

"Second. Error in not sustaining the fourth ground, which presents the point that, to hold the defendant liable in punitive damages for the willful tort of his servant, in the absence of authorization or ratification, would deprive the defendant of its property without due process of law, contrary to the fourteenth amendment, Constitution of the United States.

"Third. Error in not sustaining the fifth ground, which presents the point that there is no evidence tending to show any willful tort by the defendant or its servants.

"(2) Evidence. Fourth. Defendant's attorney asked the witness D. M. Madden, 'Did you answer the signal that night?' to which he replied, 'Never answered none; none given.' Witness was then asked, 'Did you ever do such as not to answer?' Upon objection the question was ruled out; the witness was not allowed to answer. Error in ruling out the question and answer is assigned upon the ground that, this being an action for willful tort, the habit and custom of the engineer was admissible to show his good faith and motive, and to negative the charge of a willful wrong; just as evidence of previous similar acts would have been competent in favor of the plaintiff. It was competent upon the further ground to show that the company was not negligent in retaining in its employ a reckless servant, and did not participate directly in the alleged tort, which, if true, would naturally enhance amount of punitive damages.

"(3) The Judge's Charge. Error in charging the jury as follows: 'I know that between willful mischief and gross negligence there is a very narrow margin, as said by one of our English judges—chief justices, I think. He said he rather thought it was impossible to define it, and I am rather inclined to think so myself—to define the line of demarcation between gross negligence and willful mischief.' The error consisting in this: This was an action for a willful tort, sounding in punitive damages. Punitive damages are not allowed in this state for gross negligence. The charge authorized the jury upon the allegation of a willful tort to award punitive damages for gross negligence. The distinction between gross negligence and willful tort is great.

"Sixth. Error in charging the jury as follows: 'Now, there are two kinds of damages. For instance, we have what is called "compensatory damages"; that is, to compensate the plaintiff for the injuries he has received by reason of the wrongs and injuries he has received. Now, compensatory damages do not amount necessarily to his physician bills or medicine bills, and all that sort of thing. You are to take into consideration the bodily pain, what he suffered, if he suffered anything at all, by reason of those injuries. You are to take into consideration his loss of time, if you come to the conclusion he lost any time, from the testimony in this case, and how much time did he lose. All these things come in by way of compensation for the injuries received. Sometimes impairment of health, present and future, come into this case; and you are to take these things into consideration. Now, as I said, the question of damages is particularly for you. You are to be the judge of it, and decide what damages, if any, the plaintiff has sustained by reason of that act—of the wrongful act of the defendant which he complained of. You are to decide that from the testimony. Now, if you come to the conclusion that the act of the defendant on this occasion was done wrongfully and recklessly, why find, in addition to compensatory damages such as I have named, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover what is called "exemplary" or "punitive" damages, sometimes called "smart money." That is, by way of punishment to the railroad company, by adding to the compensatory damages which you have found the plaintiff has suffered, and a sufficient sum to prevent them doing a like wrong to anybody else in the future.' The error consisted in this: The charge permitted the jury to award compensatory damages in the event the plaintiff failed to prove a willful tort. The action was based upon a willful tort. Upon proof of it the plaintiff might recover either or both kinds of damages; but if he failed to prove it as alleged, he could recover neither.

"Seventh. Error in charging the jury as follows: 'If you come to the conclusion that the plaintiff has suffered any damage at all, why, you will find what damages he has suffered. If from the testimony you come to the conclusion that it was the result of the willful, wanton, and reckless act or omission of the defendant, why then you can go on and add to that such damages by way of punishment—punitive, as it is called—such sum as you think just.' The error being the same as in preceding exception.

"Eighth. Error in charging the jury as follows: 'When there is evidence to establish the fact that the defendant or its agents and servants were guilty of willful negligence or conscious indifference to the consequences, there can be no recovery for exemplary damages.' The error being that the defendant is not liable in punitive damages for the willful tort of one of its servants.

"Ninth. Error in refusing the defendant's sixth request to charge, which was as follows: 'The defendant is not liable in punitive damages for a willful tort by one of its servants in the absence of authorization or ratification.' The same containing a correct proposition of law applicable in the case.

"Tenth. Error in refusing the defendant's seventh request to charge, which was as follows: 'To hold the defendant liable in punitive damages for the willful tort of its servants, in the absence of authorization or ratification, would deprive the defendant of its property without due process of law, contrary to amendment 14, Constitution of the United States.' The same containing a correct proposition of law applicable to the case.

"Eleventh. Error in refusing the defendant's eighth request to charge, which was as follows: 'A quotient verdict is illegal.' The same containing a correct proposition of law, and intended to warn the jury from the illegal practice of adding up the several individual estimates and dividing such sum by 12, and by previous agreement adopting such quotient as the verdict."

The appellant's attorney, with his accustomed analytical arrangement, has classified the questions presented by the exceptions under five heads, which we will follow in considering the exceptions.

The first is: Is a master liable in punitive damages for the willful tort of a servant? This principle has been settled so long and recognized so often in this state contrary to the views for which the appellant contends, that we do not deem it necessary to add any authorities to those cited in the argument of the respondents' attorneys.

The second is: Was it competent evidence to show by the engineer that he had never done such a thing as run by a flag station when he was signaled to stop? In 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 54, the rule is thus stated: "In civil cases such evidence is not admitted unless the nature of the action involves the general character of the party, or goes directly to affect it. * * * And in all cases when evidence is admitted touching the general character of the party, it ought manifestly to bear reference to the nature of the charge against him." Again, in section 55, it is said: "It is not every allegation of fraud that may be said to put the character in issue; for, if it were so, the defendant's character would be put in issue in the ordinary form of declaring in assumpsit. This expression is technical, and confined to certain actions from the nature of which, as in the preceding instances, the character of the parties, or some of them, is of particular importance. This kind of evidence is therefore rejected whenever the general character is involved by the plea only, and not by the nature of the action." In 5 A. & E. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) 863, it is said: "The fact that a party to a civil action, or some person concerned in the transaction out of which the action arose, is charged with fraud or moral delinquency, will not generally result in allowing evidence of character to be admitted." There are two reasons why this testimony was properly rejected: First, the nature of the action was not such as to render it admissible; and, second, the engineer was not sued as a party defendant, and there were no allegations in the complaint charging him with willful misconduct.

The third is: Did the circuit judge charge that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover upon proof of gross negligence? When that part of the charge set out in the exceptions is considered in connection with the other portions thereof, and in connection with the defendant's requests that were charged, it will be seen that the charge is not susceptible of the interpretation placed upon it by the appellant.

The fourth is: Did the circuit judge charge that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover upon proof of ordinary negligence? This question is disposed of by what was said in considering the third question.

The fifth is: Did the circuit judge err in refusing the request to charge concerning quotient verdicts? The request was as follows: "A quotient verdict is illegal." The request simply contained a warning to the jury, and, even conceding that it was a sound proposition, there is nothing in the record showing that the appellant suffered prejudicial injury by reason of the refusal to so charge.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court in each of said cases be affirmed.

FALES & JENKS MACH. CO. v. BROWNING.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 8, 1903.)

GUARANTY — DILIGENCE — EVIDENCE — BANKRUPTCY — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE — NONSUIT.

1. In a suit against a corporation and the guarantor of its debt, the record of a suit against the corporation containing an appointment of a receiver is admissible on the question of diligence in pursuing the principal debtor.

2. Duplicate original of a schedule in bankruptcy prepared under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 7, 30 Stat. 548 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3424], is admissible in evidence as an admission of insolvency.

3. Under Bankr. Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, § 21, 30 Stat. 552 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3430], a certified copy of the bankruptcy record is admissible in evidence as original evidence.

4. In determining the propriety of the refusal of a nonsuit, evidence offered by defendant after such refusal will be considered.

5. Where a guaranty was executed after the contract of sale of machinery, but before delivery, the original contract is a sufficient consideration.

6. Where a contract of guaranty is an absolute agreement to pay according to the original contract if the principal debtor fails to pay, no notice to the guarantor of nonpayment was necessary.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; Carey, Special Judge.

Action by the Fales & Jenks Machine Company against J. S. Blalock, L. W. C. Blalock, and M. E. Browning. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant Browning appeals. Affirmed.

D. W. Robinson, Johnstone & Welch, and Ferguson & Featherstone, for appellant. N. B. Dial and F. P. McGowan, for respondent.

JONES, J. The Fales & Jenks Machine Company, a corporation of Rhode Island, on July 9, 1900, contracted in writing with the Goldville Manufacturing Company, of Goldville, S. O., to deliver by November 1, 1900, certain machinery for the erection of a yarn mill at the price of $9,404.24, f. o. b. cars at Pawtucket, R. I. "Terms of payment, one-half net cash, New York exchange, thirty days from date of bill of lading; balance by two (2) notes of equal amounts at six (6) and twelve (12) months, respectively, said notes to bear interest at the rate of six per cent. (6) per annum and to be dated from date of bill of lading." On the 19th day of November, 1900, as further assurance, the defendants, J. S. Blalock, L. W. C. Blalock, and M. E. Browning, executed and delivered to plaintiff an instrument in writing, which, after reciting the terms of the contract as above stated, stipulated as follows: "We hereby agree to indorse the said notes, and should the Goldville Manufacturing Co. fail to pay for said machinery on terms of contract made between themselves and the Fales and Jenks Machine Co., dated July 9th, or shall fail to pay any notes when due, which are given in payment, we the undersigned do hereby bind and obligate ourselves, jointly and severally, each with the other, and with the Fales and Jenks Machine Co., to make good and pay to the Fales and Jenks Machine Co. the amounts which may be due them in accordance with the contract above mentioned." The machinery was shipped about December 1, 1900, was received and used for the purposes intended, and the cash payment of $4,702.12 was made on January 28, 1901. The plaintiff did not require notes for the credit portion of the contract. This action was brought in January, 1902, for the balance due against James S. Blalock, L. W. C. Blalock, and Mrs. M. E. Browning individually and as partners under the firm name of Goldville Manufacturing Company; the complaint alleging that Mrs. Browning was a partner in the Goldville Manufacturing Company at the time the machinery was purchased, and further sought to make her liable as guarantor under the instrument above stated. J. S. Blalock and L. W. C. Blalock having been adjudged bankrupt, each upon his own petition, the action was directed mainly against Mrs. Browning, and the issues arose upon her answer denying that she was a partner in the Goldville Manufacturing Company, and denying liability as guarantor upon the grounds (1) that the guaranty was without consideration; (2) that the contract of July 9, 1900, was so changed as to discharge her; (3) because of the negligence of plaintiff in prosecuting the claim against the principal debtor, and in failing to give timely notice of default to her as guarantor. The action resulted in a verdict and judgment against Mrs. M. E. Browning for the amount claimed, from which she appeals.

1. As to the exception of admissibility of evidence. We think there was no error, as claimed in the first exception, in admitting in evidence the complaint, answer, and order appointing a receiver in the case of Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company against Goldville Manufacturing Co. et al., even though Mrs. Browning was not a party to such suit. The Goldville Manufacturing Company was a party to the present suit, and the evidence was competent and relevant to show the fact and date of the insolvency of the Goldville Manufacturing Company, as being upon the issue as to the plaintiff's negligence in pursuing the principal debtor. Nor, for the same reason, do we think there was any error, as claimed in the second exception, in admitting in evidence a duplicate of the bankrupt record in the matter of the bankruptcy of J. S. Blalock and L. W. C. Blalock. Section 7 of the bankrupt act of Congress approved July 1, 1898 (Act July 1, 1898, c. 541, 30 Stat. 548 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3424]), provides that the bankrupt shall prepare and file a schedule of his property in triplicate, one for the use of the trustee. One of these triplicate schedules would be competent as a statement by the party making it touching his insolvency. If the paper proposed to be introduced was a certified copy of the bankrupt record, it was admissible under section 21 of said act of Congress approved July 1, 1898 (30 Stat. 552 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 3430]), relating to bankruptcy.

2. There was no error in the refusal of the motion for nonsuit. This motion was based upon several grounds: (1) Because there was no testimony tending to show that Mrs. Browning was a partner in the Goldville Manufacturing Company when the machinery was bought; (2) the guaranty was without consideration; (3) there was such change in the contract as discharged the guarantor, etc. It is manifest, however, if there was testimony tending to show that Mrs. Browning was partner in the firm of the Goldville Manufacturing Company, the nonsuit was properly refused, without regard to the matter presented in reference to Mrs. Browning's liability as guarantor. We will therefore first inquire whether there was any testimony tending to show that Mrs. Browning was a partner in the Goldville Manufacturing Company. At folio 29 of the "case," in the testimony of L. W. C. Blalock, who is the brother of Mrs. M. E. Browning, both being children of J. S. Blalock, we find the following: "Q. Had you ever taken your sister into partnership in the firm before you went north? A. No, sir. (Objected to by defendant.) Q. Did she have any interest in it? A. Not at that time. Q. When did she have any interest in it? A. Just before we incorporated it. Q. How long before? A. I don't know; not a great while. Q. When you stated that she was a member in June, was that correct? A. I didn't state that she was a member in June. (Objected to by defendant.) By the Court. I don't think that is competent. Q. Well, was she a member of the firm at the time you wrote that letter? A. Yes, sir. (Objected to by counsel for the defendant.) By the Court: I will rule this letter out. Q. Well, I will ask if she was a member of the firm the 1st of June, 1900? Look at that paper (presenting paper to witness). A. No, sir; she was not a partner at that time, and she did not consent to come in at that time. I don't think she was in that early." There was testimony that J. S. Blalock and L. W. C. Blalock were partners under the name of the Goldville Manufacturing Company, and there was some testimony by one of the firm that Mrs. Browning had some interest in the partnership before it became incorporated. The testimony showed that a charter of incorporation was taken out October 23, 1900. At folio 215, "case," Mrs. Browning testified as follows: "I was at Goldville the summer and fall of 1900, at my brother's house, before the Goldville Manufacturing Company was chartered. Father and Bud were interested in it. Q. Did you convey your land to the Goldville Manufacturing Company, where the mill is built? (Objected to by Col. Ferguson as being secondary.) A. I don't know. I was never told that I was to get any stock in the company, but I supposed I would, as pa told me he wanted to make it a family affair. I suppose the correct time would be when Mr. L. W. C. Blalock says I was interested. I knew they were going to buy machinery for the mill, but I did not know that L. W. C. Blalock went north to buy the machinery some time during the summer of 1900. I don't know when the machinery was delivered relative to the signing of the contract. I was never asked for my consent to be director, nor was I notified that I had been elected. My father and brother never discussed the affairs of the mill with me except in an informal and social way. My brother looked after my interests in the mill."

J. S. Blalock testified, at folio 148, that there was no partnership between him and Mrs. Browning, that he was not interested in the partnership, and that he became interested in the mill after it was incorporated. At folio 152 et seq. he testified, substantially, that before L. W. C. Blalock went north to buy machinery, he (J. S. Blalock) told him that he would help him if he would make it a 5,000-spindle mill, and when asked the question, "Was anything said about his taking his sister in? Did you tell him, if he would take her in that you would help him?" J. S. Blalock answered, "We talked about it afterwards, and I said I wanted her in if I took anything in it; that I was working for them." He further testified that they began the construction of a 5,000-spindle mill in August, 1900. Beginning at folio 155, this witness further testified as follows: "Q. You say she was not a partner at that time? A. No, sir; I never recognized her as a partner at all. Q. You looked after her interest in the mill, did you not? A. I have looked after all her interests ever since she was born. Q. When you decided to make this mill a 5,000 mill, you decided to put her interest in that mill? A. I expected to put part of it there. Q. Where did she live? A. At Greenville, but she stayed at my home part of that year, and she was in bad health, her and her baby both. Q. She stayed there all the fall? A. Yes, sir. Q. You expected her to have an interest in the mill? A. Yes, sir; but she had none in the land. Q. You built that mill with your own hands? A. Yes, sir. Q. Made your own brick? A. Yes, sir; all but a few." While the testimony of J. S. Blalock was not given until after the refusal of the motion for nonsuit, it is not improper to refer to the same in considering whether to set aside the order of nonsuit. Hicks v. Southern Railway, 63 S. C. 567, 41 S. E. 758. We do not think it can be said that there was no testimony whatever tending to show that Mrs. Browning was a partner in the Goldville Manufacturing Company, and it was proper to leave it to the jury to determine that issue.

The circuit court, however, did not rest the refusal of nonsuit upon this ground, but upon the ground that the evidence with reference to the guaranty was sufficient to carry the case to the jury. The exact language used by the court just previous to overruling the motion for nonsuit, was: "The question for me to decide is not whether that partnership existed between the parties; it is whether or not there was a sufficient consideration on which that guaranty was made." A strict guaranty "is a promise to answer for the payment of some debt or the performance of some duty in the case of the failure of another person who is himself in the first instance liable to such payment or performance." 14 Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1128. "A consideration is essential to the validity of a guaranty not under seal." McKinney v. Quilter, 4 McCord, 409; Ency. Law (2d Ed.)

1133, cases cited. The instrument in question, signed by J. S. Blalock, L. W. C. Blalock, and M. E. Browning, was not a strict guaranty, in so far as it was signed by those who constituted the partnership of the Goldville Manufacturing Company, for in such case the undertaking is not an agreement to pay the debt of another, but an agreement to pay one's own debt, and is amply supported by the original consideration. Inasmuch as there was some testimony tending to show that Mrs. Browning was a partner in the firm of the Goldville Manufacturing Company, this was some evidence tending to show a consideration for the agreement called a guaranty.

But let us assume that Mrs. Browning was not a party to the original contract of July 9, 1900, between the Goldville Manufacturing Company and plaintiff for the purchase of the machinery, and that her contract of November 19, 1900, is one of guaranty for the performance of the contract of the firm of Goldville Manufacturing Company, composed of L. W. C. Blalock and J. S. Blalock, either or both. The rule applicable is thus stated in 14 Ency. Law (2d Ed.) 1133: "Where the guaranty is collateral to the principal contract, but is made at the same time, and becomes an essential ground of the credit given to the principal or direct debtor, there is not, or need not be, any other consideration than that moving between the creditor and the original debtor under the principal contract. In this class of cases a benefit to the debtor without any benefit to the guarantor is sufficient. The consideration need not pass directly from the party giving to the party receiving it. It is enough if a benefit arises to the party for whom the guaranty is given, or the party receiving the guaranty is or may be injured by it. Although the guaranty is executed subsequently to the drafting of the principal contract, they will nevertheless be deemed to have been executed contemporaneously within the rule stated, if delivered at the same time, and before any obligation or liability is incurred under the principal contract. And a guaranty for the payment of goods for which a contract of sale is made, though executed subsequently to the agreement of sale, is supported by a sufficient consideration if the goods are not delivered until after the guaranty. The contract of sale is not complete until delivery." In 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. (3d Ed.) § 1759, it is stated that there are three classes of cases which should be discriminated: (1) When the guaranty is contemporaneous with the principal contract. (2) When the guaranty is made after the contract is completed, and is not for the benefit of the guarantor. (3) When the guaranty is made after the contract is completed, and is for the benefit of the guarantor. In the first class the consideration of the principal contract will support the guaranty. In the second class the original consideration being exhausted, there must be some new and sufficient consideration to support it. In the third class the consideration moves directly to the guarantor for his own benefit, and is really his own debt. In the leading case of Leonard v. Vredenburg, 8 Johns. 29, 5 Am. Dec. 317, Kent, C. J., said: "There are three distinct classes of cases on this subject which require to be discriminated: (1) Cases in which the guaranty or promise is collateral to the principal contract, but is made at the same time, and becomes an essential ground of the credit given to the principal or direct debtor. Here, as we have already seen, is not nor need be any other consideration than that moving between the creditor and original debtor. (2) Cases in which the collateral undertaking is subsequent to the debt, and was not the inducement of it, though the subsisting liability is the ground of the promise without any distinct and unconnected inducement. Here must be some further consideration shown having an immediate respect to such liability, for the consideration for the original debt will not attach to this subsequent promise. (3) A third class of cases, and to which I have already alluded, is when the promise to pay the debt of another arises out of some new and original consideration of benefit or harm moving between the newly contracting parties." We think there was evidence tending to place the agreement of November 19, 1900, within the first class. The contract for the sale of the machinery made on July 9, 1900, was executory, and not complete until the delivery of the machinery, at which time the liability of the principal debtor attached. The contract called the guaranty was executed November 19, 1900, and the machinery was not delivered until about December 1, 1900. At the time of the guaranty there was no subsisting debt or liability in favor of plaintiff by the principal debtor, as the machinery had not been delivered. When the liability of the principal debtor arose, the contract of guaranty instantly attached; so that it may fairly be said that the guaranty was not subsequent to, but was contemporaneous with, the debt of the principal debtor. Independent of the testimony excluded by the circuit court, there was some evidence tending to show that the delivery of the machinery was induced by the guaranty. And we may further state that there was some evidence tending to show that Mrs. Browning received a benefit from the delivery of the machinery. When the machinery was delivered, and when the guaranty was executed, the partnership, Goldville Manufacturing Company, had merged into the corporation of that name, of which Mrs. Browning was a large stockholder and a director, J. S. Blalock being president, L. W. C. Blalock being treasurer, these being the only stockholders and directors. The machinery, upon its arrival at Goldville, S. C., consigned to the Goldville Manufacturing Company, was taken by the manager of the corporation and placed in its mill, and the circumstances are such as to make it extremely probable, to say the least of it, that at the time of the guaranty the Blalocks and Mrs. Browning were aware that such use would be made of the machinery when delivered.

The remaining grounds upon which the nonsuit was sought need not be particularly noticed in this connection, as the foregoing is sufficient to sustain the refusal of nonsuit. We may remark generally that we find nothing in the testimony which would have authorized the court to determine as matter of law that the contract of guaranty had been changed or altered so as to discharge the guarantor, or that there was such want of diligence on the part of the plaintiff in pursuing the principal debtor as would discharge the guarantor.

3. The fifth exception alleges that the circuit court erred in constructing the contract of November 19th to be a guaranty of payment instead of a guaranty of the collectibility of the debt. We think the court properly construed the contract. By it the parties agreed (1) to indorse the said notes to be given for deferred payments under the contract of July 9th; (2) to make good and pay the amounts which may be due plaintiff in accordance with said contract should the Goldville Manufacturing Company fail to pay for the machinery on the terms of the contract; (3) to make good and pay the amounts which may be due plaintiff in accordance with said contract in case the Goldville Manufacturing Company shall fail to pay any notes when due which are given in payment. It did not appear that any notes were ever received by plaintiff pursuant to the contract. While it is true L. W. C. Blalock testified that he mailed notes to plaintiff's company, Pawtucket, R. I., Mr. Jenks, president of the plaintiff company, testified that no notes were ever tendered to or received by the company. But this is immaterial, for, as we construe the contract, plaintiff's right to collect of Mrs. Browning the amount due for the machinery under the second stipulation of her contract cannot be affected by the failure to take the notes for deferred payments. And if any notes had in fact been received by plaintiff not indorsed as agreed in the first stipulation, still, in default of payment of such notes, Mrs. Browning, under the third stipulation, was obligated to pay the amounts due plaintiff, in accordance with the original contract. The guaranty was absolute, not conditional. "If A. guarantees expressly or by implication to pay the note of B. to C. provided B. does not pay it, he becomes absolutely liable for its payment immediately upon B.'s default, and is therefore deemed an absolute guarantor of the due payment of the note of B. to C. But if A. guarantees the collectibility or goodness of B.'s note to C., he does not absolutely guaranty its payment, but only that he will pay it in the event that C. shall test the collectibility or goodness of the note by regular prosecution of suit against B., and shall be unable by due and reasonable diligence to enforce its payment. And accordingly he is only deemed a conditional guarantor of payment." 2 Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 1769.

The construction of the contract practically disposes of the remaining exceptions by appellant, which are based upon the view that the guaranty was of collectibility merely. The contract of guaranty being an absolute engagement to pay according to the contract of July 19th if the principal debtor failed to pay, no notice to the guarantor of nonpayment was necessary. Carson v. Hill, 1 McMul. 76; Bank v. Hammond, 1 Rich. Law, 285. Whether such notice would be necessary in the case of a guaranty of a negotiable instrument need not be considered here, as the instrument or contract guaranteed in this case was not negotiable, in which case, certainly, there was no necessity to give notice of nonpayment to the guarantor. Savings Bank v. Strother, 28 S. C. 504, 6 S. E. 313.

The court declined to charge that it was the duty of plaintiff, under failure of the principal debtor to pay the debt, to pursue the principal debtor by legal process, and make diligent effort to collect the debt from the principal, but, on the contrary, charged: "Mere nonaction, passivity, or indulgence on the part of the plaintiff would not, as matter of law, discharge any of the guarantors from obligations under the guaranty to pay the debt, and nothing short of a valid contract upon sufficient legal consideration extending the time of payment of the contract or changing the terms of the contract would have the effect in law of releasing any of the guarantors, or unless the plaintiff had refused to take some legal step to collect the debt after positive request from the guarantor to do so." The refusal to charge as requested was proper under the principle stated in Savings Bank v. Strother, supra, and the charge is supported by numerous cases. Parnell v. Price, 3 Rich. Law, 121; Lang v. Brevard, 3 Strpb. Eq. 64; Hampton v. Levy, 1 McCord, Eq. 107; Jackson v. Patrick, 10 S. C. 200. Under the foregoing conclusions, the fifth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and twelfth exceptions must be overruled.

This leaves to be noticed the sixth and eleventh exceptions—the thirteenth exception being a duplication of the eleventh. These exceptions are as follows: "(6) Because he erred in charging the jury as follows: 'If you find in this case, as a matter of fact, there was a contract for the purchase of machinery, and after the time the contract was entered into by Mrs. Browning, that the machinery was not delivered at that time, but after that, that would be sufficient consideration; but, if not delivered, it would not.'" "(11) He erred in charging the jury, as requested by defendant, as follows: 'If the jury believes from the evidence that at the time of the execution of the guaranty of November 19, 1900, there was no valuable consideration for the execution of said guaranty, then such guaranty would be null and void;' and then modifying the same as follows: 'I charge you that, gentlemen, unless you should find from the testimony in this case that the guaranty was signed after the contract was made, and before the delivery of the machinery, that would constitute a sufficient consideration.' Under these it is argued that the charge complained of was, in effect, a charge with respect to the facts, in violation of the Constitution, but it is manifest that the exceptions do not specifically raise any such question. As we understand the charge, the court instructed the jury in accordance with the principle announced in considering the question of nonsuit above, viz., "that a guaranty for the payment of goods for which a contract of sale is made, though executed subsequently to the agreement of sale, is supported by a sufficient consideration if the goods are not delivered until after the guaranty."

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

PROVIDENCE MACH. CO. v. BROWNING et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Dec. 8, 1903.)

PARTNERSHIP QUESTION FOR JURY—ACTION ON GUARANTY—ALTERATION—NONSUIT—CONSIDERATION—RELEASE.

1. Where the question of partnership was in issue, and there was some evidence that the alleged partners had combined labor and capital for the common benefit, the issue should have been submitted to the jury, though all the defendants allege that one was not a partner.

2. Where, in an action on a guaranty, there was some evidence that the contract had been materially altered so as to discharge the guarantor, it was a matter of defense for the jury, and was no ground for a nonsuit.

3. A guaranty of payment for machinery after execution of the contract of sale, but before delivery, is based on a sufficient consideration.

4. Where a firm buys machinery, and it is shipped to a corporation of the same name, formed by the partners to carry on the same business at the same place, the question of the release of the guarantor by such alteration is for the jury.

5. It is unnecessary that a creditor should make demand on the principal debtor in order to hold a guarantor of payment, or give notice to the guarantor of nonpayment.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Laurens County; Carey, Special Judge.

Action by the Providence Machine Company against J. S. Blalock, L. W. C. Blalock, and M. E. Browning. From order of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

N. B. Dial and F. P. McGowan, for appellant. D. W. Robinson, Ferguson & Featherstone, and Johnstone & Welch, for respondents.

JONES, J. This is an appeal from an order of nonsuit. The action was against James S. Blalock, L. W. C. Blalock, and Mrs. M. E. Browning individually and as partners under the firm name of Goldville Manufacturing Company, and against the Goldville Manufacturing Company, a corporation of this state, being based: (1) Upon a contract in writing, dated July 30, 1900, for the purchase of machinery to the amount of $9,104.52, to be delivered by plaintiff to the firm of Goldville Manufacturing Company, about December 15, 1900, terms, one-half cash, one-fourth in six months, one-fourth in twelve months, deferred payments secured by bankable notes, bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum, this corporation being signed "Goldville Mfg. Co. L. W. C. Blalock." (2) Upon an instrument in writing dated September 7, 1900, signed "Goldville Mfg. Co., per J. S. Blalock," and by J. S. Blalock, L. W. C. Blalock, and M. E. Browning, which, after reciting the terms of the contract of July 30th, above, contained these stipulations: "We hereby agree to indorse the said notes, and should the Goldville Mfg. Co. fail to pay for the said machinery on terms of contract made between themselves and Providence Machine Co., dated July 30th, 1900, or shall fail to pay any notes when due, which are given in payment, we the undersigned do hereby bind and obligate ourselves, jointly and severally, each with the other, and with the Providence Machine Co. to make good and pay the Providence Machine Co. the amounts which may be due them in accordance with the contract above mentioned." (3) Upon a note dated May 1, 1901, executed by Goldville Manufacturing Company, J. S. Blalock, president, L. W. C. Blalock, secretary and treasurer, and indorsed by J. S. Blalock and L. W. C. Blalock, promising to pay to the order of Providence Machine Company, six months after date, $2,317.10, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum. The complaint demanded judgment for $2,317.10, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum from May 1, 1901.

The Goldville Manufacturing Company was incorporated on October 22 or 23, 1900, but thereafter, becoming insolvent, was placed in the hands of a receiver in December, 1901, before the commencement of this action. The machinery was duly shipped to the Goldville Manufacturing Company about the 10th or 13th of December, 1900, was received, and was placed in the mill being in process of construction by the corporation, Goldville Manufacturing Company, which had been begun by the partnership, Goldville Manufacturing Company, at Goldville, S. C., in July or August, 1900. The cash payment was made 31st January, 1901, but notes for deferred payments were not taken upon the delivery of the machinery. But on May 1, 1901, two notes, one of which is set forth in the complaint, were received by the plaintiff. Neither note was indorsed by M. E. Browning, and, so far as appears, they were not presented to her for indorsement. The issues in the case arose upon the contest of Mrs. M. E. Browning that she was not a partner in the Goldville Manufacturing Company firm, and that she was not liable upon guaranty.

The motion for nonsuit was made upon the following grounds: "(1) Because there is no evidence that Mrs. Browning was a partner at the time this debt sued on herein was contracted, and there is no evidence that she was to become at any time liable for the debt sued on herein. (2) Because the contract sued on herein is without any valuable consideration, and is therefore void. (3) Because the undisputed evidence offered by the defendants shows that the guaranty sued on herein is for and of the performance of the contract of date July 30, 1900, in accordance with the terms thereof, and that the guarantor, Mrs. Browning, has been released and discharged from liability on the guaranty: First. In that it appears from plaintiff's undisputed evidence that the contract was made by the partnership firm of J. S. and L. W. C. Blalock, under the firm name of Goldville Manufacturing Co., prior to the creation or existence of the corporation hereinafter named, and the said contract was for the delivery of the machinery therein mentioned to said partnership, while in fact, and subsequent to the contract and guaranty, the machinery was delivered by the plaintiff to the corporation, Goldville Manufacturing Co., of Goldville, South Carolina, and this change in the said contract was made without the knowledge or approval of Mrs. M. E. Browning, the guarantor sued herein. (4) In that the plaintiff failed to require the cash payment provided for in the said contract of July 30, 1900, and failed to require the execution of the notes, as provided in said contract or within a reasonable time thereafter, but, on the contrary, waived and assented to a change in time for such cash payment, and assented and agreed to waive the execution of the notes as provided for in the contract, and agreed to accept the bonds of the company in lieu of the notes and in payment of the debt, all without the knowledge or assent of Mrs. M. E. Browning, the guarantor, sued herein. (5) Because the plaintiff had failed to allege and show that it used diligence: First. On making demand of the principal debtors at the time of the delivery of the machinery, or within a reasonable time thereafter, for the first cash payment, and for the execution and indorsement of the notes for the balance, in accordance with the terms of the contract of July 30, 1900. Second. In failing to prosecute the principal debtors promptly, and in a reasonable time after their failure to comply with the said contract of July 30, 1900, for such failure and to collect its said debts. Third. In giving notice to Mrs. M. E. Browning, the guarantor sued therein, promptly, and within a reasonable time after it happened, that the principal debtors had failed to keep and comply with their contract of July 30, 1900, as to cash payment and as to the giving and indorsements of the notes. Fourth. Because the evidence shows that the breach after the contract guaranty occurred in December, 1900, or January, 1901, and the only and first notice that was given this guarantor was the paper signed by O. A. Robbins, of date November 7, 1901. (6) The evidence shows that the plaintiff has failed to use due diligence: First. In making demand on the principal debtor at the time of the delivery of the machinery, or within a reasonable time thereafter, for the first cash payment, and for the execution and indorsement of the notes for the balance, in accordance with the terms of the contract of July 30, 1900. Second. In failing to prosecute the principal debtors promptly, and within a reasonable time after their failure to comply with said contract, for such failure, and to collect its said debt. Third. In giving notice to Mrs. M. E. Browning, the guarantor sued herein, promptly, and within a reasonable time after it happened, that the principal debtors had failed to keep and comply with their said contract of July 30, 1900, as to the cash payment and as to the giving and indorsement of the said notes. (7) Because there is no evidence that Mrs. Browning guaranteed the payment of the notes sued on herein, but, on the contrary, the plaintiffs' evidence shows that it is a different note from the guaranty. (8) Because the undisputed evidence shows that the plaintiff accepted the note sued on herein, and waived those provided for in the contract of guaranty by accepting the notes of the principal debtor, and there is no evidence that Mrs. Browning consented to such change, and that the plaintiffs waived their right to proceed against loss on the guaranty."

Hon. J. P. Carey, Special Judge, presiding, granted the following order of nonsuit:

"This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant on a contract made with L. W. C. Blalock, as Goldville Manufacturing Co., and on a contract of guaranty afterwards made by the defendants Mrs. M. E. Browning and others, guarantying the payment of the purchase money of said machinery according to the terms of said contract of purchase. Plaintiff also claims that Mrs. Browning and others are liable as partners. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, the defendant Mrs. Browning moved for a nonsuit on various grounds, which are set out in the record. I think the nonsuit should be granted for two reasons:

"First. There is no testimony showing or tending to show that Mrs. Browning was ever a partner in firm of Goldville Manufacturing Co. Her only connection with the company was as a stockholder in the corporation, which corporation was chartered after the contract was made.

"Second. Plaintiff's own testimony shows the following state of facts: That the contract for the purchase of the machinery provided for the delivery some time in December, 1900; that it was delivered in December, 1900; that one-half of the purchase money was to be paid upon the delivery, one-fourth of balance in six months thereafter, and the other fourth in twelve months thereafter; that bankable notes were to be taken for the deferred payments, and that the guarantors were to indorse said notes; that the cash payment provided for in the contract was made in the early part of the year 1901, but that no notes as provided for in the contract were given at that time; that on May 1, 1901, the notes of Goldville Manufacturing Co., signed on back 'J. S. and L. W. C. Blalock,' were given for deferred payments; that the said notes matured in six months and twelve months from May 1, 1901; that said notes were accepted by plaintiff in 'settlement' of the account for said machinery, and plaintiff sent Goldville Manufacturing Co. a statement showing the acceptance of the notes in 'settlement'; that Mrs. Browning had no knowledge of, nor did she acquiesce in, said change of contract.

"I hold that these facts show a change in, and material alteration of, the contract of guaranty, on the strict terms of which the guarantor had a right to stand, and that such change of contract operated in law as a release of the guarantor. It is therefore ordered that the nonsuit be granted, and the complaint be dismissed."

We think the court erred in granting the nonsuit. While it is true that J. S. Blalock testified that Mrs. Browning was never interested in the cotton mill before the incorporation of the Goldville Manufacturing Company, he also testified that her teams were used without compensation in the erection of the mill. Mrs. Browning also testified that she was not a partner in the Goldville Manufacturing Company, but, beginning at folio 172, she further testified: "My father is J. S. Blalock, and L. W. C. Blalock is my brother. I was at Goldville, at my brother's, most of the summer of 1900. I had what interest my father chose to give me in the Goldville Manufacturing Company. Q. Did you deed your interest in the oil mill and ginnery at Goldville to the Goldville Manufacturing Company, and also to some land to the Goldville Manufacturing Company? (Objected to by Col. Ferguson as secondary, as the papers will show better.) A. If it was necessary, I did, but I don't remember now. Before the Goldville Manufacturing Company was chartered, I consented to sign a guaranty. Q. In July, 1900, were you not interested in building a cotton mill at Goldville? (Objected to by Col. Ferguson on the ground that it is incompetent and irrelevant, being before this action was commenced.) A. Well, in a manner I was. Father and brother were the prime movers in the transaction. J. S. Blalock, my father, was anxious to get my consent, as he wanted to use the proceeds of some of my property. I acquiesced in so far as to sign some papers. I knew my brother, L. W. C. Blalock, went on to buy machinery. I was very much opposed to the whole transaction. I did not take any stock in the mill. I was never asked to take any. I was led to believe that I would have some stock, but I did not know how much or how little. No script was ever issued to me. My father had the management of my plantation for years. My brother, L. W. C. Blalock, looked after my interest in the mill. Before the mill was chartered, I think they were to borrow the money, and make a family affair of it. My father was to secure my consent about the time they contemplated building the mill, some time during the summer of 1900. I never was in favor of the mill, but after the machinery was bought I was asked to sign the contract, and I did. I did not know that my brother was using any name in regard to building the mill, but I suppose it would be natural to speak of it in this way, as we were the only persons interested. Q. Why was the mill incorporated? A. I do not know, but I thought it was better. I did not acquiesce, in so many words, but after it was done I thought it was best." If J. S. Blalock, L. W. C. Blalock, and Mrs. M. E. Browning combined capital, labor, or skill for the purpose of business for common benefit, they were partners, notwithstanding their mere declarations to the contrary. The foregoing certainly afforded some testimony that they were partners, which should have been submitted to the jury to determine its sufficiency to establish the issue raised.

With reference to the second ground of nonsuit. On the cross-examination of plaintiff's witness, defendant proved and introduced in evidence a letter dated May 6, 1901, addressed to Goldville Manufacturing Company, in which receipt of the two notes of May 1, 1901, was acknowledged, and which contained these words, "Inclosed please find statement in settlement." This accompanying statement of account, after crediting account with the two notes, concluded with these words: "Settled as above, May 6th, 1901. [Signed] Providence Machine Company, F. Pierce;" the letter being signed, "W. C. Pierce, Treas." These facts the circuit judge considered as conclusively establishing that the contract of guaranty had been materially altered, so as to discharge the guarantor. This was a matter of defense, and for the jury to determine. In the case of Wallingford & Russell v. Railroad Company, 28 S. C. 258, 2 S. E. 19, the court held that the defendant is not entitled to a nonsuit upon the strength of a written contract introduced by him upon the cross-examination of one of the plaintiff's witnesses. The same principle has been frequently applied in insurance cases, in which the court held nonsuit improper, even though matter of defense, as forfeiture of policy, be brought out during the examination of plaintiff's witness. Sample v. Insurance Co., 42 S. C. 14, 19 S. E. 1020; Copeland v. Assurance Company, 43 S. C. 23, 20 S. E. 754; Carpenter v. Accident Co., 46 S. C. 546, 24 S. E. 500. At folio 141, Wm. O. Pierce, the president and treasurer of plaintiff company, testified that these notes "were given to secure payment of the balance due, and not in settlement of account or otherwise." The notes were signed by the Goldville Manufacturing Company as a corporation, of which Mrs. M. E. Browning was stockholder, if not also director, which corporation had taken and used the machinery for which the notes were given. So that, assuming that the acceptance of the notes by plaintiff would be evidence of an extension of the time of payment in alteration of the original contract, it should have been left to the jury to say whether Mrs. Browning had knowledge of and acquiesced in the extension of the time of payment and the substitution of the name of the corporation for that of the partnership as a maker of the notes.

Respondent has given notice in the record that, in case the court does not sustain the nonsuit on the grounds taken by the circuit court, she will ask that the nonsuit be sustained upon the other grounds urged in the motion and set out above. These grounds substantially are: (1) That there was no testimony to show any consideration for the contract of guaranty; (2) that the contract of guaranty was altered, in that the machinery was delivered by plaintiff to the corporation Goldville Manufacturing Company, when the contract provided for a delivery to the partnership Goldville Manufacturing Company; (3) the evidence showed want of diligence on part of plaintiff in notifying defendant of the default of the principal and in failing to prosecute the principal debtor promptly, etc.

The first ground has been considered in the recent case of Fales & Jenks Machine Co. v. Mrs. M. E. Browning, 46 S. E. 545, wherein the court held that "a guaranty for the payment of goods for which a contract of sale is made, though executed subsequently to the agreement of sale, is supported by a sufficient consideration if the goods are not delivered until after the guaranty." The contract of guaranty in this case was made September 7, 1900, and the goods were not delivered until in December, 1900.

The second question, in so far as it was material, was a question for the jury. The evidence tended to show that the machinery was shipped to the party ordering it, the Goldville Manufacturing Company, and that plaintiff at that time was not aware that the Goldville Manufacturing Company had become incorporated. The evidence further tended to show that the corporation was formed for the purpose of carrying on the business begun by the partnership and to raise money for the purpose by floating the corporate bonds; that the partnership and the corporation had the same name, business, and location; that the stockholders of the corporation were J. S. Blalock, L. W. C. Blalock, and Mrs. M. E. Browning, and that J. S. Blalock was president and L. W. C. Blalock secretary and treasurer; that Mrs. Browning was present at some of the meetings of the stockholders; that her brother, L. W. C. Blalock, looked after the interest of Mrs. Browning in the mill; that her father, J. S. Blalock, looked after the management of her plantation adjoining the mill property; that before the mill was chartered they were to borrow the money, and make a family affair of it. Under these circumstances a court would hardly be justified in taking the question from the jury, and deciding as matter of law that the contract of guaranty was altered so as to discharge Mrs. Browning as guarantor, merely because the corporation took and used the machinery ordered by the partnership.

With reference to the third question, above—as to the discharge of the guarantor because of the alleged want of diligence in pursuing the principal debtor—in the case of Fales & Jenks Machine Co. v. Mrs. M. E. Browning, supra, this court construed a contract of guaranty in terms identical with the contract in this case. Under like construction, the contract in question is not a guaranty of collectibility, but a guaranty of payment, provided the Goldville Manufacturing Company failed to do so. It is not a conditional guaranty, but an absolute guaranty. Under such a contract it is not essential, to hold the guarantor, that the creditor should make demands for payment of the principal debtor, give notice of nonpayment to the guarantor, nor to use diligence in pursuing the principal debtor by the use of legal process. Savings Bank v. Strother, 23 S. C. 506, 6 S. E. 313.

Having reached the conclusion that the nonsuit must be set aside and a new trial granted, we do not deem it important to consider the remaining exceptions.

The judgment of nonsuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for a new trial.

EJECTMENT—EQUITABLE DEFENSE—DEED—CONSIDERATION—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. In ejectment, a defense that the deed under which plaintiff claims was obtained by fraud, and should be canceled, can be set up to defeat the action.

2. Parol evidence as to true consideration of a deed under which plaintiff claims in eject-ment, and the manner in which it was to be paid, is not inadmissible as contradicting the written instrument.

3. Parol evidence is admissible to contradict or explain a deed, if the facts alleged as to the manner of obtaining it show fraud.

Action by Mabel Wilcox and Eleanor Wilcox against D. R. Priester. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

L. L. Tobin, for appellants. Bates & Sims, for respondent.

JONES, J. This action was brought for the recovery of real estate, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant. Plaintiffs' appeal involves the admissibility of certain parol testimony affecting the operation of the deed under which plaintiffs claimed. On the 18th day of January, 1895, the defendant executed a fee-simple warranty deed in the usual form, purporting to convey the land in dispute to W. P. Wilcox, under whom the plaintiffs claim as his heirs at law. The consideration expressed in the deed was $500. After the death of Wilcox, which occurred on the 18th day of June, 1900, the deed was found among his papers, unprobated and unrecorded, and was probated and recorded about the 23d September, 1901. Ever since the signing of the deed the defendant retained the undisputed possession of the land covered by the deed, paying the taxes, attorning to no one, and otherwise exercising exclusive dominion over said land. Among other defenses, defendant alleged: "(1) That on the 16th day of November, A. D. 1891, the defendant executed and delivered to one W. P. Wilcox, lately of the said state and county, his certain bond and mortgage, bearing said date, and thereby promised to pay to the said Wilcox, his certain attorneys, executors, administrators, and assigns, the sum of $336.68, the purpose being to secure at that time the balance due on all accounts by the said defendant to the said Wilcox. (2) That on the 18th day of January, 1895, the defendant agreed with the said Wilcox to convey to him the land covered by the said mortgage, the description of which is set forth in the complaint, for the sum and price of $600, out of which sum the said mortgage was to be paid, and the balance turned over to this defendant. (3) That in pursuance of said agreement defendant signed the said deed presented to him by the said Wilcox, being informed that it provided as the consideration the said sum of $600, and the same was retained in the possession of the said Wilcox. (4) That defendant demanded the said difference from the said Wilcox, but to his surprise the said Wilcox refused to comply with said demand, informing defendant that he could trade it out, and that he would hold the deed as security for future advances.

This defendant declined peremptorily to accede to, and demanded a return of the paper, which was refused. That the said deed was repudiated by the said defendant, and he retained possession of the land covered thereby, and still retains such possession undisturbed by the said Wilcox during the latter's life and until now."

It appears in the brief: "At the trial of this case on the circuit the plaintiffs introduced the deed above mentioned, the execution of which was admitted. The defendant admitted that he was in possession of the land, and that the plaintiffs were the heirs at law of Wilcox, and the plaintiffs rested their case, whereupon the defendant tendered the testimony of himself and E. H. Williams and Perry Jackson to prove an agreement between the defendant and the said Wilcox at the time of the execution of the said deed, together with the conditions upon which the same was executed, and which evidence was to the effect that out of the purchase price the said Wilcox was to satisfy a certain mortgage of the defendant to him, and pay the difference in cash to the said defendant, and which, after the execution of the said deed, the said Wilcox failed and refused to do, and, on the contrary, required the defendant to trade the balance out in his store, which, being in violation of the agreement of purchase, the defendant declined to agree to, and, upon Wilcox insisting, the defendant repudiated the transaction, and the difference in cash above stated was not paid to Priester, nor did Wilcox satisfy of record the mortgage. To this testimony the plaintiffs objected on the following grounds: That the consideration of this deed could not be impeached as a matter of defense in this action, there being no fraud alleged; that parol testimony was inadmissible in this action to establish a contemporaneous parol agreement between Wilcox and Priester, and a nonperformance of such agreement by Wilcox, or a breach by Wilcox of a parol promise made by him as the alleged consideration upon which the deed was executed to him by Priester, for the purpose of defeating the plaintiffs' right to recovery in this action. The court overruled these objections, and allowed the testimony to the above effect to go to the jury, except the testimony of the defendant, which was ruled out under section 400, Code. The defendant then rested his case, and, nothing being offered in reply, the judge charged the jury that it was for them to consider whether the defendant had satisfied them that at the time of the execution of the said deed there existed a parol agreement between the defendant and the said Wilcox which was the basis of the execution of the said deed, and whether the said Wilcox was to deliver the consideration of the said deed to the said defendant by the satisfaction of the mortgage and the payment in cash to him of the balance of the purchase money, as alleged in the answer, and whether Wilcox, upon the execution of the said deed, failed or refused to comply with such parol agreement; and if the jury should find that such agreement did exist at said time, and that said Wilcox had, in derogation of said agreement, failed or refused to comply therewith—that is, by the satisfaction of the said mortgage and the payment of the balance of the purchase price in cash to the defendant—then the above failure would be a good defense to the plaintiffs' recovery in this action."

The appellants' exceptions challenge the correctness of the above rulings and charge.

We think there was no error. Under the Code, "wherever equity confers a right, and the right avails to defeat a legal cause of action, that it shows that the plaintiff ought not to recover in his legal action, then the facts from which such right arises may be set up as an equitable defense in bar." Pom. Rem. § 92. In actions to recover possession of lands it is a common defense to set up a right to the cancellation of a conveyance on the ground of fraud, so as to defeat plaintiff's action. Id. § 94; Watts v. Witt, 39 S. C. 366, 17 S. E. 822. The answer in this case, while not specifically charging fraud in terms, states facts from which fraud is inferable. It alleged an agreement under which Priester was to convey the land to Wilcox in consideration of $600, a part of which was to be paid by the satisfaction of a mortgage on said land held by Wilcox, and the remainder was to be paid in cash; that Wilcox represented that the deed expressed $600 as the consideration, whereas the consideration named in the deed was only $500; and that Wilcox, after receiving the deed, refused to pay the consideration. To deprive one of his land under such circumstances would operate as a fraud. Where the payment of the consideration upon which a deed of land is based is contemplated by the parties as a consideration of a completed transaction, the grantor in possession cannot be deprived of his possession by virtue of such deed at the suit of grantee or his heirs at law who refuse to comply with such condition. In such case the law will not compel the grantor to deliver possession and remand him to an action for the consideration or for specific performance. Where there is a charge of fraud in obtaining a deed of conveyance, parol testimony is admissible to contradict, vary, or explain it. Lee v. Lee, 11 Rich. Eq. 582. Furthermore, in so far as the testimony related to the true consideration of the deed, and the manner in which it was to be paid, it did not violate the rule which excludes parol testimony to contradict a written instrument. Curry v. Lyles, 2 Hill, 403; Calvet v. Nickles, 26 S. C. 310, 2 S. E. 116.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

GLENN v. RUDD.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 18, 1904.)

PAROL CONTRACT—VALIDITY—SATISFACTION OF MORTGAGE—MERGER.

1. Where, on conveyance by the mortgagor to the mortgagee, it is agreed that such conveyance shall not constitute a merger and satisfaction of the mortgage, the contract is valid, though made in parol.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Saluda County.

Action by Lizzie Glenn against W. G. Rudd for dower. From circuit order sustaining judgment of probate court in sustaining demurrer to answer, defendant appeals. Reversed.

El. S. Blease and G. T. Graham, for appellant. B. W. Crouch and O. J. Ramage, for respondent.

WOODS, J. The defendant sets up as one of his defenses to the plaintiff's complaint for dower, filed in the probate court for Saluda county, that in 1891 S. H. Rudd, his grantor, who was the real owner of the land, and her husband, C. F. Rudd, made a deed of conveyance covering the land described in the complaint to Berry Glenn, Jr., plaintiff's husband, who contemporaneously executed a mortgage to S. H. Rudd and her husband for the purchase money, upon which plaintiff renounced her right of dower; that Berry Glenn, Jr., being unable to pay the mortgage, reconveyed the land to S. H. Rudd, and that "at the time Berry Glenn, Jr., conveyed said premises unto the said S. H. Rudd it was expressly stipulated and agreed by and between the said parties that the mortgage that was executed by Berry Glenn, Jr., to said S. H. Rudd and C. F. Rudd to secure the payment of the purchase money of said premises as aforesaid should stand open to protect S. H. Rudd from dower and other liens and incumbrances thereon, and the defendant avers that said mortgage was not extinguished, but still stands open, and, if plaintiff ever had any right of dower in said premises (which this defendant again specifically denies), the same is subordinate to the said mortgage." The plaintiff demurred to this defense "for the reason that it is not alleged that said agreement and stipulation was in writing, and contained in the deed from Berry Glenn, Jr., to Mrs. S. H. Rudd in the form of a covenant." The demurrer was sustained by the probate judge, and on appeal to the circuit judge his judgment was affirmed.

There are a number of exceptions, but the decisive question is whether an agreement that a mortgage shall not be merged in the title and be satisfied when the mortgagee takes title to the mortgaged property is without effect unless reduced to writing and incorporated in the deed of conveyance. In the leading case of Agnew v. R. R. Co., 24 S. C. 18, 58 Am. Rep. 237, it was held that an express agreement, which was inserted in the conveyance to the mortgagee, that the mortgage should remain open, prevented merger and satisfaction of the mortgage. It is true, the court said in Bleckley v. Brannan, 26 S. C. 424, 2 S. E. 319, "We cannot venture to go further in relieving a mortgagee who purchases the mortgage property than was indicated in the case of Agnew v. R. R. Co., supra." And in Agnew v. Renwick, 27 S. C. 572, 4 S. E. 223, it is said the only exception to the rule recognized in this state that the purchase of the mortgaged property by the mortgagee will extinguish the mortgage is that established in Agnew v. R. R. Co. Both these cases, however, and Navassa Guano Co. v. Richardson, 26 S. C. 401, 2 S. E. 307, were decided on the ground that there was no evidence, either written or parol, of any agreement that the mortgage should remain open. The decision in Agnew v. R. R. Co. is based on the ground that there was an agreement that the mortgage should remain open. There is not the slightest intimation in the opinion that the fact that the agreement was evidenced by the insertion in the deed added anything to its efficacy. Taking the view adopted by our court, it cannot be doubted it is the contract between the parties that prevents the merger. All parol contracts are valid unless required by statute to be in writing, and in the absence of any statutory provision we can see no ground upon which a court can hold that a contract against merger must be in writing, or be inserted in a particular instrument.

The view taken in the cases above referred to, that an express contract is necessary under all circumstances to prevent satisfaction of the mortgage by conveyance to the mortgagee, seems to be at variance with that adopted in most other jurisdictions, and, indeed, not in accordance with the authorities cited with approval in the leading opinion in Agnew v. R. R. Co. Even in those states where, as in this state, the mortgagee has not title to the land, but merely a lien for the debt, it has been generally held that a merger will not result from conveyance of the land to the mortgagee where there is an intervening incumbrance, even where there is no evidence of any agreement to that effect, because, unless there is actual proof of an intention to satisfy the mortgage, it is presumed the mortgagee does not intend to release his security when it is necessary for his protection against such intervening incumbrance. Scrivner v. Dietz (Cal.) 24 Pac. 171; Woodward v. Davis (Iowa) 6 N. W. 74; Gibbs v. Johnson (Mich.) 62 N. W. 145; Millsaugh v. McBride, 34 Am. Dec. 360; Hitchcock v. Nixon (Wash.) 47 Pac. 412; Insurance Co. v. Murphy, 111 U. S. 745, 4 Sup. Ct. 679, 28 L. Ed. 582. This view of merger seems to receive support from the opinions of this court in Michalson v. Myrick, 47 S. C. 297, 25 S. E. 162, and Lipscomb v. Goode, 57 S. C. 182, 35 S. E. 493, though the rights of purchasing mortgagee were not involved in these two cases. Upon this question of presumption, however, we express no opinion, because it is not involved in this case, but, in view of the adjudications in other jurisdictions and the apparent difficulty of reconciling the doctrine stated in Michalson v. Myrick and Lipscomb v. Goode with that held in Agnew v. Renwick, Bleckley v. Brannan, and Navassa Guano Co. v. Richardson, we are certainly unwilling to extend the rule laid down in the three cases last mentioned by holding that the contract against merger and satisfaction of a mortgage by conveyance to the mortgagee must necessarily be in writing, and inserted in the conveyance.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed.

AARON v. SOUTHERN RY.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Jan. 18, 1904.)

CARRIERS — BREACH OF CONTRACT — COMPLAINT — EVIDENCE — PUNITIVE DAMAGES — BEST AND SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

1. Where a complaint charges that defendant railroad company "wrongfully and unlawfully" required plaintiff to alight from the train, such words did not assign specific legal character to the acts of defendants, and must be disregarded.

2. Evidence that on account of a wreck the engine was detached from the train and used to carry a Pullman car to another point, delaying the train for hours, does not support an allegation that the act was done wantonly and willfully.

3. Where allegations that an act was done willfully and wantonly were not sustained, there can be no recovery for punitive damages for mental suffering.

4. Where there has been no notice on the conductor of a train to produce a written order, parol evidence of its contents is inadmissible.

Appeal from Common Pleas Circuit Court of Barnwell County; J. C. McDonald, Special Judge.

Action by J. B. Aaron against the Southern Railway. Plaintiff appeals from order of nonsuit. Affirmed.

Davis & Best and Jno. S. Reynolds, for appellant. Joseph W. Barnwell, for respondent.

WOODS, J. This is an appeal from an order of nonsuit. The complaint alleged, in substance, that plaintiff, on January 17, 1903, purchased a ticket over the defendant's road from Augusta, Ga., to Barnwell, S. C., and took a train leaving Augusta at 6 o'clock p. m., relying on the assurance of the defendant's agent that it would arrive in Barnwell at about 9 o'clock on the same day; that the train, on reaching Blackville, only 10 miles from Barnwell, was held there six or seven hours, so that plaintiff, who was anxious to get to his home in Barnwell on account of sickness in his family, did not reach his destination until 3 or 4 o'clock the next morning. It is charged that the defendant, at Blackville, "willfully, wantonly, wrongfully, and unlawfully" required plaintiff to alight from the train, and "willfully, wantonly, wrongfully, and unlawfully" refused to convey him to Barnwell according to its advertised schedule and the representations of its agents to the plaintiff. The plaintiff thus states his damages: "That on account of the foregoing facts the plaintiff was compelled to stay at Blackville, S. C., until the early part of the next morning, caused to suffer great mental anguish and anxiety in being kept away from his family, who were home sick, and in the manner in which he was treated, as aforesaid, he has been damaged in the sum of nineteen hundred and fifty dollars." The defense was a general denial, and that the delay was due to an "unexpected accident to one of the trains of defendant," which reasonable care could not have provided against.

1. The indefinite words "wrongfully and unlawfully" do not assign specific legal character to the acts of the defendants, and must be disregarded. Tutt v. Ry. Co., 28 S. C. 388, 5 S. E. 831.

2. The alleged wrongful and unlawful acts being described as wanton and willful, if the plaintiff could recover at all, the verdict could only embrace punitive, and not compensatory, damages. There is no evidence that the defendant required the plaintiff to leave the car at Blackville or treated him with rudeness or disrespect. The plaintiff introduced evidence to the effect that when the train arrived at Blackville the conductor was notified of a wreck on another branch of the road, and, in pursuance of orders issued on account of the wreck, he left the Barnwell cars at Blackville, and used his engine to carry the Pullman car, which he brought from Augusta, on to Columbia. That an emergency had arisen affecting the management of the Barnwell cars and the Pullman car seems very manifest. The question is not whether the railroad authorities acted with the best judgment, or even reasonable discretion, in forwarding the Pullman car and delaying the Barnwell cars. If the delay was unreasonable, the plaintiff could have sustained an action for actual damages, such as expenses, loss of time, etc. Fort v. Ry. Co., 64 S. C. 424, 42 S. E. 196. But the plaintiff staked his case on the charge that the action of the defendant indicated a willful or wanton disregard of the duty it owed the plaintiff to convey him to his destination with reasonable dispatch. We are unable to discover the slightest evidence of intentional or wanton disregard of this duty.

3. The judgment cannot be reversed on the ground that the plaintiff was subjected to mental suffering in being kept from his sick family, for there could be no recovery of punitive damages for mental suffering when the plaintiff failed to sustain his charge of wanton and willful wrong. Lewis v. Tel. Co., 57 S. C. 381, 35 S. E. 556.

4. The presiding judge held it to be incompetent for the plaintiff to state the contents of the written order received by the conductor. No notice had been given to produce the order itself, which was the best evidence, and it was therefore proper to exclude a parol statement of its contents. But aside from this, the plaintiff seems to have told all he knew of the order, as the following question and answer show: "Q. Well, what was on the order? A. Well, I did not read the order myself, but I knew it was the order. Capt. Murry said, 'There is the order to get off to Columbia, and come here and sign it.'"

The plaintiff further insists that there was error in refusing to allow him to tell the reason the conductor gave for sending the engine to Columbia. It appears from the following questions and answers that the plaintiff also told all he knew on this subject: "Q. What did Capt. Murry tell you that he had to go to Columbia for? A. Well, after he got this order, he did not tell me why. Q. Did you hear him say? A. Well, I may have. I don't know whether I did or not. I heard him call in his engineer and make him sign this train order, and stated that the order was for Columbia."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

SPRINKLE v. DUTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 2, 1904.)

EQUITY—DISMISSAL OF BILL—JURISDICTION—ESTOPPEL TO DENY.

1. A decree, upon a full hearing upon the merits, dismissing a bill in which two distinct causes of action between the same parties are united, one purely legal and the other purely equitable, containing no clause saving to the complainant her remedies as to the former cause of action, and failing to state, or in any way make it appear, that as to it the dismissal was for want of jurisdiction, is erroneous.

2. In such case the complainant is not estopped from denying the jurisdiction of the court below on appeal, but costs in the appellate court will be decreed to the appellee, as the party substantially prevailing, if the appellant has failed to ask for the insertion of such saving clause in the trial court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ritchie County; M. H. Wilks, Judge.

Bill by M. K. Sprinkle against M. K. Duty and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Modified.

J. Newman, for appellant. Duty & Ireland, J. W. Fidler, and Sherman Robinson, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, P. M. K. Sprinkle, a married woman, appeals from a decree of the circuit court of Ritchie county dismissing, upon a full hearing upon the merits, her bill in equity against M. K. Duty, in a suit brought to set aside a sale of a lot of land, containing 33 square rods, made under a deed of trust executed by her May 4, 1895, to secure the payment of a note for $334.95, executed by her and her husband to said Duty, and another sale of another lot, containing something more than an acre of land, made under an order of attachment in an action of debt brought by Duty to obtain satisfaction of a balance due on his debt after applying thereon the proceeds of the sale made under the deed of trust. They were adjoining lots, lying in or near the town of Pennsboro, in said county, and were the separate property of Mrs. Sprinkle.

The correctness of so much of the decree as disposes of the matters alleged against the soundness of the sale under the deed of trust is not questioned on this appeal. Failure to except to it, however, does not preclude the court from making inquiry respecting it, and an examination of the pleadings and evidence relating to that sale has been made, without finding anything for which it is believed the sale ought to be set aside. The complaint against the decree is that the court failed to insert in it a clause saving to the plaintiff her right to appear in the attachment suit and have the same reheard, as, by the provisions of section 25 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899, she may do within the time and in the manner therein specified, she having been proceeded against as a non-resident, without service of process upon her.

The bill presents two distinct matters, one of which is the alleged ground of relief against the sale under the deed of trust, and the other the ground for relief against the sale under the order of attachment. That the former is a matter cognizable by courts of equity is too well known and settled to require any citation of authority. It is conceded by counsel on both sides. As to whether so much of the bill as relates to the attachment sale presents a cause of action of which equity can take jurisdiction, and, if not, whether, by her conduct in submitting it to such court and inducing it to act upon it, the appellant is precluded from prosecuting this appeal, counsel differ, it being insisted upon the one side that, as equity had jurisdiction of part of the subject-matter of the bill, the court could properly go on and determine all questions presented by it, although one of the matters involved was purely legal, and that, if this be not true, the appellant cannot complain of errors which she has induced the court to commit; while, on the other hand, it is said the court could not take jurisdiction of the attachment proceeding, even by consent of the parties.

The two subjects of the bill are so far separate that either may be disposed of without in any way affecting the other. Relief in the one neither depends upon nor necessitates relief in the other. The trust sale could be set aside on sufficient grounds and the trust property resold for the debt, less the amount realized from the attachment, or the attachment sale could be set aside and the attached property resold for the debt, less the amount realized from the trust sale. It is true Mrs. Sprinkle held both pieces of land under the same deed as a single tract, and both were sold for parts of the same debt, and to the same man; but, for the purposes of sale, she had separated them by her deed of trust, and the sales and proceedings relating thereto are the things complained of, and, as to each sale, the pleadings and evidence differ, and present separate and divers issues. Hence they are wholly distinct and separate causes of action, if both could be treated as equitable causes. But as to jurisdiction they are also foreign to each other, the one belonging to exclusive equity jurisdiction, and the other being an action prosecuted to judgment and execution on the law side of the court, and in which further proceedings, by way of review, may be had by express statutory provision. It is a cause of action of which the law court has not only potential, but actual, jurisdiction. Moreover, it is one for which there is a full and adequate remedy at law, specifically prescribed by statute, and it is elementary law that in such case equity has no jurisdiction. Miller v. Miller, 25 W. Va. 495; Bier v. Smith, 25 W. Va. 830; Coombs v. Shisler, 47 W. Va. 373, 34 S. E. 763; Meze v. Mayse, 6 Rand. 660.

Conceding this proposition, counsel for appellee say jurisdiction to pass upon the trust sale proceeding gave the right to pass upon the other, although purely legal in its nature, upon the principle enunciated in Hickman v. Painter, 11 W. Va. 386, and numerous other cases. This is clearly an effort to apply that principle where it has no application. Where there is ground for equitable interposition as to a single cause of action, in respect to which strict equity jurisdiction stops short of final relief and full determination of all questions involved in that cause, it will go on and complete it, passing upon purely legal questions. The language of the rule, as stated by the courts, confines it to the merits of the cause and matters involved in it. Hotchkiss v. Fitzgerald Co., 41 W. Va. 357, 23 S. E. 576; Hanly v. Watterson, 39 W. Va. 214, 19 S. E. 536; Yates v. Stuart's Adm'r, 39 W. Va. 124, 19 S. E. 423; Hall v. Wilkinson, 35 W. Va. 167, 12 S. E. 1118; Handy v. Scott, 26 W. Va. 710. To give the principle wider application would contravene one of the most rigid and ancient rules of equity procedure. A bill setting up two or more equitable causes of action between the same parties is multifarious and fatally bad. Zell Guano Co. v. Heatherly, 38 W. Va. 409, 18 S. E. 611; Petty v. Fogle, 16 W. Va. 497; Orickard v. Crouch's Adm'r, 41 W. Va. 503, 23 S. E. 727. A bill uniting a purely legal demand with an equitable demand is not multifarious, because the allegations as to the former confer no jurisdiction, and are treated as surplusage or statements of impertinent matter, and wholly disregarded. Smith v. Patton, 12 W. Va. 541; Smith v. McLain, 11 W. Va. 654. As a court of equity can entertain but one cause at a time, the fallacy of the argument that its jurisdiction of one matter in the bill gave power to decide another, the allegations as to which the court was bound to disregard and treat as mere surplusage, is quite apparent.

The remaining contention of counsel for appellees is settled adversely to them in Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895, holding that an adjudication in equity against a plaintiff does not estop him from denying the jurisdiction of the court on appeal. The wisdom of that rule is well illustrated here, where it is insisted that a judgment of a common-law court has been reheard in a court of equity.

For the reasons stated, the decree complained of is to be amended so as to save to the appellant her right to have the attachment proceeding mentioned and described in the bill reheard in the manner and upon the conditions prescribed in section 25 of chapter 106 of the Code of 1899, and then affirmed and certified to the court below; but, in conformity with the rule announced in Van Dorn v. County Court, 38 W. Va. 267, 18 S. E. 579; Christian v. Vance, 41 W. Va. 754, 24 S. E. 596; Freer v. Davis, 52 W. Va. 1, 43 S. E. 164, 94 Am. St. Rep. 895; and Frye v. Miley (decided at the last term), 46 S. E. 135—costs in this court are to be decreed to the appellees as the parties substantially prevailing, the appellant having failed to demand the insertion of the saving clause in the court below.

RYMER v. SOUTH PENN OIL CO. et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 2, 1904.)

OIL LEASE—PAYMENT OF ROYALTY—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. Where several owners in fee of contiguous tracts of land lease the whole as one tract for oil and gas purposes, and the one-eighth royalty oil is to be paid by the lessee in the usual way by running the same into the pipe lines to the credit of "the parties of the first part" (the lessors), and the lease is silent as to the division of the royalty between the lessors, and where the development is all on one tract owned in severalty by one of the lessors, who claims to be entitled to all the royalty, upon interpleader of the lessee for determination as to whom to pay the royalty as between the lessors, parol evidence is admissible to prove a contemporaneous agreement between the lessors that the royalty should be paid and delivered to the owner of the particular tract from which the oil is produced.

Containing three hundred and sixty (360) acres, more or less, reserving however, therefrom ten (10) acres around the buildings on which no wells shall be drilled by either party except by mutual consent. It is agreed that this lease shall remain in force for the term of five years from this date, and as long after the commencement of operations as said premises are operated for the production of oil or gas. In consideration of the premises, the said party of the second part covenants and agrees: 1st, to deliver to the credit of the parties their heirs or assigns free of cost in the pipe line to which it may connect its wells the equal one-eighth of all oil produced and saved from the leased premises; and 2nd to pay three hundred dollars per year for the gas from each and every gas well drilled on said premises, the product from which is marketed and used off the premises; said payment to be made on each well within thirty days after commencing to use the gas therefrom, and to be paid yearly thereafter while the gas from said well is so used. Second party covenants and agrees to locate all wells so as to interfere as little as possible with the cultivated portions of the farm. Provided, however, that this lease shall become null and void, and all rights hereunder shall cease and determine unless a well shall be completed on the said premises within three months from the date hereof, or unless the lessee shall pay at the rate of one hundred & twenty five (125) dollars, quarterly, in advance, for each additional three months, such completion is delayed from the time above mentioned for the completion of such well until a well is completed. Such payment may be made direct to the lessors or deposited to their credit in the Post Office at Middlebourne, W. Va. First parties are to have gas for domestic purposes free of cost by making their own connections. It is agreed, That the second party is to have the privilege of using sufficient water from the premises to run all necessary machinery, and at any time to remove all machinery and fixtures placed on said premises, and, further shall have the right at any time to surrender this lease to the first part, for cancellation, after which all payments and liabilities to accrue under and by virtue of its terms shall cease and determine, and this lease become absolutely null and void. Witness the following signatures and seals: Henry A. Rymer [Seal.] Frank L. Rymer [Seal.] Edith C. Rymer [Seal.] South Penn Oil Company [Seal.] By N. F. Clark, First Vice President. Witness: C. Y. Benedum"—which was duly acknowledged by the lessors and recorded. The South Penn Oil Company subleased a part of the land so leased to it to Treat and Crawford, who took possession under their sublease, and drilled two wells which produced oil in paying quantities. The South Penn Company afterwards took possession of the residue, and bored seven wells near to those bored by Treat and Crawford, producing large quantities of oil. The tract of 360 acres so first leased was composed of a tract of 90 acres, another of 25 acres, both of which were vested in fee at the time of making the lease in Frank L. Rymer; the residue, of 245 acres, was owned in fee by Henry A. Rymer. The two wells bored by Treat and Crawford, as well as those bored by the South Penn Company, were all on the 90-acre tract which was the property of Frank L. Rymer. Treat and Crawford delivered to Frank the one-eighth of the oil produced from the two wells, who also demanded from the South Penn Oil Company an accounting and delivery to him of the full one-eighth royalty from the wells bored by it, which it refused to do, claiming that the lease of the 360 acres was a joint lease, and that the royalties were payable to the lessors, the said Frank L. Rymer and the heirs at law of Henry A. Rymer, who had deceased early in the year 1898, soon after the making of the lease. The said Henry A. Rymer executed his will, whereby he devised to his daughter

Susan Smith during her life, remainder to her children in fee, 100 acres of the said leased premises, and to the plaintiff, Frank L. Rymer, 100 acres, and the residue of said leased premises to his daughter Lizzie Boyers, wife of Dr. F. C. Boyers.

Frank L. Rymer filed his bill in the circuit court of Tyler county against the South Penn Oil Company and the Eureka Pipe Line Company, alleging that all of the wells bored by the said South Penn Oil Company were located on his tract of 90 acres of land, which, being vested in him in fee simple, entitled him to the whole of the one-eighth royalty oil therefrom and the gas rentals, and praying that the defendant companies be made parties to the bill, and be required to answer the same and make a full account and discovery of dates that any oil had been run into the pipe lines from the said wells so drilled by the South Penn Oil Company upon the said 90-acre tract of land, and amount of oil so run into the lines of the Eureka Pipe Line Company each time, and the total amount of oil so run into the lines from said wells, and that the said companies be ordered to pay over to plaintiff any oils or money found due on such accounting, and for general relief. The defendant South Penn Oil Company filed its demurrer to plaintiff's bill for nonjoinder of parties, claiming that the heirs and devisees of Henry A. Rymer were necessary parties, the lease being a joint lease and the royalties and rentals payable to the lessors jointly. The demurrer was overruled by the court. The South Penn Oil Company then filed its answer in the nature of an interpleader and cross-bill, praying that plaintiff be required, by amended bill or otherwise, to make the heirs and devisees of Henry A. Rymer parties defendants in the suit, that respondent might be fully protected in the payment of royalties under the said lease, as well as to protect and preserve the rights of Treat and Crawford in carrying out the provisions of their lease in the delivery of royalty oil thereunder. By the cross-bill of the South Penn Oil Company all the heirs at law of Henry A. Rymer, the defendant Eureka Pipe Line Company, and Treat and Crawford were made parties defendants thereto. The defendants Susan Smith, David M. Smith, her husband, Elizabeth Boyers, and O. F. Boyers, her husband, filed their answers denying the right of plaintiff, F. L. Rymer, to recover and receive all the royalty oil produced from the 90-acre tract of land or any other particular part of the tract of 360 acres leased jointly by the said Frank L. Rymer and Henry A. Rymer to the South Penn Oil Company. Depositions were taken and filed in the cause by the plaintiff, F. L. Rymer, for the purpose of proving an oral contract between the lessors Frank L. Rymer and Henry A. Rymer, contemporaneous with the lease of August 24, 1897, whereby it was understood and agreed that the several lessors should receive the royalty oil produced from their respective tracts of land owned by them in severalty and comprising the 360-acre tract so leased, and to show how rentals paid before the completion of a well had been distributed under the lease. Other depositions were also filed by the plaintiff and by the defendants Susan Smith and Elizabeth Boyers. Objections and exceptions by the said defendants were made to the depositions of plaintiff taken and filed for the purpose of establishing such oral agreement because incompetent, being contradictory of the language and provisions of said lease. The cause was heard on the 9th day of December, 1902, when the court overruled said objections and exceptions to the depositions as to their competency to prove such parol agreement, and decreed all the royalty oil and the consideration for gas that may be produced from the 90 acres and the 25 acres of land under the said lease to the plaintiff, Frank L. Rymer, and that defendants Susan Smith and Elizabeth Boyers take nothing by their answers and cross-bills, and directing the South Penn Oil Company to run said royalty oil produced and saved from said two tracts, to the credit of Frank L. Rymer, into the pipe lines of the Eureka Pipe Line Company, which was directed to credit same to said Frank L. Rymer.

The errors complained of by appellants Elizabeth Boyers and Susan Smith are, first, the overruling of the demurrer of the South Penn Oil Company; and, second, overruling their objections and exceptions to the depositions and testimony of witnesses C. Y. Benedum, J. Traugh, and T. H. Harter, so far as the same tend to set up a new agreement between H. A. Rymer in his lifetime and the plaintiff touching the lease of the lands in controversy, and in so far as the same relate to statements and conversations between H. A. Rymer, since deceased, and Frank L. Rymer, and between either of said witnesses and H. A. Rymer and Frank L. Rymer, in so far as the same tend to prove declarations and statements made by H. A. Rymer in his lifetime, at the time of executing the lease in question or subsequent to the making and delivering of said lease; and that the court erred in decreeing that the appellants Elizabeth Boyers and Susan Smith were not entitled to any of the royalty which came from the 90 acres, and that Frank was entitled to all the royalty and the consideration for the gas produced from the 90 acres and the tract of 25 acres. It is claimed in the brief of the appellee that the defendants Susan Smith and Elizabeth Boyers, not being parties at the time of the overruling of the demurrer of the South Penn Oil Company by the court, were not affected by the ruling of the court, and, the South Penn Company not being an appellant, said Smith and Boyers could not be injured by it, and have no right to appeal from the decision, citing Beard v. Arbuckle, 19 W. Va. 135; Long v. Perine, 44 W. Va. 243, 28 S. E. 701, 46 S.E.—38 and other authorities; that if the court erred in overruling the demurrer the South Penn Company was the only party that could complain, and it makes no complaint, and does not join in the appeal. Susan Smith and her husband, David M. Smith, and Elizabeth Boyers and F. C. Boyers were made parties by the interpleader and cross-bill of the South Penn Oil Company, and by their own answers and cross-bills thus bring before the court the questions involved between the parties, and which the South Penn Oil Company had a right to have adjudicated upon a bill of interpleader in a court of equity. Petroleum Co. v. Gale, 6 W. Va. 525.

As to the alleged error of the court in overruling the objection of defendants Smith and Boyers to the oral testimony of C. Y. Benedum, the agent of the lessee, the South Penn Oil Company, who prepared and took the lease, and also the testimony of J. Traugh and T. K. Harter in construing the lease: It is claimed by appellants that the court could look only to the language of the lease itself for its construction, the same being unequivocal, clear, and unambiguous. As between the lessors upon the one side and the lessee upon the other side, this clearly appears to be true; there is no ambiguity, but is there any contract anywhere in the lease as between the individual lessors? Not a word to show the relation between them; they have individual rights as between themselves. The lease shows that the royalties and the consideration for the gas which might be sold from the premises was to be paid and delivered to "the parties of the first part," but it is not provided as to how it shall be divided between them when received. The case of Harness v. Eastern Oil Company, 49 W. Va. 232, 38 S. E. 662, is relied on by appellants as being a case in point. In that case the lease was very similar to that in question here, but the lease showed on its face that the land leased was in two separate tracts—152 acres owned by Thomas B. Harness, and 35½ acres owned by his wife, Anna K. Harness—but leased as one tract of 187½ acres. It was held, "as between the lessors and lessee, to be a joint lease of one tract of 187½ acres," being so treated by both the lessors and lessee from the time of its execution and until long after developments were made upon the 152 acres, the lessors having jointly received and receipted for the royalty and the consideration for the gas from the 152-acre tract. No question was raised as to the distribution of the royalty and gas consideration as between the lessors. It is a conceded fact that the only production of oil or gas upon the leased premises is produced from the 90-acre tract which is held in fee and in severalty by the plaintiff, Frank L. Rymer, and it is well settled in this state that oil in place is as much a part of the realty as timber, coal, iron ore, or salt water. Williamson v. Jones, 39 W. Va. 231, 19 S. E. 436, 25 L. R. A. 222; Wilson

v. Youst, 43 W. Va. 826, 28 S. E. 781, 39 L. R. A. 292; Lawson v. Kirchner, 50 W. Va. 344, 40 S. E. 344; Ammons v. Ammons, 50 W. Va. 390, 40 S. E. 490. See, also, Gould on Waters, § 291; Stoughton's Appeal, 88 Pa. 198; Funk v. Haldeman, 53 Pa. 229. And this ruling applies with equal force, and for the same reason, to gas as well as to oil. It is further said in the Wilson v. Youst Case, 43 W. Va. 834, 28 S. E. 784, 39 L. R. A. 292, quoting Gould on Waters: "A lease of land for the purpose of mining oil, coal, rock, or carbon oil passes a corporeal interest which is the proper subject of an action of ejectment; and a proportionate share of the oil to be produced by an oil well is an interest in land, a parol sale of which is void under the statute of frauds." The oil to be paid as royalty is the consideration paid for the oil sold and taken from the premises. Where it is not provided how the consideration is to be applied, or how it shall be divided between or among those entitled to receive it, parol evidence is admissible to explain that which is not expressed. Brown on Parol Ev. § 50, says: "Where the instrument does not express the entire agreement, and does not appear to express the entire agreement, or there is a collateral agreement not embraced therein, parol evidence is competent to show the omitted part, whether contemporaneous or antecedent, if it does not conflict with the instrument." See cases there cited; Johnson v. Burns, 39 W. Va. 658, 20 S. E. 686 (Syl., point 1). Again, at section 92: "Parol evidence is competent to contradict the recital of receipt of the consideration, or to show an additional or different consideration, but not to contradict the deed as to price or quality"—citing O'Neale v. Lodge, 3 Har. & McH. 433, 1 Am. Dec. 377, and many other cases. In Hall v. Solomon, 61 Conn. 476, 23 Atl. 876, 29 Am. St. Rep. 218, the court says: "It will be remembered that it is not the office of a deed to express the terms of the contract of sale, but to pass the title, pursuant to the contract. Therefore, a parol agreement, being a part of the consideration for the sale, restricting the use of the premises in one particular for a limited period, is not merged in the deed, and does not qualify or in any way affect the title to the land; and the admission of parol evidence to prove such an agreement is no infringement of the rule that parol evidence is not admissible to contradict, vary, or explain a written instrument"—citing Collins v. Tillou's Adm'r, 26 Conn. 368, 68 Am. Dec. 398; Pierce v. Woodward, 6 Pick. 206; Willis v. Hulbert, 117 Mass. 151; Tallmadge v. Bank, 26 N. Y. 105. And in section 92, Brown on Parol Evidence: "It is well settled that the consideration clause is open for explanation for any purpose except to defeat the conveyance"—citing Murdock v. Gilchrist, 52 N. Y. 247. And, quoting from Goodspeed v. Fuller, 46 Me. 141, 71 Am. Dec. 572, he says: "The entire weight of authority tends to show that the acknowledgment of payment in a deed is open to unlimited explanation in any direction." Appellants rely upon the case of Heatherly v. Bank, 31 W. Va. 70, 5 S. E. 754 (Syl., point 1), where it is held that: "If the language of a written agreement is on its face ambiguous, the court will look at the surrounding circumstances, at the situation of the parties and the subject-matter of the contract, and at the acts done by the parties under it, for aid in giving a construction to its language, but not to the verbal declaration of the parties." In that case the issue was between the principal parties to the contract, and not between the individuals constituting one of the parties to the contract, as in the case at bar, where there is no contract or semblance of a contract contained in the lease as between themselves; but they bear certain relations to the contract and to each other which it is incumbent upon the court to ascertain and settle, and for that purpose "the court will look at the surrounding circumstances, at the situation of the parties and the subject-matter of controversy."

H. A. Rymer and Frank L. Rymer were the owners in severalty of contiguous tracts of land, the former 245 acres, the latter 115 acres, making together 360 acres. They executed together a lease of the whole 360 acres, whereby they sold seven-eighths of the oil underlying said land to the lessee in consideration of one-eighth of all the oil to be produced therefrom, to be delivered as produced, but their contract of lease or sale is entirely silent as to the division between them of the consideration so to be paid in oil. It is not disputed that the oil underlying the several tracts is the property of the respective owners of said tracts, a part of the realty itself; and when they receive, each that which is produced from his own land, he is but receiving his own. The subject-matter of the contract between the lessors and lessee, now in controversy between the plaintiff, Frank L. Rymer, and the heirs of H. A. Rymer, is the sole property of Frank L. Rymer. The contract of lease of August 24, 1897, having no provision as to the distribution of the royalty oil between the parties of the first part, parol testimony tending to show the intention of the lessors as to such distribution, as evidenced by the declaration of the parties at the time of executing the lease, as well as the subsequent declarations of H. A. Rymer, are competent evidence to aid in arriving at a proper conclusion as to such distribution. It is shown by the testimony of C. S. Stealey that the rental of $125 per quarter paid prior to the completion of the first well was placed in his hands for distribution, and, when asked who placed the rental in his hands, answered, "Well, I think Mr. Frank L. Rymer did part of the time, and I know Frank Hix did once"—stating that Frank Hix was then working for South Penn Oil Company. "Frank Hix left money once, and Mr. Rymer the balance of the time." Mr. Hix left $125, and witness said: "I apportioned it among the three parties, Mrs. Smith—I am not sure whether I handed it to Mrs. Smith or not, but she got it all right—Mrs. Boyers, and Frank L. Rymer. Q. You may state what sum was paid to each out of the $125. A. Frank L. Rymer $74.65, Mrs. Smith $34.73, and Mrs. Boyers $15.62, less the fee of the money order and postage, which would amount to twelve cents for the money order, and stamped envelope, three cents." This was a proper distribution of the rentals accruing while cash rental was payable prior to the completion of the first well, when the cash rentals ceased, and tended to show how the parties understood the lease.

It is insisted by appellants that "the weakest of all human testimony is that of witnesses who testify to the declarations of the dead," and cite "Justice Manning in Succession of Piffet, 37 La. Ann. 873," and also cite 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 200, which treats of the uncertainty of such evidence, and says: "It frequently happens, also, that the witness, by unintentionally altering a few of the expressions really used, gives an effect to the statement completely at variance with what the party actually did say;" and adds, "But where the admission is deliberately made and precisely identified, the evidence it affords is often of the most satisfactory nature." The evidence in this case is of such a character that these uncertainties are not likely to exist, and it depends more upon the credibility of the witnesses than of their recollection as to certain and definite statements made by the parties, and no effort was made to impeach the witnesses, or otherwise discredit them, further than the criticism of their testimony by counsel in their briefs. When the contract of lease was drawn, according to the evidence of Benedum, he suggested that they make the lease in one, when he says they explained to him, as best they could, that each of them owned in fee land in the Jug; that these lands were adjacent to each other, and that they would lease them in a joint lease, providing that each party should secure his own royalty. The witness J. Traugh states that he and H. A. Rymer, in 1897, both lived in the town of Middlebourne; that he had a conversation with H. A. Rymer in front of the latter's house. "He met me right there and stopped me, and we were talking, and he said, 'I have just got a rental from my land at the Jug.' He said, 'I get $125 quarterly.' When he told me he leased his land, I knew Frank Rymer had land in there, and I asked him what he did with that, and he said, 'We both leased together.' He said, 'Each one of us draws our own rental from the land, and also the oil.'" He states that this was in 1897, a short time before he died. T. K. Harter, a nephew, by marriage, of H. A. Rymer, says he had a conversation with Rymer in 1897, perhaps in November or December, sitting in Rymer's room, when he told witness that "he and Frank had leased their land to the South Penn Oil Company for $360, I believe, and $125 quarterly rental;" and in answer to the question what else he said: "I asked him if he thought it was well to lease jointly, and he said that he thought it was all right; that Benedum had proposed it; that each one would get their own share of the rental, and, if there was any oil, his oil produced from his own land—that is, the royalty oil produced from their own land."

Appellants claim that their proposition is fully sustained by the decision in Higgins v. Petroleum Asphalt Company, 109 Cal. 304, 41 Pac. 1087. In that case Higgins and one Mary A. Ashley, owning contiguous tracts of land underlaid with a deposit of bituminous rock and also a deposit of liquid asphaltum, executed a lease to Joseph Scheerer for the term of 20 years. In consideration of the lease, among other things, the lessee promised to pay "to the parties of the first part," lessors, on the 1st day of each and every month thereafter during said term, "the sum of fifty cents per ton for each ton of bituminous rock and liquid asphalt which he may have mined, taken or removed from said premises during the calendar month then next preceding, and at the same time and place of such payment to deliver to the said parties of the first part a full and true statement in writing of the number of gross tons of bituminous rock and liquid asphalt mined, taken or removed from said premises during the calendar month for which such payment is then made," with right of ingress and egress to and from said deposits over the lands owned by the said lessors as might be agreed upon between the parties to the lease, with privilege to the lessee of erecting such building upon the land adjacent to such deposit as might be necessary for the accommodation of his workmen and the prosecution of his work. In December, 1891, the defendant company became the sole owner of the lease by assignment. The court said (at page 306, 109 Cal., and page 1087, 41 Pac.): "It appears and is undisputed that at the date of the lease [June 4, 1887] the lessors were not tenants in common of any part of the land described in the lease nor of any part of the 'deposit of bituminous rock' leased, but that each severally owned a definite part of both adjoining each other, and the 'deposit' leased extended horizontally through the contiguous lands of both lessors, as described in the lease." In June, 1892, Ashley conveyed all her part of the land described in the lease, which she severally owned, to the defendant, by a definite description, after which conveyance the tract had been known as the "Ashley Tract," and the remainder of the land described in the lease as the "Higgins Tract"; that, during the first seven or eight months immediately after the conveyance of the Ashley tract to the defendant, Higgins claimed, and was paid by the defendant, one-half the stipulated rent or royalty, 25 cents per ton, on statements regularly made by the defendant to plaintiff, as per lease, and during the same period and ever after Ashley treated the lease, so far as she was interested, as extinct, or merged in her deed of her land, and no rent had ever been demanded by or paid to her. Defendant continued to pay royalty on rock mined, estimated at 2,000 pounds for a ton until April, 1893, after which it refused to make further payment on rock not shipped from the mine or per ton of less than 2,240 pounds. Suit was brought by Higgins to recover 25 cents per ton for 1,000 tons mined from the deposit, whether reduced to asphalt or shipped from the mine or not, during the months of April, May, June, and July, 1893. Higgins recovered one-half the royalty, notwithstanding the lessee had elected to mine only on that part of the deposit lying within the Ashley tract, and the court say: "Had they been tenants in common, Higgins would still be entitled to a part of the rent proportionate to his undivided portion of the demised premises, but as they are not tenants in common he is entitled, in the absence of an express or presumed agreement to the contrary, to a portion of the royalty proportionate to the comparative value of his distinct part of the demised premises; and in this case the terms of the lease warrant the presumption that each lessor was to receive one-half of the royalty; and such presumption is in perfect accord with the practical construction of the lease by the parties thereto up to April, 1893." There being nothing in the lease to indicate that other than an equal division was to be made of the royalty between the lessors, of course the presumption would be that they received the royalty jointly and in equal shares, and, the lessors themselves having so construed the lease, and so received and divided the royalty, the court could give it no other construction. So, in the case of Harness v. Eastern Oil Company, cited, as the lessors had always so construed it and so acted upon it as between themselves, the court saw no reason for construing it otherwise; indeed, there was no contention in that case as between the lessors themselves. In case at bar lessee had full notice at the time of the execution of the lease that the lessors were to receive each the royalty oil produced from his tract; that the lease was so drawn and executed at the suggestion of C. Y. Benedum, agent of the lessee, and the lessors both said they would place the lands in a joint lease "providing that each party should receive his own royalty."

The appellants claim that the case of Wetengel v. Gormley, 160 Pa. 559, 28 Atl. 934, 40 Am. St. Rep. 733, settles the principles involved in this case in favor of the appellants. James Gormley owned three contiguous farms containing together about 600 acres. In July, 1888, he made an oil lease on the whole of the 600 acres as one tract, to run 15 years, and reserved the usual royalty of one-eighth of all the oil produced under the lease. The lease gave the lessee the usual privilege upon the land, among which was the right to take water from any part of it and for any extent needed, a right of way into and over the land, a right to lay pipe lines, etc. The lease concluded with the following stipulation: "It is understood between the parties to this agreement that all conditions between the parties hereto shall extend to their heirs, executors, and assigns." The lessor died in 1890. By his will he gave one of the farms to each of his three children in fee, making no mention of the lease, which included them all. The devisees entered into possession of their respective farms as held in severalty. "The holder of the oil lease has, in the meantime, put down several oil wells, and is producing oil therefrom." It does not appear from the opinion clearly whether the wells were drilled before or after the devisees took possession of their respective farms under the will. The wells drilled happened to be all on the farm devised to James T. Gormley, the defendant, and he claimed the entire royalty. The court held that "where, during the term of an oil lease of three contiguous farms embracing 600 acres, the lessor dies, and devises the farms to different persons, the devisees are entitled to share alike in the royalty reserved, though the wells are all on one farm, as through such wells the oil may be drawn from all the farms." The same case, together with another case growing out of the same lease, was again appealed and again decided by the same court, the report of which will be found in 184 Pa. 354, 39 Atl. 57, one additional point being decided, as shown in point 2 of the syllabus. The decision as it appears in the syllabus is as follows:

"(1) During the term of an oil lease of three contiguous farms, embracing 600 acres, the lessor died, having devised the farms to three different persons. The lease provided that all its conditions should extend to the parties' heirs, executors, and assigns. Held, that each devisee was entitled to share in the royalties in the proportion that the land devised to him bears to the whole tract, though the wells were all on one farm.

"(2) In such case the loss of rental value of one of the farms, caused by operation of the wells, should be deducted from the three devisees in proportion to their ownership of the surface."

If the wells drilled under the lease in the case at bar had been upon the land of the testator, Henry A. Rymer, instead of the plaintiff, Frank L. Rymer, the cases would have been exactly parallel, as the appellants and plaintiff are all devisees of H. A. Rymer. As that precise question does not plainly arise in this case, it is not necessary to decide it here.

The case of Natural Gas Company v. Ulery (Ohio) 67 N. E. 494, where it is held,

"Where an oil and gas lease is made by one party to another covering two or more separate tracts of land, and is made to extend to the heirs and assigns of the parties, and different persons become the owners of such different tracts, each owner is entitled to the oil and gas produced on his tract, and to the royalty and rental arising from such tract," seems to be a case quite similar to the one at bar, and in harmony with the rulings of this court, and fully sustains the position hereinbefore taken. Chief Justice Burkett, in writing the opinion of the court and referring to said Pennsylvania case, states the matter so well that we quote from his opinion as follows (page 496): "We have several times had occasion to carefully examine and consider that case, and it has always failed to receive the approval of our judgment, and upon a reconsideration here it again fails to convince us of its soundness. And the reconsideration of the same principle in the same case in Wettengel v. Gormley, 184 Pa. 354, 39 Atl. 57, fails to strengthen the original case. Those cases were between devisees, and the question as between the lessee and purchasers from the lessor was not involved, and therefore the principle of those cases is not directly applicable here. But even if it were, we do not regard it sound. Oil in the rock adheres to the real estate, and is a part thereof until brought to the surface, when it becomes personalty, just as a tree, or stone, coal, or fire clay is a part of the realty until severed, when it becomes personalty. That which is a part of the land before severance belongs to the owner of the land after severance as well as before. The fact that oil and gas are vagrant and transitory in their nature does not prevent them from adhering to and becoming part of the land while passing from one tract to another, and while so in one tract they are a part of that tract, and belong to the owner thereof until they escape from such tract, and, if brought to the surface before such escape, they become personal property belonging to the owner of the land. It therefore irresistibly follows that the oil or gas taken from a well on a particular tract of land belongs to the owner of that tract, even though the contract under which the well was drilled included other tracts of land. Because the contract of production may have included two or more tracts of land, such contract cannot have the force of taking from the owner of one tract the oil or gas adhering to such tract for the time being, and bestowing it upon the owner of another tract, where it may never have been. As oil and gas are migratory in character, no one can tell from whence they came or whither they are going, and they must therefore belong to him upon whose lands they are captured. No one else can have any ownership in them, and a man can be awarded only that which he owns. Kelley v. Ohio Oil Co., 57 Ohio St. 317, 49 N. E. 399, 39 L. R. A. 765, 63 Am. St.

Rep. 721. In that case this court said, on page 323, 57 Ohio St., and page 401, 49 N. E., 39 L. R. A. 765, 63 Am. St. Rep. 721: 'Petroleum oil is a mineral, and while in the earth it is part of the realty, and, should it move from place to place by percolation or otherwise, it forms part of that tract of land in which it tarries for the time being, and if it moves to the next adjoining tract it becomes part and parcel of that tract; and it forms part of some tract until it reaches a well and is raised to the surface, and then for the first time it becomes the subject of distinct ownership separate from the realty, and becomes personal property—the property of the person into whose well it came. And this is so whether the oil moves, percolates, or exists in pools or deposits. In either event it is property, and belongs to the person who reaches it by means of a well, and severs it from the realty and converts it into personalty.' The same rule applies to all property."

There is no error in the decree, and the same is affirmed.

O'HANLIN v. CARTER OIL CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 2, 1904.)

NUISANCE—IMPROPER USE OF SIDEWALKS—DAMAGES.

1. Streets and sidewalks are designed for the use of the public, and the use of them by an individual simply for his own convenience and accommodation, unaccompanied by any public use, as for drains, private crossings, sewers, vaults, cesspools, or other obstructions or excavations, is unauthorized, and essentially a nuisance, for which such individual is liable for all damages sustained in consequence of the improper appropriation of the street or sidewalk to his mere personal use.
(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Circuit Court, Tyler County;
M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by John O'Hanlin against the Carter Oil Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Roberts & Carter and T. P. Jacobs, for plaintiff in error. McIntire & McIntire, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. On the 17th day of May, 1900, John O'Hanlin, the defendant in error, commenced a civil action, before a justice of the peace of Tyler county, against the Carter Oil Company, a corporation, for damages for an alleged wrong. The summons, which contains the only description of the cause of action found in the record, alleges that on the — day of September, 1899, in the city of Sistersville, in the said county of Tyler, the defendant was the owner of a steam pipe or line used in conveying steam, which, among other points, was buried on Virginia street, in said city; that defendant willfully and negligently caused said steam pipe or line to remain on said street, and to be used in conveying hot and scalding steam, while in a defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition, which defects were well known, at and before the time last mentioned, to said defendant; that at the time last mentioned, while plaintiff's daughter, Alice, aged five years, was passing over and along said Virginia street, in said city, the earth directly over said steam pipe or line, softened by escaping steam, from said defective steam pipe or line, gave way, precipitating his said daughter, Alice, into the orifice, which was filled with hot water and scalding steam, which was then and there escaping from said steam pipe or line, scalding and burning his said daughter, Alice, on the legs, arms, hands, and body, for which plaintiff claimed $300 damages. There was a trial of the action by the said justice, and judgment rendered by him against the defendant for $250, with costs. From this judgment the defendant was granted an appeal to the circuit court of said county, wherein the action was again tried upon the pleadings made up before the justice, and upon the plea by the defendant of "not guilty of the trespass in the declaration mentioned," and joinder therein by plaintiff filed in the circuit court. The latter trial was by a jury.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence in chief, the defendant moved to exclude the same from the jury, which the court refused to do, and the defendant excepted. The defendant then introduced its evidence, and demurred to the evidence adduced in the case, in which demurrer the plaintiff joined. Thereupon the jury found the usual conditional verdict, assessing the plaintiff's damages at $165, if the law should be for him. Upon consideration thereof, the court overruled the said demurrer, and rendered judgment upon the verdict against the defendant for said $165, and for the plaintiff's costs, both in court and before the justice. To the ruling and judgment of the court aforesaid, defendant excepted, and also moved the court to set aside said verdict and judgment and grant it a new trial of the action, which the court also refused to do, and the defendant again excepted. The several rulings of the court, the exceptions thereto by defendant, and all of the evidence introduced and considered on the trial are certified in bills of exception and made parts of the record. To the last-mentioned judgment the defendant was granted a writ of error, and assigns various errors in the record of the proceedings in the circuit court, not necessary to be here set out in detail.

The material statement of the alleged negligence of the defendant in the summons, treated as a declaration, is: That the defendant was the owner of a steam pipe or line used in conveying steam, which, among other points, was buried on Virginia street, in said city; that defendant willfully and negligently caused said steam pipe or line to remain on said street, and to be used in conveying hot and scalding steam, while in a defective, unsafe, and dangerous condition, which defects were well known to said defendant at and before the time last mentioned.

The facts are: Prior to July, 1899, plaintiff in error, the Carter Oil Company, owned a certain oil well in Sistersville, near Virginia street. This street was then unpaved, and without curb lines or sidewalks. The company had a boiler house, from which a two-inch steam line, belonging to it, ran across the street to its said oil well. About the time last mentioned, the city of Sistersville gave notice to the said company to lower its steam line, so that pavement of the street, which had been determined upon by the city, could be laid over said line. The steam line was thereupon lowered by the company as directed. This work was done under the direction of the foreman of the company and the city engineer, and to the satisfaction of the latter. Not long before the paving was done, one O. P. Collins had built a dwelling house over the steam line. The distance between the house and the curb line of the street, after it was put in, was about 10 feet. Between the curb line and the house the ground was lower than the level of the paved street. After the steam line was lowered it passed through the curb line, but remained some distance above the surface of the ground, between the curb and the house. Under the pavement of the street, the steam line was encased in another iron pipe, but between the curb and the house it was inclosed in a wooden steam box, supported by what is called a "horse," made by nailing two legs on a board or other piece of timber. Some of the dirt excavated and taken from the street, preparatory to the paving of it, was used in bracing and holding the curb in place at the point where the steam line passed through it, and some of it was placed at the point where the line passed under the house. Some time after the curbing had been put in and the steam line covered in front of the house as aforesaid, other filling with dirt was done there by some one other than the Carter Oil Company, and without its knowledge. By whom it was done the evidence does not show, but it strongly tends to prove that the employees of the city did it. The dirt filling on the steam pipe where it left the curbing was about three feet in thickness. This filling along the curb was not paved, but was used and traveled as a sidewalk.

On the 1st day of September, 1899, while said Alice, who had gone to the Collins house on a visit the day before, was playing on the fill or dirt sidewalk over the steam line, her foot and leg went down in a hole or opening filled with hot mud and escaping steam, and they were burned. Miss Mollie Collins, the only witness for the plaintiff who testified as to the condition of the place where the accident occurred, says that she came with Alice to Collins' the day before from New Martinsville, where they both resided; that Alice was playing, out where the pavement should have been; that she heard a scream, and went out to see what was the matter; that the ground had given away, and let the child in where the steam pipe was; that she did not live there (at the Collins house), but that the most of the time she was there; the place (where the accident occurred) seemed to be wet all the time; it seemed to be kind of sunk; there didn't seem to be any steam; but it seemed wet. "I suppose the steam was there. I looked in afterwards, and it was hot just like lime; like lime would boil; and it was hot, for I don't know how long, after the child was burned, till you couldn't put your hand in it at all; and the hole was large enough for the child to get her leg in." She testified that on other visits to Collins, who is her brother, she noticed this wet place, but saw no steam escaping; that she made no complaint to any one about seeing the wet place; that there was nothing in that to indicate that steam was under it; that it was just damp looking—that was all. The evidence further shows that after the accident, at the point where it occurred, the steam line was examined, and, as the witness states, "there under the ground it seemed to be a little bit steam-soaked for about twelve feet, and the line where it was joined had went out, pulled out about one thread; that was the extent. When we put the steam through we saw only a small seep in the line. * * * That was where the collar was connected on." Witness further stated that he had been in the oil business since 1881; that the union of the steam line made at the point where the accident occurred was a proper one; that the material used was such as is ordinarily used for a steam line throughout the oil country; that the joint was on when the steam line was lowered, and at the time of the examination there was a slight sag in the pipe, caused by the weight of the fill of dirt upon it, outside of the curbing; that this weight caused the pipe, where it was screwed into the back of the union, to pull out about one thread; and that steam seeped or leaked out around the threads. It further appears that the steam pipe was of good material, as good as new, A No. 1, and properly joined together, put down at the point of the accident in the usual manner, and that it had sufficient strength to withstand the weight of the first fill. It is also shown that the company had no notice, and, so far as the record discloses, no other person had any knowledge that the steam line was defective, or out of repair, until after the accident happened. Another witness testified that the quality of the steam line at the place of the accident was as good as is used in that class of business, and that with the weight which was upon it there, after the second lot of dirt was placed thereon, a pipe line of the best material would have sagged. It is also proved that the company did not know who put the dirt or fill on the steam line the second time, but that it would have been the duty of the city to place it there.

Another witness says that he was superintendent of the streets of the city when the accident occurred; that he did the grading and paving of the street at that point; that, representing the city, he had the dirt from the street filled in between the curb and the Collins house. The foreman of the company says that his duty for some time called him twice a day to a well within 100 feet of the place of the accident, and in plain view of it, but that his attention was never called to any leak in the pipe, and that he saw nothing there that indicated a leak.

We must therefore conclude from the evidence that the steam line was lowered by direction of the city in a proper manner, and to its satisfaction; that the dirt fill placed over the steam line was necessary, as well to cover the line, as to brace and hold in place the curb; that it was used and traveled by the public as a sidewalk; that the material used in the steam line was of good quality, properly joined together, and of sufficient strength to have withstood the weight of the first fill; that other dirt was afterwards put on the sidewalk at the point where the steam line crossed under it; that this additional weight caused the threads of the pipe to break, and thereby a leak of the steam occurred; that the escaping steam, and hot mud, the result of the escaping steam, caused the injury to plaintiff's daughter; and that defendant had no knowledge of the defect in the steam line until after the accident. There is no conflict in the evidence, or dispute about the facts proved.

This full statement of the case has been made because the defendant seems to rest its defense upon the theory that it placed its steam pipe under the street and sidewalk by permission of the city authorities, and operated it in a lawful business with due care and skill; that it is not guilty of negligence; and is not liable to the plaintiff in damages for the alleged injury occasioned by the defect in its steam pipe, of which it had no notice, and could have had no knowledge, under the circumstances.

Sistersville is an incorporated city, and is given the authority by, and charged with the duty under, its charter, to lay off, vacate, close, open, alter, grade, and keep in good repair the roads, streets, alleys, pavements, sidewalks, crosswalks, drains, and gutters therein, for the use of the citizens and of the public; to improve and light the same, and to keep them free from obstructions of every kind; and it also has authority to raise the necessary revenues for its municipal purposes and expenses. Chapter 4, § 28, Acts, 1899. "It is a principle of nearly universal acceptance in this country that when a city or town is incorporated and is given control over the streets and walks within its corporate limits, and is empowered to provide the means to make and repair them, the corporation not only assumes this duty, but by implication agrees, to perform it for the benefit and protection of all who may have occasion to make use of these public easements, and that for failure in the discharge of this duty the corporation is responsible to the party injured." Wilson v. City of Wheeling, 19 W. Va. 323, 324, 42 Am. Rep. 780. Section 53 of chapter 43 of the Code of 1899 provides that: "Any person who sustains an injury to his person or property by reason of a public road, or bridge, in a county, or by reason of a public road, bridge, street, sidewalk or alley in an incorporated city, village or town, being out of repair, may recover all damages sustained by him by reason of such injury, in an action on the case in any court of competent jurisdiction, against the county court, city, village or town in which such road, bridge, street, sidewalk or alley may be, except that such city, village or town shall not be subject to such action, unless it is required by its charter to keep the road, bridge, street, sidewalk or alley therein, at the place where such injury is sustained, in repair." Numerous cases have arisen under this statute, and been decided by this court, in which the liability of municipal corporations thereunder has been well considered, and the law upon that question settled in this state. Chapman v. Town of Milton, 31 W. Va. 384, 7 S. E. 22; Gibson v. City of Huntington, 38 W. Va. 177, 18 S. E. 447, 22 L. R. A. 561, 45 Am. St. Rep. 853; Yeager v. City of Bluefield, 40 W. Va. 484, 21 S. E. 752; Van Pelt v. Town of Clarksburg, 42 W. Va. 218, 24 S. E. 878. In Biggs v. City of Huntington, 32 W. Va. 55, 61, 9 S. E. 51, 53, the court says: "It will be observed that the statute in express terms makes the town liable for damages for injuries sustained by reason of a defect in a public street or sidewalk. The language is unqualified, and without exception or limitation; and therefore the question of notice or want of care on the part of the town is altogether immaterial. If the street or sidewalk was in fact defective, and such defect caused the injury to the plaintiff, it is no defense on the part of the town that it had exercised great care in repairing the street or sidewalk. It is only necessary in such suit to allege and prove the existence of the defect, and that the injury was occasioned thereby." In Sheff v. City of Huntington, 16 W. Va. 307 (Syl., point 1), it is held: "If a person is injured by reason of a public road being out of repair, the corporation whose legal duty it is to keep the road in good repair is liable to him for damages, whether it had notice of such defect or not." Evans v. Huntington, 37 W. Va. 601, 16 S. E. 801. The law is not more lenient to an individual who causes the streets or sidewalks of a city or town to be defective or dangerous than it is to the city or town itself which permits such acts to be done, or allows dangerous agencies thereon or thereunder to remain unremoved or unabated. In some instances the law expressly confers upon corporations organized to construct and maintain works of public utility the right to occupy and use streams of water, water courses, streets, highways, roads, turnpikes, and canals, but upon condition that such corporations shall restore the stream, water course, street, highway, road, turnpike, or canal, intersected or touched, to its former state, or to such state as not unnecessarily to impair its usefulness, and to keep the part thereof so used in repair. But we find no authority in the charter of Sistersville, or in the general statute, allowing the occupation or use of the public streets of that city by individuals for their own benefit or mere personal convenience. In Dygert v. Schenck, 23 Wend. 446, 35 Am. Dec. 575, it is held that "where the owner of land over which a public highway passes digs a raceway across the road to conduct water to his mill, and builds a bridge over the raceway, and an injury is sustained by any one in consequence of the bridge being out of repair, such owner is liable in damages to the party aggrieved"; and in Congreve v. Smith, 18 N. Y. 79, 82, it is said that "the general doctrine is that the public are entitled to the street or highway in the condition in which they placed it; and whoever, without special authority, materially obstructs it, or renders its use hazardous by doing anything upon, above, or below the surface, is guilty of a nuisance; and, as in all other cases of public nuisance, individuals sustaining special damage from it, without any want of due care to avoid injury, have a remedy by action against the author or person continuing the nuisance. No question of negligence can arise, the act being wrongful. It is as much a wrong to impair the safety of a street by undermining it as by placing objects upon it. There can be no difference in regard to the nature of the act or the rule of liability, whether the fee of the land within the limits of the easement is in a municipal corporation, or in him by whom the act complained of was done; in either case, the act of injuring the easement is illegal." It is a general legal principle that there can be no rightful permanent use of a public highway by individuals for private purposes. Elliott on Roads & Streets, § 645. This court, in Curry v. Town of Mannington, 23 W. Va. 14, 17, said: "Streets and sidewalks are designed for the use of the public, and the use of them by an individual, simply for his own convenience and accommodation, unaccompanied by any public use, as for drains, private crossings, sewers, vaults, cesspools, or other obstructions, is unauthorized and essentially a nuisance, for which such individual is liable for all damages sustained in consequence of the improper appropriation of the street or sidewalk to a mere personal use."

In the light of the foregoing authorities, we are of opinion that the circuit court did not err in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the evidence. The judgment complained of is fully sustained by the proof, and must therefore be affirmed.

GIEBELL v. COLLINS CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 2, 1904.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYE—PLACE TO WORK—APPLIANCES—INSTRUCTION—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

1. It is the duty of the master to provide a suitable place in which, and suitable appliances with which, the employé, being himself in the exercise of due care, can perform his duty without being exposed to unnecessary dangers, that is, to dangers which do not of necessity attend the exercise of the employment; but the master is not bound to furnish for his workmen the safest and best machinery, nor to provide the best methods for the work in which he is engaged, in order to save himself from responsibility for injuries to his employé. If the machinery and appliances which he has been in common use, and are such as can, with reasonable care, be used without danger to the employé, it is all that can be required of the employer.

2. It is the duty of a master who sets a servant to work in a place of danger to give him such notice and instruction as is reasonably required by the youth, inexperience, or want of capacity of the servant, and, failing to do so, he is liable for the damage suffered through such neglect.

3. Where the servant has equal knowledge with the master of the danger incident to the work, he takes the risk upon himself, if he goes on with it; but this only applies where the servant is of sufficient discretion to appreciate the dangers incident to the work. Where there are latent defects or hazards incident to an occupation, of which the master knows, or ought to know, it is his duty to warn the servant of them fully, and, failing to do so, he is liable to him for any injury he may sustain in consequence of such neglect; and this rule applies even where the danger of hazard is patent, if through youth, inexperience, or other cause the servant is incompetent to fully understand and appreciate the nature and extent of the hazard. It is the master's duty to warn him of any danger incident to the business; and if, with such knowledge, he chooses to assume the risk, and is capable of appreciating the hazard, and of choosing and contracting for himself, the master is then absolved from liability for injuries from the ordinary hazards.

Error to Circuit Court of Ritchie County;
M. H. Willis, Judge.

Action by Charles L. Giebell, a minor, by Florence Giebell, his next friend, against Creed Collins and C. W. Sprinkle, partners under the firm name of the Collins Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Sherman Robinson and J. Newman, for plaintiffs in error. J. W. Fidler and Homer Adams, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. Charles L. Giebell, a minor, by Florence Giebell, as his next friend, sued Creed Collins and C. W. Sprinkle, partners in business under the firm name of the Collins Company, in an action of trespass on the case, in the circuit court of Ritchie county, and recovered a judgment against them as such company for $500, with interest thereon from the 3d day of March, 1903, the date of the judgment, until paid, and his costs by him in the action expended. To this judgment a writ of error and supersedeas was granted to the defendants by this court.

The declaration contains two counts, each of which alleges that the said defendants were lawfully possessed of a certain large planing mill, or lumber manufacturing plant, situate in said county, and, being so possessed thereof as aforesaid, they were engaged in dressing, finishing, and manufacturing lumber; and, the said defendants being so engaged as aforesaid, they employed plaintiff to engage in said work of dressing, finishing, and manufacturing lumber as aforesaid, and it then and there became and was the duty of said defendants to use due and proper care and caution that the plaintiff should be provided with good, proper, safe, and suitable machinery and appliances to be used by him in said employment as aforesaid, and that said plaintiff should be secure and safe in all respects in his employment from any injury incident thereto, against which ordinary care could avail, while so engaged for said defendants in said work. The breaches of duty on the part of defendants, the injury to plaintiff, and the damages claimed by him are then averred. To the declaration and each count thereof defendants interposed a demurrer, which was overruled by the court.

Plaintiffs in error say that the demurrer was and is well taken and should have been sustained, because the declaration would compel defendant company to provide for plaintiff a kind and character of material, machinery, appliances, and a place in which to labor not required by law. Buswell on Pers. Inj. § 192, says: "The authorities are agreed that it is the duty of the master to provide a suitable place in which, and suitable appliances with which, the employé, being himself in the exercise of due care, can perform his duty without being exposed to unnecessary dangers; that is, to dangers which do not of necessity attend the exercise of the employment." 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 877. In Berns v. Coal Co., 27 W. Va. 286, 55 Am. Rep. 304, it is held that "the master is not bound to furnish for his workmen the safest and best machinery, nor to provide the best methods, for the work in which he is engaged, in order to save himself from responsibility for injuries to his servant. If the machinery and appliances which he has been in common use, and are such as can with reasonable care be used without danger to the employé, it is all that can be required of the employer." The averments of the declaration are not insufficient, and, if redundant, they do not for that reason vitiate the pleading. The demurrer was properly overruled.

On the 18th day of July, 1900, the plaintiff, while in the employ of the defendants in their said planing mill, had all of his fingers cut from his left hand by an edger or jointing machine, a part of the machinery of said planing mill and operated therewith, at which he was at the time working. Plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was only 16 years old. Before he was put into the machinery room, where he was hurt, he had been working for the company in its lumber yards, carrying lumber and off bearing. It is stated in the evidence that he had worked for the company in its yards at different times from 1897 until about six weeks before he was injured as aforesaid.

The plaintiff testified that, at the time he was hurt, he was working under the direction of said C. W. Sprinkle, a member of the firm, and one of the defendants, who set him to work on the jointer; that he had been working in the machinery room a month or six weeks; that, during that time, he did not work the whole time on any particular machine; that he worked on the jointer, rip-saw and cut-off saw; that, prior to going to work for the Collins Company in that room, he had not had any experience whatever with machinery; that this was the first machinery he had ever worked with; that the company did not, nor did any person for it, in any way, explain to him the nature or workings of the machines, or either of them; that the company just put him up there to work upon them; and that no person ever explained to him how the machines should be worked. The knives or bits on the cylinder of the said jointer were about 12 inches in length, and about 8 or 10 inches of them were exposed. At the time of the accident the guard was not properly adjusted thereon, as he afterwards learned, and the machine had no fender upon it, although a fender which belonged to it was in the room, and was put on the jointer some time after the accident occurred. The said cylinder made about 4,700 revolutions per minute. A machine called a "moulder," in operation at the time, stood near the jointer. A piece of coffee sack about two feet square hung between the jointer and moulder. The shavings from the moulder would fly all over the jointer, the coffee sack not being sufficient to prevent them from so doing. At the time of the accident plaintiff was at the jointer, dressing or jointing a piece of oak timber, about 2 feet 9 inches long, 4 inches wide, and 1 $\frac{3}{4}$ inches thick, for a transom bar. Both of his hands were on the stick. His left hand was in front. A shaving from the moulder struck him in the eye. Plaintiff quickly took his right hand from the stick to remove the shaving from his eye, that hand being on the back end of the transom bar, when his left hand slipped from the bar and went into the bits, which cut off all of the fingers of that hand. It also appears from the evidence that the jointer was and is the most dangerous of the machinery mentioned. The plaintiff further testifies that he doesn't think the accident would have occurred if the shaving had not struck him, and that if the machine had been in proper condition, and something on it to protect his hands from the bits, he would not have been hurt; that there was nothing on the machine to protect him from getting hurt while he was running it; that he knew nothing about adjusting the guard, and had been told nothing about it by any one, and knew nothing about a fender, or the use of it, until some time after he was hurt; that on a visit to the mill after the accident he saw that a fender had been put on the jointer. It is also shown that plaintiff's brother, at the time of the accident, was operating the moulder, and that, when running, the moulder would throw shavings all over the jointer.

A number of witnesses were examined on behalf of the plaintiff, who proved, in substance, that the operation of the jointer was dangerous without a fender, and still more dangerous with the guard unadjusted in the absence of the fender, as it was shown to be; while perhaps as many witnesses for the defendants testified that, with the guard properly arranged without the fender, the machine would be more convenient for its purposes, and not more dangerous to them; but they were workmen of experience in that kind of labor.

Defendant Sprinkle testified that plaintiff had worked at times for the company at odd jobs, around the lumber yard and mill, from September, 1897, until he was put in the machine room. He further stated: "We put him upstairs in the machine room to help his brother. I had general charge of the work of the business." Witness also testified that he did not direct plaintiff to work on the jointer; that he sent him to help his brother; that there were in that room a shaver, rip-saw, a cut-off saw, a moulder, a buzz-saw, planer, and jointer; and that two men generally worked in the room.

All the evidence, with the instructions hereinafter referred to, was submitted to the jury impaneled in the case, and a verdict found for the plaintiff, upon which the judgment aforesaid is predicated. The defendants moved the court to set aside the verdict and grant to them a new trial, upon the ground that said verdict was and is contrary to the law and evidence, but the motion was overruled, to which action of the court they excepted. All of the evidence heard by the jury, and the several instructions given, as well as those refused, are made parts of the record by bills of exception.

The evidence establishes, at the least, that plaintiff was a boy only 16 years of age; that, previous to his employment in said room, he had had no experience in operating machinery; that he was sent to the machinery room by C. W. Sprinkle, a member of the defendant company, who had charge of the business, to labor, without any instructions from the company, or any other person, as to the nature or manner of operating the machinery, or the dangers thereof; that there were in the machinery room the said jointer, and the other machines above mentioned; that the jointer had upon it a guard, not properly adjusted, but no fender; and that plaintiff, as he testifies, knew nothing about the guard or fender, or the use of them, until after he was hurt. Buswell, supra, § 202, says: "Since it is the duty of the master to use due diligence to see that the servant is not exposed to unnecessary risks in the course of his employment, he is bound, before an employé is put in charge of dangerous machinery with which he is not acquainted, to instruct and qualify him for his duty." 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 897, thus states the rule: "It is the duty of a master who sets a servant to work in a place of danger to give him such notice and instruction as is reasonably required by the youth, inexperience, or want of capacity of the servant, and, failing to do so, is liable for the damages suffered through such neglect." These authorities are supported by numerous decisions of the highest courts of the different states of the Union, and correctly state the law.

The defendants contend that plaintiff accepted the risk incident to his employment, and cite Berns v. Coal Co., supra: "When a servant enters into the employment of a master, he assumes all the ordinary risks incident to the employment, whether the employment is dangerous or otherwise. If a servant willfully encounters dangers which are known to him, or are notorious, the master is not responsible for the injury occasioned thereby." A recurrence to the evidence is a sufficient answer to this proposition. No such case as the one cited is here presented. In Wood on Master and Servant, § 349, it is said: "Where the servant has equal knowledge with the master of the danger incident to the work, he takes the risk upon himself, if he goes on with it; but this only applies where the servant is of sufficient discretion to appreciate the dangers incident to the work. Where there are latent defects or hazards, incident to an occupation, of which the master knows or ought to know, it is his duty to warn the servant of them fully, and, failing to do so, he is liable to him for any injury he may sustain in consequence of such neglect; and this rule applies even where the danger or hazard is patent, if through youth, inexperience, or other cause the servant is incompetent to fully understand and appreciate the nature and extent of the hazard. It is the master's duty to warn him of any danger incident to the business; and if, with such knowledge, he chooses to assume the risk, and is capable of appreciating the hazard, and of choosing and contracting for himself, the master is then absolved from liability for injuries from the ordinary hazards." This rule is also sustained by many decisions of the courts of last resort, and is well-established law. All of these questions of fact were involved in the case, were fully and fairly submitted to the jury, and were ascertained and fixed, by their verdict, against the contention of the defendants. "The jury is the sole judge of the credibility of contradicting witnesses, and of the weight to be given to their testimony. The verdict of a jury will be held sacred by this court, unless there is a plain preponderance of credible evidence against it, evincing a miscarriage of justice from some cause, such as prejudice, bias, undue influence, misconduct, oversight, or misconception of the facts or law." Young v. West Virginia & R. Co., 44 W. Va. 218, 28 S. E. 932.

We cannot say that the verdict of the jury is erroneous for any reason. The refusal of the court to set it aside was therefore proper, unless the instructions, or some of them, given to the jury were improper, or unless the proffered instructions rejected, or some of them, should have been given by the court.

At the instance of the plaintiff, the court gave to the jury the following instructions: "(1) The jury are instructed that it is direct, personal, and absolute obligation of the master to provide reasonably safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the business. This includes the exercise of reasonable care in furnishing such appliances. The master must furnish a safe place in which his servant is to work. And the jury are further instructed that the master is liable for any injury to his servants, due to the neglect or failure of the master to provide such safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the business, or to exercise such reasonable care in furnishing such appliances, or to furnish his servants a safe place in which to work. (2) The jury are further instructed that it is the duty of the master who sets a servant to work in a place of danger, or with dangerous machinery or appliances, to give him such notice and instructions as is reasonably required by the youth, inexperience, or want of capacity of the servant; and, failing to do so, the master is liable for the damage suffered through such failure." "(4) The jury are further instructed that, if they believe from the evidence that the plaintiff in his action is entitled to recover, he may recover the expenses of his cure, the value of his time lost during his cure, and a fair compensation for his physical and mental suffering caused by the injury, as well as any permanent reduction of his power to earn money. (5) The jury are further instructed that the duties of the master to provide safe and suitable machinery and appliances for the business, and to furnish a safe place in which his servant is to work, are duties which the master can either perform personally, or delegate their performance to some one else; but if both the master and the person to whom such duties are delegated fail in the performance of any of said duties, and injury results to the servant by reason of said failure, the master is liable for such injury. (6) The jury are further instructed that the right of the plaintiff, Charles L. Giebell, to recover in this action, if the jury believe from the evidence he is entitled to recover, is not affected by his having contributed to the injury complained of, if the jury believe from the evidence that he did contribute to his own injury, unless he was in fault in so doing. (7) The jury are further instructed that in determining whether the plaintiff, Charles L. Giebell, a boy sixteen years of age, was guilty of contributory negligence, the jury have the right to take into consideration his age, capacity, and experience, and although he may have been guilty of an act or acts which in an adult would have amounted to an assumption of the risk of injury and a waiver of the duty the master owes him, yet he cannot be held to have assumed any such risk or waived any such duty which one of his age, discretion, and experience could not fully comprehend and appreciate. (8) The jury are further instructed that, while it is a general rule that an employé accepts service subject to risks incidental to it, and when the appliances or means or methods of work are known to the employé he can make no claim upon the employer to change them, and, if injury results therefrom, can recover no damages, yet this does not relieve the employer from the obligation which makes it his imperative duty to warn the employé of danger and instruct him how to avoid the danger, even when the danger is visible and open to observation, if through youth, inexperience, or lack of ability the employé is incompetent to understand fully and appreciate the nature and extent of the danger." To the giving of all of which instructions, except instruction No. 4, the defendants objected.

The court also gave to the jury, at the instance of the defendants, the following instructions: "(1) The court instructs the jury that the defendant, the Collins Company, was not bound to furnish to the plaintiff, Charles L. Giebell, the safest and best appliances and machinery used with which to work, but the defendant, Collins Company, should be acquitted of fault in this respect, if the appliances and machinery which they did furnish the plaintiff, Charles L. Giebell, was reasonably safe and suitable. (2) The court instructs the jury that before the plaintiff, Charles L. Giebell, can recover from the defendant, the Collins Company, in this case, for the loss of his hand while in said company's employ, he, Charles L. Giebell, must overcome two presumptions: First, the presumption that the defendants did provide safe and suitable machinery, and a safe and suitable place in which to work; second, the presumption that the plaintiff assumed all the usual and ordinary hazards of the business in which he is engaged; and that, unless the plaintiff does overcome the said presumptions by a preponderance of the evidence, you will find for the defendant." "(5) The court instructs the jury that if they believe, from the evidence in this case, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, that then he cannot recover, and the jury will find for the defendant company." "(7) The court instructs the jury that if the said Charles L. Giebell knew, at the time of his entry upon his duties for the Collins Company, or if he afterwards found out or discovered, that the machinery or jointer that he was called upon to use was dangerous, and he continued his employment without objection or complaint, he has assumed the risk of the danger then known or discovered, and cannot recover in this suit. (8) The court instructs the jury that the minor cannot recover damages on account of the diminution of earning power or capacity during minority, unless emancipation be shown, but they may consider such diminution after he attains his majority."

But the court refused to give the following instructions: "(4) The jury are instructed that, if they believe from the evidence that the ground of the plaintiff's action is negligence, it rests upon the plaintiff, Charles L. Giebell, to trace the fault of the injury to the defendant, the Collins Company, and for this purpose he must show the circumstances under which the injury occurred; and if, from the circumstances so proven by the plaintiff, it appears that the fault was mutual, or, in other words, that contributory negligence is fairly imputable to the plaintiff, he has, by proving the circumstances, disproved his right to recover, and, on the plaintiff's evidence alone, the jury should find for the defendant." "(6) The court instructs the jury that the employé, Charles L. Giebell, accepted the service subject to the risks incidental to it, and, if the appliances or methods of work were known to him, he could make no claim upon his employer, the Collins Company, to have them changed. He accepted them as they were, and if the injury has resulted therefrom he cannot recover. (7) The court instructs the jury that if the said Charles L. Giebell knew, at the time of his entry upon his duties for the Collins Company, or if he afterwards found out or discovered, that the machinery or jointer that he was called upon to use was dangerous, and he continued his employment without objection or complaint, he has assumed the risk of the danger then known or discovered, and cannot recover in this suit." "(11) The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence in this case that the plaintiff, in the case of the jointer, knew of the knives and cutting edges, and that they were dangerous, then no instructions were necessary as to the dangerous character thereof, as an employé assumes all ordinary hazard of the business in which he is engaged, and if injured thereby he cannot recover." To which refusal the defendants excepted.

Reading instruction No. 1 given for the plaintiff, and instructions Nos. 1 and 2, given for the defendants, together and as a whole, they state the law correctly.

It is urged by defendants that instruction No. 2, given for plaintiff, is erroneous, because it assumes the dangerous character of the employment and the inexperience of plaintiff. There is no conflict in the evidence about either of these propositions. They are undisputed. The instruction was not improper upon the proof. Instructions 5, 6, 7, and 8 are not subject to the objections thereto made by the defendants. We think said instructions were pertinent and properly given.

Defendants complain because their proffered instruction No. 4 was not given. As an abstract proposition, it is a correct principle of law, and governs in cases where the evidence of the plaintiff is demurred to by the defendant, where there is a motion to set aside the verdict of a jury in favor of a plaintiff, or may be given where there is some evidence tending to prove the facts upon which such instruction is based. There is no evidence in this case which proves, or tends to prove, that the fault which caused the accident to plaintiff was mutual, or that contributory negligence is fairly imputable to him. A verdict based upon that assumption would have been erroneous. It was not plaintiff's fault that the guard on the jointer was not properly adjusted, or that the machine had no fender upon it. Neither was it his fault that the shaving was thrown into his eye. He did at the time what almost every person would have done. Suffering from the sudden pain, he quickly disengaged his right hand and attempted to remove the shaving from his eye. The other hand then slipped from the transom bar, and was caught by the revolving machine, unguarded by the proper fender. He attempted to protect his eye, and thereby lost his fingers. It cannot be said with any degree of reason that plaintiff, under the circumstances, was guilty of negligence. The question of contributory negligence is fully covered by other instructions in the case, if there be any such question therein. The proposed instruction No. 4 was properly refused. State v. Staley, 45 W. Va. 793, 32 S. E. 198, and cases there cited.

Rejected instructions Nos. 6, 7, and 11 were and are improper, because they omit to say to the jury that, in their consideration of the questions propounded therein, they must also consider the age, capacity, experience, and discretion of the plaintiff. Turner v. N. & W. R. R. Co., 40 W. Va. 676, 22 S. E. 83. In that case it is held that, "in determining whether a boy sixteen years of age was guilty of contributory negligence, the jury have the right to take into consideration his age, capacity, and experience, and, although he may have been guilty of an act which in an adult would have amounted to an assumption of the risk of injury and a waiver of the duty the master owes him, yet he cannot be held to have assumed any such risk or waived any such duty which one of his age, discretion, and experience could not fully comprehend and appreciate."

There is no error in the record prejudicial to the defendants. The judgment complained of must therefore be affirmed.

FRANCIS et al. v. MARSH et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 2, 1904.)

WILL—REVOCATION—MARRIAGE—REVIVAL— CODICIL.

1. Under section 6 of chapter 77 of the Code of 1899, a will made by a man is revoked by his subsequent marriage, although made in contemplation of marriage, and containing clauses by which provision is made for a wife, in case he should have one living at the time of his death.

2. Said section was substituted for the common-law rules governing revocation by marriage, and marriage and birth of issue, for greater stability of titles and property rights; and, to effectuate the legislative intent, it must be enforced as written, without exception.

3. In adopting said section together with section 8 of said chapter, providing for revival by re-execution or codicil, the Legislature did not impair the right to dispose of property by will. It only prescribed a reasonable regulation for the exercise thereof.

4. A codicil, to effect the revival of a revoked will under section 8 of chapter 77 of the Code of 1899, must show an intent to revive; but any language therein from which such intent may reasonably be inferred, such as a reference to the will by date, or as being the will of the testator, in the absence of contradictory matter found on the face of the codicil or in the surrounding circumstances, is sufficient. It need not show that the testator knew the will had been revoked, nor contain words of express revival, ratification, or confirmation of the will.

5. A duly executed codicil in the following terms: "I, J. C. M., do make this a codicil to my will made on the 6 day of August, 1895, I do nominate and appoint J. B. W. as one of the executors of my will and do hereby revoke the appointment of W. R. J. to said will"—revives the will therein referred to.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lewis County; W. G. Bennett, Judge.

Action by Sevilla Francis and others against Dora Marsh and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Linn & Bland, for appellants. W. W. Brannon and A. Edmiston, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, P. This case presents two questions. One is whether a will, made by a man, showing affirmatively on its face his contemplation of future marriage, and making provision for his future wife in case of marriage, is excepted from the operation of section 6 of chapter 77 of the Code of 1899, declaring that "every will made by a man or a woman shall be revoked by his or her marriage, except a will made in exercise of a power of appointment, when the estate thereby appointed would not, in default of such appointment, pass to his or her heirs, personal representative, or next of kin." On the 6th of August, 1895, John C. Marsh, a widower, and the father of several children, made a will, the second clause whereof reads as follows: "If so be I have a wife living at the time of my decease I will to her use one-third of the land I may own at that time to her use during life time I do so order and will it and do also will and bequeath to said wife if such exist one third of my personal estate to her entire use." In the fifth, seventh, ninth, and possibly other clauses, there are references to the possible future wife, accompanied by gifts to her, without naming her or indicating any particular person as his intended wife. On the 3d day of October, 1895, Marsh married. Did the testator intend by these provisions to avoid the effect of the statute? If so, is it possible to effectuate such intent? Can the law thus be nullified? It is not pretended that this will can stand if the Legislature intended to make marriage revoke a will executed antecedent to the marriage without reference to the intent of the testator. So construed, the Legislature does not take away or impair the right to dispose of property by will. It enables the maker of the revoked will to give it effect by re-execution or revival. It regulates and prescribes the mode of exercise of such power and right. The question, then, is not one of legislative power, but of legislative intent.

The Kentucky statute on this subject is exactly like ours, and in Stewart v. Mulholland, 88 Ky. 38, 10 S. W. 125, 21 Am. St. Rep. 320, the court declared an exception to the statute, but the case, in its facts, differed widely from this one. The will was made by a woman with the knowledge and consent of her intended husband, who subsequently, by an antenuptial contract, relinquished all interest in her estate, and agreed that she should hold it to her separate use and have power to dispose of it by will. Three days after the contract was executed, and on the day of the marriage, and after the performance of the ceremony, the wife, in the presence of her husband, handed the will to a friend for safe-keeping; telling him that it was her will. As the contract empowered the wife to hold her property to her separate use, and dispose of the same by will, the court held that the reason of the common law and of the statute for making marriage revoke the will of a woman no longer existed in that case, and the statute had no application. Had the will been made by the husband prior to his marriage, this reasoning would have been plainly fallacious, and without any foundation whatever. For some reason, entirely distinct from that upon which the common law revoked the will of a woman because of marriage subsequent to its execution, the statute of wills, 1 Vic. c. 26, § 18, from which our statute and the Kentucky statute were taken, makes the marriage of a man revoke his will.

At common law, the marriage of a woman absolutely revoked her will, except in the case of a will made in the exercise of a power of appointment. This rule was in logical conformity with the marital rights existing between husband and wife, in consequence of which a married woman could not make a will. Having no power to make a will, she could not revoke one; revocation being as much a testamentary act as the act of making an ordinary will. Hence, but for the act of the law in revoking on account of subsequent marriage, it would have become irrevocable because of marriage, and so would have lost one of the essential characteristics of a will, namely, revocability at the pleasure of the maker thereof. By the common law the legal existence of the wife was merged in that of her husband, in consequence of which she could have no power or control over her will during coverture, and her will could not then be ambulatory in its character. 1 Jar. Wills, 110; McAnnulty v. McAnnulty, 120 Ill. 26, 11 N. E. 397, 60 Am. Rep. 552; Swan v. Hammond, 138 Mass. 45, 52 Am. Rep. 255; Fellows v. Allen, 60 N. H. 439, 49 Am. Rep. 328; 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 316. At common law the will of a man was not revoked by marriage alone, but was revoked by marriage and the birth of a child conjointly. The reason assigned for this revocation was entirely different from that upon which the revocation, by marriage, of a will made by a woman, rested. Originally it was that the circumstances of marriage and the birth of a child wrought such a total change in the testator's situation as to raise the presumption that he could not intend a disposition of property previously made under wholly different circumstances to continue unchanged. 1 Jar. Wills, 111; Lugg v. Lugg, 2 Salk. 592; Gay v. Gay, 84 Ala. 38, 4 South. 42; Brush v. Wilkins, 4 Johns. Ch. 506; Havens v. Van Den Burgh, 1 Denio, 27. Later the ground of revocation in such cases was determined by the English courts to be, not a presumption of intent on the part of the testator, but a rule of law which annexed to the will a tacit condition that it should not take effect in case of marriage, and the birth of a child not provided for. Phaup v. Woodbridge, 14 Grat. 332; Marston v. Roe, 8 Ad. & E. 14; Israell v. Rodon, 2 Moore, P. O. 51; Jacks v. Henderson, 1 Desaus. 543. As the reason for making marriage work a revocation of a will made by a woman, and the reason for making the same act, supplemented by the birth of a child who could not take under the will, revoke a will made by a man, were wholly different at common law, except in one respect, namely, that both revocations were acts of the law, not dependent upon the intent of the parties, it is difficult to see how the reasoning of the court in the case of Stewart v. Mulholland can support the conclusion announced, for the statute makes marriage alone revoke a will antecedently executed, whether by a man or a woman, and the common-law reason given in the one case could not apply in the other. Another reason for upholding the will, given in that case, is that the antenuptial contract, the will, and the marriage were all one transaction, by reason of which the will was not deemed to have been made before the marriage. Whether this placed the decision upon better ground, need not be determined here.

The case just cited and discussed is the only one produced or found in which, under said section 18, 1 Vic. c. 26, marriage is held not to have revoked an antecedent will. Both Kentucky and this state took it from Virginia. It was construed in Phaup v. Wooldridge, 14 Grat. 332. In that case, Phaup, having made a will in July, 1852, and married in July, 1854, after having entered into a marriage settlement by which it was agreed that all the wife's property should be settled upon her, with general power of disposition, and that she should have no claim upon his estate, died in 1856, without issue of the marriage, leaving his wife surviving him; and it was held that the marriage revoked the will, all the judges concurring. After reviewing the authorities at length, Allen, P., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The statute of Victoria was understood by the commentator to be free from difficulty, and it is admitted that in England it must be taken literally to effectuate the intention of the Legislature. Ours is a literal copy, and why should it not receive the same construction? It lays down a plain rule; it makes one exception; and from what source can the courts derive any authority to make another? Our statute has received the same construction by Lomax (volume 3 of his Digest, p. 148), which has been put upon the English statute, and which it is conceded it must there receive. It is argued, however, that, where the interests of the new parties brought by the marriage into close relation with the testator are in no wise affected by the will, the reason for such revocation ceases, and therefore the law should not apply. If this position could be maintained, it would result in a repeal of this section 7 of our statute, for, in view of the provision of dower for the wife in the realty, her paramount right to her portion of the personalty, independent of any testamentary disposition, if she chooses to renounce the provision made for her in the will, and in view of the provisions made by Code, c. 77, §§ 17, 18, in favor of the children of the testator pretermitted, or born after the will, or posthumous, the rights growing out of this new relation are sufficiently protected, and therefore there was no necessity for such implied revocation. This might have been an argument against incorporating the provision contained in the statute of Victoria into our Code, but, when it has been so incorporated, it is not for the court to say that the Legislature did not mean precisely what they have said. They may have thought that as marriage is the most important step a man can take, gives rise to new duties, brings into close connection new parties, and of necessity calls for a different arrangement of his property, it should, without reference to the provision made by law for these new parties, lead to new arrangements in regard to his property."

Warter v. Warter, P. D. 15 (1890), is an English case, decided in 1890. In 1879 Taylor procured an absolute divorce from his wife, on the ground of adultery with Warter, in an action brought in the High Court of Judicature at Calcutta, India, under the divorce act of 1869, which imposed a condition upon the parties not to remarry within six months after the date of the divorce. Warter and Mrs. Taylor went to England and married within that period, and Warter executed a will by which he bestowed all his property on Mrs. Taylor, describing her as "my reputed wife." Afterwards, acting under advice of counsel, a second marriage was performed. In a contest over the will, the court held the first marriage void, and the will revoked by the second marriage. So thoroughly agreed upon the construction of the wills act are the English lawyers, that the only question argued was whether the first marriage was valid; and the court, after deciding against it, simply said the will was revoked by the second marriage.

The two views taken by the English courts as to the ground upon which the revocation, in the case of the will of a man, rested, which have been referred to, no doubt led to uncertainty and conflict in the decisions, and rendered unstable and uncertain titles to property. Where it was put upon the ground of presumed intention, the presumption was rebuttable, and, for overthrowing it, parol evidence was resorted to. Havens v. Van Den Burgh, cited; Wilcox v. Rootes, 1 Wash. (Va.) 140; Yerby v. Yerby, 8 Call, 334. For some reason—most likely, the great evil of uncertainty in the rules of property resulting from this practice—the English courts discarded the doctrine of presumed intention to revoke, and declared as a rule of law the revocation of a will by a subsequent marriage and birth of issue, and refused to receive any evidence of intention not to revoke. Pursuing this policy of securing certainty and stability in the rules of law determining the rights to property, the English Parliament, at about that period when so many great reforms affecting the landed estates of the realm were introduced—the reigns of William IV and the early part of Victoria—saw fit to extend the rule further, and fix it as we now have it in our statute. It was in opposition to this wills act that Lord Eldon, feeble and worn out with age and exertions, delivered his last speech in the House of Lords, after having unremittably fought all the reform measures up to that date, and opposed them as innovations upon the Constitution of his country. The courts having been compelled to declare a rule of property on the subject of the revocation of wills, and the Legislature having deemed it necessary to fix the rule by an act of Parliament for greater safety, it would be arguing in the face of experience, history, and law, both common and statute, to contend that that rule may be set aside by showing an intent, on the part of the testator, not to leave his property subject to its operation. On this subject, Jarman (an English author) says (volume 1, p. 112): "These clauses suggest two remarks: (1) That, unless in the expressly excepted cases, marriage alone will produce absolute and complete revocation, as to both real and personal estate, and that no declaration, however explicit and earnest, of the testator's wish that the will should continue in force after marriage—still less, any inference of intention drawn from the contents of the will, and, least of all, evidence collected allunde—will prevent the revocation."

The evil of uncertainty in the rules of property in Virginia, growing out of the presumption of revocation from marriage and birth of a child, led to the incorporation into the Virginia statute of provisions of the wills act (1 Vic. c. 26), including the one thus commented upon by Jarman: "The conflict of decision, and the evils arising from letting in parol testimony in such cases, so much against the policy of our legislation and the current of decisions in later times upon the subject of wills, may have had some influence in inducing the legislature, by adopting the provision of the statute of Victoria, to put to rest all question as to implied revocations by marriage and the birth of issue. They have done so by declaring that marriage alone, save in the excepted cases, shall be an absolute revocation." Phaup v. Wooldridge, cited.

Thus, upon reason and authority, it is clear that the will was revoked, notwithstanding the evidence apparent upon its face of a possible intent that it should remain effective after the marriage.

The next question is whether the will was revived on the 27th day of July, 1900, by the due execution of the following codicil: "I, John C. Marsh do make this a codicil to my will made on the 6 day of August 1895, I do nominate and appoint J. B. Watson as one of the executors of my will and do hereby revoke the appointment of W. R. Jewell to said will. Given under my hand this 27th day of July 1900. John C. Marsh." Section 8 of chapter 77 of the Code of 1899 says: "No will or codicil or any part thereof which shall be in any manner revoked, shall, after being revoked, be revived otherwise than by re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in the manner hereinbefore required, and then only the extent to which an intention to revive the same is shown." This was taken from section 22 of 1 Vic. c. 26. It is insisted that, under this section, a codicil, to have the effect of reviving a will, must refer to it in such manner as to show, on the face of the codicil, that the testator knew it was revoked, and wished to revive it. Some English decisions are referred to, which, it is argued, support this view; but a careful examination and analysis of them, together with opinions expressed by eminent English jurists, lead to a different conclusion. Williams on Executors, vol. 1, p. 187, says, if a codicil is executed according to the exigencies of the new statute, "it will amount to a republication of the will, according to the old law, as above stated, unless it appears on the face of it that it was not the intention of the testator to republish, or unless the will has been in some manner revoked, in which case the new statute further requires that the codicil should show an intention to revive the will." In a note referred to at the end of the last clause of this quotation, it is shown that under this statute a revoked will has been held to be revived by a codicil merely referring to it as "the last will of me," and as "my said will," and containing no express words of ratification or revival. Neate v. Pickard, Prerog. T. T. 1843. This note further says: "Again, where one part of a will in duplicate remained undestroyed in the possession of the testator, but the other part, in the possession of his solicitor, had been destroyed by the testator on the execution of a subsequent will, made in 1838, in terms revoking the prior will, it was held that such prior will was revived by a codicil made subsequently to the second will, though referring to the prior will merely by date; for that such reference sufficiently showed 'an intention to revive.' Payne v. Trappes, 1 Rob. 588. See, also, Hale v. Tokelove, 2 Rob. 318." The reports given in this note are not in the library, but it is not to be assumed the cases are misrepresented in this excellent work. 1 Jar. Wills, 156, says that in Neate v. Pickard, cited in the note to Williams, Ex., the testator confirmed his "last will," without referring to the date. The use of the word "confirmed" in the codicil, if that is the meaning of the author, seems not to have been regarded as material. It no more imports an intention to revive, or a knowledge of previous revocation, than the words "my will" or "my last will." At any rate, English authority clearly shows such words as "revive," "ratify," and "confirm" are unnecessary. "The deceased executed a will in 1866, and a codicil to it in May, 1871. In November, 1871, he executed a will which revoked all previous testamentary papers. In 1872 he executed a paper which was headed, 'This is a codicil to the will of R., dated May, 1866.' It concluded with the appointment of the son as executor of the will and codicil, and the attestation clause commenced, 'Codicil of the will of R., dated,

May, 1866, in the presence of,' etc. Held, that the only intention to be gathered from the words of the codicil was that the testator intended to revive the will of 1866, but not the codicil of May, 1871." In the Goods of Reynolds, L. R. 3 P. & D. 35. This codicil contained no express words of revival, ratification, or confirmation. Again, Jarman says (volume 1, p. 155): "A recognition in a codicil of the earlier of two inconsistent wills, by date or otherwise, as the will on which the codicil is founded, shows an intention to revive such earlier will." Citing Re Reynolds and Re Stedham, 6 P. D., decided in 1881. In the Stedham Case the testator made a will, and afterwards another, which by implication revoked the former. Subsequently, by the terms of a duly executed codicil, he, by mistake, referred to the former, instead of the latter, will; and it was held that the codicil, by its language, revived the former will. The reference was: "This is a codicil to my will which bears date the 21st day of May, 1877." The codicils in each of the cases above referred to made some alterations in the disposition of the testator's property, as found in the will of which it became a part; but this is by no means an express declaration of intent to revive, nor a declaration from which such intent can be more readily or clearly inferred than from the reference to the will by its date as "my will." Moreover, it is plain that in such cases the courts look to these provisions for the purposes of identifying the will, the intent to revive which is found in the reference by date, and the expression, "my will," or to see whether the intent shown by the reference is contradicted by the provisions of the codicil. Re Stedham, 6 P. & D. 205; Re Reynolds, 3 P. & D. 35; Re Steele, Re May, and Re Wilson, 1 P. & D. 575. The three cases in 1 P. & D., just cited, all of which, being similar, were disposed of in a single opinion, are relied upon by the appellants as sustaining their view. The opinion, it is true, is a strong argument against revival by implication, since the passage of the wills act of 1 Victoria, but it must be read in the light of the peculiar facts involved. All three cases involved the question whether a will which had been revoked, and for which another had been substituted, was revived by a subsequent codicil. In the first case a will had been made January 16, 1866, and another October 25, 1866, revoking the former. On January 12, 1868, the testator made a codicil to his "last will and testament, which will bears date the 16th day of January last past." Because of the words "last will," found in the codicil, it was held not to have revived the will of January 16, 1866. In the second case the testator made a will January 11, 1860, married August 18, 1860, and on the same day, after marriage, made a second will revoking the first, tore off the signature of his first will in September, 1860, and on July 3, 1861, made a codicil, describing it as "a codicil of the last will and testament of me, John May, &c., and which bears date, the 11th of January, 1860." This codicil, it was decided, did not revive the first will, and thereby revoke the second. In the third case the testator made a will September 24, 1858, and another July 16, 1861, disposing of all his property. The first will was found after his death, with the signature torn off, and had been used by him as a draft for the second. On December 20, 1864, he made a codicil, declaring it to be a codicil to his "last will and testament, dated the 24th of September, 1858," but the contents of the codicil plainly showed that he really meant the will of 1861, and probate of that will was granted. By way of introduction, the court said in its opinion in these three cases: "This is a question of construction." In the construction of these three codicils, the court kept in mind certain rules, one of which is that a codicil will not, in law, revive the first will, in such case, if it has been not only revoked, but destroyed, animo revocandi, as was true of the first will in each of the last two cases. For this, Hale v. Tokelove, 2 Rob. 318, Newton v. Newton, 5 L. T. (N. S.) 218, and Rogers v. Goodenough, 2 Sw. & Tr. 342, were referred to. Another rule was that the intent was to be determined and ascertained by a reasonable construction of the language used, and not by any binding force which the law attached to certain words or expressions, for which proposition Payne v. Trappes, 1 Rob. 583, and Marsh v. Marsh, 1 Sw. & Tr. 583, were cited. Another was that the surrounding circumstances and situation of the testator might be considered in connection with the papers left by him, as in other cases, calling for construction and interpretation of written instruments. Another was that the intent manifested by a reference in a codicil to a revoked will might be contradicted and overborne by the provisions and recitals of the codicil itself. All these rules, applied to the facts in the several cases, lead unmistakably to the conclusion adopted by the court, without denying or in any manner impairing the proposition that a codicil, by referring to a revoked will, describing it by date and as the will of the testator, will, in the absence of contradictory matter, or circumstances calling for the application of the rules of construction referred to, revive the will. The following extract from the opinion establishes the correctness of this analysis of it: "It is proper here to take note of the case of Payne v. Trappes. In that case there would seem to have been but little beyond the reference by date to show the intention to revive a former will. But the court did not lay down the proposition that the date alone was sufficient. On the contrary, the learned judge said he must 'gather the intention from the codicil itself,' 'that the intention to revive the former will was clearly shown,' and 'that the testator had taken great pains to describe the instrument to which the paper was intended as a codicil.' The decision proceeded upon the ground that the judge was convinced of the testator's intention, not that he felt bound by the language in the face of an opposite conviction. On the other hand, I am much fortified in the view I take of the meaning of the statute by the remarks of Sir C. Cresswell in the case of Marsh v. Marsh. I allude to his statement that the words 'last will' and 'prima facie' refer to the real last will, and particularly to the opinion he there expressed, that 'it appears to have been the object of the legislature to put an end equally to implied revocations and implied revivals.' Nor does this view conflict with the enunciation of the law found in the syllabus, which reads, in part, as follows: "In order to satisfy those words, the intention must appear on the face of the codicil, either by express words referring to a will as revoked, and importing an intention to revive the same, or by a disposition of the testator's property inconsistent with any other intention, or by some other expression conveying to the mind of the court with reasonable certainty the existence of the intention. Since the passing of the statute, a will cannot be revived by mere implication." These cases belong to a class forming no exception to the general rule, but calling for a cautious application of it. It is referred to by Jarman (volume 1, pp. 155, 156).

To attempt a review of all the English and Canadian cases bearing on the question would be a waste of time. Enough has been shown to make it clear that these authorities do not support the contention of counsel for appellant, and some attention will now be given to the Virginia cases. The Virginia statute and ours differ from that of 1 Victoria in phraseology, but evidently not in meaning or effect. Section 22 of 1 Vic. c. 26, reads as follows: "No will or codicil, or any part thereof, which shall be in any manner revoked, shall be revived otherwise than by the re-execution thereof, or by a codicil executed in manner hereinbefore required, and showing an intention to revive the same; and when any will or codicil which shall be partly revoked, and afterwards wholly revoked, shall be revived, such revival shall not extend to so much thereof as shall have been revoked before the revocation of the whole thereof, unless an intention to the contrary shall be shown." It contains two clauses, and it is manifest that our Legislature has compressed both into one by changing the language of the first, from the words, "showing an intention to revive the same," so as to read "and then only [to] the extent to which an intention to revive the same is shown." As the second clause of the English act has not been, in terms, adopted by ours, and the report of the revisers, recommending the enactment of our present statute, has failed to assign any reason for the change in the language of the first clause, and, on its face, it appears to have been the result of an effort to combine both in one, it is fair to assume that such was the case, and that there was no intention to alter the sense or effect of section 22 of 1 Victoria, c. 26, in so adopting it in different language and condensed form.

Only two cases have been decided in Virginia which are said to bear upon the question of the construction of our statute (section 8, c. 77, Code 1899), since it went into effect in that state, in the year 1850, and neither of them is directly in point. Corr v. Porter, 33 Grat. 278, was decided in 1880, but the will and codicil involved were dated, respectively, 1819 and 1820, and they were governed by the common-law rules. Moreover, it was not a case of revival of a revoked will, but one of republication of an existing will, so as to bring it down to the date of the codicil, and thereby make it effective, under the statute abolishing estates tail. Under the present statute, as well as at common law, there seems to be a difference between revival and republication. See Bilke v. Roper, 45 Ch. Div. 632; Williams, Ex'rs, 187. For this additional reason, it is almost wholly inapplicable here. Hatcher v. Hatcher, 80 Va. 169, was decided on the principles governing republication, instead of revival, also. "Upon a paper whereon there was writing, dated 1858, and purporting to dispose of H.'s property, but without signature or attestation, H., in 1864, wrote another instrument, with the caption, 'Codicil to the above will,' which instrument was duly executed and attested. Held, the execution of the codicil effects the republication of the will, and brings the latter down to the date of the codicil, so that both speak as of the same date." Hatcher v. Hatcher, supra. Whether, in law, it was a republication of an existing will, or the execution of a will which had never before existed, as insisted by counsel for appellants, it is quite plain that it was not a revival of a revoked will, and therefore the statute had no application. Common-law principles governed it. The difference between republication of an existing will, and revival or republication of a revoked will by a codicil, is that in the latter case the codicil must show an intent to revive, while in the former it need not—the statute being silent on the subject—in consequence of which the common law, as modified by the statute of frauds, governs. Williams, Ex'rs, 186; 1 Jar. Will, 158, 159. If, however, it could be said there is no such distinction, and the Virginia decisions referred to, or either of them, are authorities upon the question of revival, under the statute, they uphold the views expressed here.

The codicil in this case not only refers to the will by its date, and describes it as "my will," but revokes the appointment of one of the executors, and names another in his stead. It leaves no room for question or doubt as to the identity of the will to which it refers, and appoints an executor for the will referred to, not an executor, merely. It says, "I do nominate and appoint J. B. Watson as one of the executors of my will and do hereby revoke the appointment of W. R. Jewell to said will." The will referred to had named two executors, and the codicil said Watson should be one of the executors of his will. All this could mean nothing short of an intent that the will referred to should be carried into effect. This sufficiently evidences an intent to revive, as shown by the authorities cited. Jarman says (volume 1, p. 159): "In Serocold v. Hemming, 2 Lee, Eccl. Rep. 490 [not in our library], a testator wrote at the bottom of his will a codicil not expressly mentioning the will, but directing certain annuities to be paid 'by my executors above named.' It was held that the reference was sufficient to revive the will." And this seems clearly to have been since the passage of the statute.

The rulings of the court, verdict of the jury, and decree complained of being in conformity with the principles here announced, it is unnecessary to enter upon any discussion of the exceptions to the rulings of the court. It is admitted by counsel on both sides that the only question involved is the construction of the statute, and sufficiency of the codicil to revive, in case the will is held to have been revoked.

The decree is right, and will be affirmed.

CAIN v. BROWN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 9, 1904.)

TAXES—SALE—REDEMPTION—SUFFICIENCY —TITLE ACQUIRED.

1. The statute allowing infants one year after becoming of age in which to redeem lands sold for nonpayment of taxes is construed liberally in their favor.

2. Where land assessed to the heirs of a deceased person becomes delinquent for nonpayment of taxes, and, before sale for such delinquency, partition thereof is made among the heirs, and part of the land allotted to one of the heirs is purchased by a stranger at the tax sale, any of those who shared in the partition, and against whom the tax was assessed, may redeem.

3. Actual production of the money in offering to redeem is not necessary, when the purchaser declines to allow redemption, on the ground that the party is not entitled to redeem.

4. Where part of the land belonging to coparceners, and charged with taxes against them as heirs, has been sold by the sheriff for nonpayment of taxes and purchased by a stranger, and is so sold again for the nonpayment of the taxes assessed against the same persons for whose delinquency the first sale was made, but for years subsequent to those for the taxes of which the preceding sale was made, and one of the heirs buys the land at the second sale, and the purchaser at the first sale does not redeem from such second purchaser, the heir so purchasing acquires, as against him, a superior and better right to the title.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by James Cain against T. P. R. Brown, trustee, and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Bent and J. J. Coniff, for appellant. Harding & Harding, for appellees.

POFFENBARGER, P. A tract of land, containing 561 acres, delinquent for taxes for the years 1893 and 1894, assessed to "John M. Crouch, Sr.'s heirs," was sold by the sheriff of Randolph county, in the month of November, 1895, and purchased by James Cain. John M. Crouch, Sr., dying some time prior to the year 1893, seised of a large landed estate, of which said tract formed a part, left surviving him his widow, Anna G. Crouch, who subsequently married, and was thereafter known as Anna G. Phillips, and three children, Charles E. Crouch, John M. Crouch, and Lillie J. Crouch. By some means, unexplained in the record and briefs, the widow owned one-tenth of said tract, and the three children three-tenths each. At the time of said sale Charles E. Crouch was of age, but the other two children were minors. John M. Crouch, Jr., was born May 11, 1876, and Lillie J. Crouch May 7, 1880. Before the expiration of one year after the sale, Charles E. Crouch redeemed from the purchaser his undivided three-tenths.

On the 22d day of October, 1897, a decree was made and entered by the circuit court of Randolph county, by which all the lands of which John M. Crouch, Sr., died seised and possessed were partitioned among the heirs, and to Charles E. Crouch a tract of 750 acres was assigned, which included said tract of 561 acres. To this suit Anna G. Phillips was a party, and to her was allotted one-tenth of the whole estate. On the 17th day of November, 1897, James Cain, the purchaser of said 561-acre tract, still holding seven-tenths of the same unredeemed, applied for, and received from the clerk of the county court of said county, a deed for an undivided seven-tenths thereof. Prior to the execution of this deed, however, T. P. R. Brown, representing Anna G. Phillips in her own right, and as the mother and agent of John M. Crouch, Jr., and Lillie J. Crouch, her infant children, called upon Cain and offered to pay the amount due him on his purchase of the land. The money had been furnished to him by Mrs. Phillips after he had calculated the amount necessary to effect the redemption, and he told Cain that Mrs. Phillips had said he had promised her, upon a former occasion, before the expiration of one year from the date of the sale, to allow her to redeem after the expiration of the year, and that he had come to redeem in pursuance of that agreement. Cain refused to allow him to redeem, saying Mrs. Phillips had not done as she had promised, and that he intended to take a deed for the land. Cain does not deny that Brown called upon him, but says he offered to redeem only the interest of Mrs. Phillips, that he did not tender any money, and that he (Cain) does not remember of Brown's having mentioned the alleged verbal agreement between him and Mrs. Phillips. Brown's statement of the occurrence is positive and full as to details. He says he explained to Cain the rights of the infants to redeem, and that he urged him to accept the money, telling him that, if he refused and took a deed, a suit to set the deed aside would be instituted. He further says Cain seemed reluctant to talk about it, and that his impression is that Cain informed him that he had taken advice concerning the matter.

The tract of land was charged on the land books against the John M. Crouch, Sr., heirs for the years 1895 and 1896 also, and was again sold by the sheriff in the month of December, 1897, about a month after Cain had taken his deed, and was purchased by T. P. R. Brown, trustee, acting, as is charged by Cain and admitted by Brown, for Mrs. Phillips, John M. Crouch, Jr., and Lillie J. Crouch, and was paid for by Brown with money furnished him for that purpose by Mrs. Phillips. Prior to this purchase, as claimed by Cain, but subsequent thereto, as claimed by Brown and the other defendants, an executory contract of sale of this tract of land was entered into by Charles E. Crouch and the Bakers and Nelsons, whereby Crouch agreed to sell said tract to W. E. Baker, C. C. Baker, P. M. Nelson, R. L. Nelson, and R. M. Nelson. As to the date of this contract there is some controversy, but by a clear preponderance of evidence it is shown to have been made about the middle of January, 1899. On the 20th day of December, T. P. R. Brown, trustee, assigned the benefit of his purchase to the Bakers and Nelsons, and Charles E. Crouch and wife, on the 10th day of March, 1899, executed to them a deed for the tract of land, in pursuance of the contract of sale. On the 20th day of December, 1899, the clerk of the county court executed a deed to Baker and Nelson in pursuance of the purchase made by Brown at the tax sale in December, 1897.

On the 28th day of February, 1898, John M. Crouch, Jr., died, and his mother, brother, and sister inherited whatever interest he may have then had in the tract of land. Several attempts were made by Charles E. Crouch to redeem from Cain. He tendered Cain the money in April, 1898, to redeem the interest of John M. Crouch, Jr., and, upon Cain's refusal to accept, he deposited it with the clerk of the county court May 6, 1898. On October 6, 1899, he deposited with the clerk an additional sum for the redemption of the interest of Anna G. Phillips, then deceased, and took a receipt reciting that said sum had been tendered to Cain by Mrs. Phillips in her lifetime. On the same day, he deposited a further sum to redeem the interest of Lillie J. Crouch, taking a receipt reciting that it had been previously tendered to Cain.

In May, 1899, Cain brought this suit to set aside the tax deed executed to Baker and Nelson, and the deed executed by Charles E. Crouch to Baker and Nelson, and to have the tract of land partitioned between him and Charles E. Crouch, or those who are entitled to the three-tenths interest in the said land redeemed by said Crouch. The bill was answered by Brown, Crouch, and Baker and Nelson, and depositions were taken and filed, and upon the hearing the court entered a decree dismissing the plaintiff's bill and authorizing the clerk of the county court to pay to him the several sums previously deposited for the redemption of the land.

In one aspect of the case, the two pivotal questions are, first, whether Anna G. Phillips, John M. Crouch, Jr., and Lillie J. Crouch had such interest in the land on or about the 17th day of November, 1897, when T. P. R. Brown waited upon Cain for the purpose of redeeming on their behalf, as entitled them to redeem; and, second, whether what Brown did amounted to a sufficient offer to redeem the interest of all, or any, of the parties whom he represented.

On the 22d day of the preceding month the whole of the land in question had been set apart and allotted to Charles E. Crouch in the partition suit, and the legal title to the same was thereby vested in him. After that, did his former co-tenants have any interest in that tract of land? It is insisted for the appellant that they did not, and that their power of redemption had been taken away by the transfer of their title to Charles E. Crouch. There was an implied warranty on their part of the title to the tract of land so set apart to their co-tenant. On failure of his title, it became obligatory upon them to make good his loss. Bowers v. Dickinson, 30 W. Va. 709, 6 S. E. 335; Dingess v. Marcum, 41 W. Va. 757, 24 S. E. 624; Freem. Co-Ten. § 533. This obligation was not an estate or direct interest in the land, legal or equitable, perhaps, but it gave them the right to uphold the title of their co-tenant. This right is incident to, grows out of, and may be treated as a part of the estate which the co-tenants had in all the lands divided among them. All the co-tenants are to be regarded as having held, before the partition, one entire title to one entire tract of land, and each, by maintaining the title of the other after partition, sustains the one single title to all the land divided among them. Each must do so, else the partition, in a measure, fails. The maintenance of the title of Charles E. Crouch was a matter of interest and importance to his co-tenants, for the sole reason that his land had constituted a part of the whole estate divided among them, and failure of his title would have necessitated compensation out of their land. Though they may not have had an interest in that land, in the sense of an estate therein, they had a deep financial interest in it, in the sense of the failure of the title thereto inflicting loss upon them. This relation to the land, coupled with the fact that they were former owners of it, in whose name it had been assessed and taxed, and the very persons to whom the right of redemption is given by the strict letter of the statute, clearly sustains their right to redeem. "All that is required is proof of some connection, past or present, with the title, by deed, descent, contract, or possession. If this is made out, the party will be allowed to redeem without considering whether the title really is in him or in some adverse claimant." Blackwell on Tax Titles, §§ 704, 707.

From the evidence, it is clear and indisputable that Brown did call upon Cain with the money to redeem for the two infants before their right of redemption expired. He says he had the money with him, and told Cain he had come to redeem the land for the infants and their mother, and that Cain said the mother had not done as she had promised, and he intended to take a deed. The redemption statute is broadly and liberally construed by all courts in favor of persons to whom it gives the right of redemption. Blackwell on Tax Titles, § 704; Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) 1023. Cain says he did not produce the money. Actual tender of lawful money was excused by Cain's refusal to permit redemption. Poling v. Parsons, 38 W. Va. 80, 18 S. E. 379; Townshend v. Shaffer, 30 W. Va. 176, 3 S. E. 586; Danser v. Johnsons, 25 W. Va. 380. Cain says Brown offered to redeem for no one except Mrs. Phillips. Brown says he not only went to him to redeem for all the parties, and with sufficient money to do so, but brought to Cain's attention the fact that two of them were infants and had the right to redeem. He also says he thinks Cain told him he had taken legal advice on the subject of this right of redemption. Cain's subsequent conduct, and his position in this case, indicate that he relied then, as now, upon the extinguishment of the right of redemption on the part of the two infants by the decree of partition. He does not deny that the rights of the infants were discussed by Brown, nor that he told Brown that he had consulted counsel on the subject. Upon the whole, Brown's testimony is not only the more satisfactory in its terms, but is more consistent with the prior and subsequent conduct of the parties and the circumstances surrounding them; for which reason we conclude that a sufficient offer to redeem on behalf of John M. Crouch, Jr., and Lillie J. Crouch was made within the time allowed them by the statute in which to redeem. Cain having declined to permit redemption, after the interests of all the parties represented by Brown had been brought to his attention, it was unnecessary for Brown to count out the actual amount of redemption money due from each of the parties represented by him and make an actual tender of each separate amount. To require this would be to give the redemption statute a strict construction which the authorities do not warrant.

The offer to redeem in due time invalidated Cain's deed, and inured to the benefit of Chas. E. Crouch, though not made by him, and perfected his title in equity to the six-tenths of the land owned by John M. Crouch, Jr., and Lillie J. Crouch before the partition, and the right thereby vested in him to have Cain's deed canceled as to said interests passed to his grantees by force of the contract and deed executed by him later. This conclusion renders discussion of the other efforts to redeem unnecessary.

As to the interest of Anna G. Phillips, the period within which redemption might be made had expired long before Brown attempted to redeem for her. There is no competent evidence of any agreement on the part of Cain to allow her to redeem after the expiration of the redemption period, unless it can be said that Cain, by saying she had not done as she had promised, admitted such agreement. That this statement amounts to an admission that there was an agreement relating to the matter of redemption is clear, but there is no evidence showing the terms of the agreement. The statement made by Cain may be treated as one of confession and avoidance. Upon it, an inference that there had been an extension of time may be based, but it appears from the same statement that the condition upon which it was given had not been complied with, or that the time had again expired. As to her interest, therefore, there was no redemption.

Did she acquire a right superior to Cain's by the purchase made for her by Brown at the tax sale on the 14th day of December, 1897? But for her failure, as one of the heirs of John M. Crouch, Sr., in whose name the lands were assessed with the taxes for the years 1895 and 1896, for the nonpayment of which the sale at which she purchased was made, to discharge her duty by paying the taxes, the land would not have been sold at that time. To her coheirs and to the state she owed the duty of paying the taxes, and, as against them, she could acquire no right by her purchase at a sale predicated upon her omissions of that duty. Battin v. Woods, 27 W. Va. 58; Williamson v. Russell, 18 W. Va. 623; State v. Eddy, 41 W. Va. 95, 23 S. E. 529; Cooley on Taxation, 964; Blackwell on Tax Titles, § 566. But to Cain she owed no duty. His claim upon the title to the land was adverse to her interest. He claimed, on the ground of forfeiture and purchase by him from the state, the very title which she had, and was bound by her own interest, to uphold and defend. Between them there was no privity. Their claims were adverse and hostile, and all duties respecting the land and the taxes thereon, previously resting upon her, were due from her to the state and persons other than Cain, and of her violation of any of them he had no reason to complain, and her failure respecting them conferred no right upon him. Many authorities hold that no person can be a purchaser at a tax sale whose duty it was to pay the taxes for the nonpayment of which the land is sold, on the theory that the law permits no man to take advantage of his own wrong; but this rule is generally applied where the upholding of such purchase would prejudice the rights of co-tenants or other persons standing in a relation of privity or confidence with the delinquent taxpayer purchasing the land. Thus, a tenant whose duty it is to pay the taxes cannot allow the land to become delinquent, and then purchase it, and thereby acquire his landlord's title. Nor can an agent acquire the lands of his principal, nor a guardian, administrator, or executor the lands of the ward or heirs, nor the husband the lands of the wife. But where no such relation exists, there is no reason for the application of the rule, and the views expressed by Judge Cooley in his work on Taxation (3d Ed.) pp. 974-976, are unanswerable, except by reference to a mere technicality. He says: "There being nothing in the relation of the parties to each other upon which an estoppel can be raised, it is necessary to look elsewhere for the disqualification insisted upon, and this can only be found in some general rule of public policy. It is certainly an imperative requirement of public policy that the revenues of the state shall be collected, and that no one shall be allowed to defraud the treasury of his due proportion; but in the case where a tax sale has been made there is no fraud, and the revenue chargeable upon the land has been received. No wrong has consequently been done to the state. There has been delay in payment, but it is one for which the state makes ample provision, and for which it charges and collects all costs, as well as a further sum, under the name of interest or penalty, sufficient fully to compensate for any public inconvenience. It is not perceived that the state can then have any complaint to make, as the duty owing to it, though performed tardily, has been performed at last, and the incidental inconvenience paid for. The state, then, not being wronged in the purchase, it would seem that if any individual objects to it he ought to be able to point out how and in what particular it wrongs him. It is difficult to dispute the truth of what is said by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, that 'there is nothing in reason or law to prevent a man who holds a defective title from purchasing a better at a treasurer's sale for taxes.' As between himself and any adverse claimant, the state is not concerned to inquire whether the one or the other was in possession. If the state, in taxing land, takes any notice of ownership, it is either for the convenience of the officers in making collections, or for information to parties concerned. The tax is upon every possible interest in the land, and all parties having interests are equally under obligation to the state to make payment. The penalty for failure is a forfeiture or sale which will cut them all off; and while, without doubt, any one may defeat such a sale who can give satisfactory reasons for an assertion that it would be unjust to him for the purchaser to be allowed to reply upon it, it is not perceived that any other person can, upon plausible grounds of equity, insist upon the privilege to do so."

The application to this case of the reasoning found in the above quotation, which we approve, gives the assignees of the purchase made by Mrs. Phillips a right to the title superior to that of Cain. Had any stranger to the title, owing no duty to pay the taxes for which it was sold, made this purchase, it would undoubtedly be good against Cain. Why, then, is not the purchase of Mrs. Phillips, whose interests were adverse to his, and who owed him no duty in the premises, equally good? What the status of her purchase would be, if attacked by Charles E. Crouch or some person claiming under him, or by some one else to whom she was under obligation to protect the land from sale, or estopped by her situation from holding the title so acquired, we need not decide. It is generally held that the purchase operates, in such case, as a redemption, or as a mere payment of the taxes, and confers no title. Battin v. Woods, cited. Whether this be true, or whether the purchaser takes a good title, but is, in equity, bound to hold it in trust for his co-tenant, principal, landlord, ward, or other person whose rights he has violated, like one who purchases land with money furnished for the purpose by another, and takes a deed conveying it to himself, are questions not presented by this record, for no such person complains. It is enough to say the sale cannot be set aside at the instance of one to whom the purchaser owed no duty which has been omitted, and who stands, not in any relation of privity or confidence with, but in an attitude of manifest and extreme hostility to, the purchaser.

Seeing no error in the decree, we affirm it.

(54 W. Va. 581.)

CRESAP v. CRESAP et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 9, 1904.)

APPEAL — LIMITATIONS — CONSTRUCTION OF WILL — CLAIM OF REALTY — LACHES — RES JUDICATA — PLEADING — EXCEPTIONS TO ANSWER — RESULTING TRUST.

1. The date of a decree or judgment, as shown by the record, marks the point of time from which the statute of limitation governing an appeal from, or writ of error thereto, commences to run.

2. Where a widow is executrix of the will of her late husband, and claims certain real estate under the will as a devisee therein, and also claims it as her individual property upon a resulting trust, as against her husband's estate, she may set up her individual claim to said property in a bill filed by her to construe the will and settle the estate.

3. Laches is inexcusable delay in asserting a right, and is an equitable defense, controlled by equitable considerations. To be a bar, the lapse of time must be so great, and the relation of the defendant to the right such, that it would be inequitable to permit the plaintiff to assert it, where he has had, for a considerable period, knowledge of its existence, or might have acquainted himself with it by the use of reasonable diligence.

4. Point 1 in Biern v. Ray, 38 S. E. 530, 49 W. Va. 129, and in Sayre's Adm'r v. Harpold, 11 S. E. 16, 33 W. Va. 553, approved and applied.

5. Where exceptions to a part of an answer are sustained, and the defendant does not ask leave to amend his answer, it is not error to proceed to hear the case on the bill, and so much of the answer as is not excepted to.

6. Where the husband buys land with the wife's money, and with her assent, but, without her knowledge or consent, takes the title to the property to himself, and such facts are established by clear and satisfactory proof, and the transaction is free from fraud against creditors, equity will treat the property as her separate estate, and establish a resulting trust in her favor, good both as against the husband and his creditors.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by Agnes O. Cresap against the Bank of West Virginia and others. Decree for plaintiff. Certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. B. Maxwell, for appellants. Sam V. Woods, for appellee.

MILLER, J. Appellee Nannie I. Brown insists that this appeal should be dismissed because, as she claims, the term of the court at which the decree appealed from was entered commenced on the 21st day of January, 1901, and was continued from day to day until the 1st day of February, 1901, when the said decree was entered in the record. The appeal was allowed on the 23d day of January, 1903, more than two years from the commencement of the term at which said decree was pronounced. In Dew v. Judges, 3 Hen. & M. 27, 3 Am. Dec. 639, the court says: "The term 'session,' when applied to courts, means the whole term, and, in legal construction, the whole term is construed as but one day, and that day is always referred to the first day or commencement of the term." In Dunn's Ex'rs v. Renick, 40 W. Va. 349, 360, 22 S. E. 66, 70, it is said: "By reason of this rule that the whole term is one day, the common-law rule was that a judgment rendered on any day has relation to, and is a judgment of, its first day." Tidd, Prac. 547; 1 Lomax, Dig. 287; 1 Black, Judg. § 441; 2 Freem. Judg. § 369; Farley v. Lea, 32 Am. Dec. 680. This doctrine or rule had always been recognized in Virginia before we had a statute, but is now embodied in a statute, as regards the effect of the judgment as a lien. Code 1899, c. 139, § 5; Society v. Stanard, 4 Munf. 539; Coutts v. Walker, 2 Leigh, 268; Skipwith's Ex'r v. Cunningham, 8 Leigh, 272, 31 Am. Dec. 642;

Withers v. Carter, 4 Grat. 418, 50 Am. Dec. 78. The court, in Dunn's Ex'rs v. Renick, supra, holds: "Though a decree or judgment relate to the first day of a term, yet, if the case was not ready for hearing or trial, and therefore no judgment or decree could have been given on such first day, it does not relate to the first day, but has the date of its actual entry on the record." This rule of law seems to be necessary, in order to give effect to the proceedings of the courts. Without it the administration of justice might be thwarted in many cases by successive alienations of property pending the suit wherein the property is the object of the litigation. All men are presumed to take notice of the proceedings in courts of justice.

Section 3 of chapter 135 of the Code of 1899 provides that "no petition shall be presented for an appeal from, or writ of error or supersedeas to, any judgment, decree or order, whether the state be a party thereto or not, nor to any judgment of a circuit court or municipal court rendered in an appeal from the judgment of a justice, which shall have been rendered or made more than two years before such petition is presented." The petition for the appeal in this case describes the decree, in part, as having been made on the 1st day of February, 1901, but does not give the date of the commencement of the term at which the decree was entered. It is probable that no petition for an appeal or writ of error can be found among the records of this court, which describes the decree or judgment sought to be reviewed by the date only of the first day of the term of the court at which it was made and rendered. It is believed to be the universal practice to state in the petition the day on which the decree or judgment was made or entered, as the date of such decree or judgment. Such seems to be the construction placed upon the statute by the bar. No appeal from a decree or writ of error to a judgment can be allowed, or correction thereof made, under chapter 134 of the Code of 1899, until the same be entered on the record of the court. Certainly no execution can be issued thereon until the record thereof be made and signed by the judge. The execution must follow the judgment, and be supported by it. Freeman on Ex. 42; Herm. on Ex. vol. 1, § 42. It is a part and continuation of the record.

In order to stop the running of the statute of limitations, it is necessary to present a petition, in a case specified by the statute, to the Supreme Court of Appeals, or to a judge thereof, in vacation, within a time limited by the statute. It is a sufficient compliance with the terms of the statute if the petition for an appeal or writ of error be presented within the time limited. Ambrouse's Heirs v. Keller, 22 Grat. 769. In Hoy v. Hughes, 27 W. Va. 778, 780, the court cites Buster v. Holland, Id. 510, and holds that no appeal can be entertained from any decree of any character, whether final or interlocutory, which had been rendered more than two years before the petition for the appeal was presented. Stout v. Phillips M. & M. Co., 41 W. Va. 339, 23 S. E. 571, 56 Am. St. Rep. 843; Tiernan's Adm'r v. Minghini's Adm'r, 28 W. Va. 314. As to appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States, the act of Congress provides that no judgment, decree, or order of a circuit court or district court in any civil action at law or in equity shall be reviewed in the Supreme Court on writ of error or appeal unless the writ of error is brought or the appeal taken within two years after the entry of such judgment, decree, or order. Rev. St. U. S. 1878, § 1008 [U. S. Comp. St. 1901, p. 715]. In the case of Iron Co. v. Hoagland, 105 U. S. 701, 26 L. Ed. 1109, decided at its October term, 1881, under the statute above cited the court held that "the time within which a writ of error must be served, in order that it may operate as a supersedeas, must be computed from the date of the judgment which is the subject of review." In the case of Cummings v. Jones, 104 U. S. 419, 26 L. Ed. 824, decided at the same term, the court held that "the judgment of a state court cannot be re-examined here unless within two years after it was rendered a writ of error be brought." Barton's Law Pr. vol. 1, 53, 57, cites several decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia construing the statute of that state relating to appeals and writs of error, which statute is somewhat similar to our own. In all of the decisions examined, the actual date of the decree or judgment, as shown by the record, marks the time from which the statute of limitations governing the allowance of appeals from, and writs of error to, decrees and judgments, commences to run.

In the light of the adjudicated cases, we therefore hold that the date of the decree or judgment complained of, as shown by the record, is the point of time from which the statute of limitations governing an appeal from, or writ of error thereto, commenced to run. However, in computing the time within which an appeal or writ of error may be allowed, Code 1899, c. 13, § 12, must not be overlooked. The appeal in this case was therefore allowed within the time prescribed by the statute in such case made and provided.

Appellants Gustavus J. Cresap, Rachel R. Murdoch (née Cresap), and Mary B. Cresap insist that the main question, to wit, the right and title to the "John Burkett property," situate in the town of Beverly, which was conveyed to C. J. P. Cresap by deed dated June 2, 1871, attempted to be adjudicated and determined by the decree now complained of, made and entered by the said circuit court on the 1st day of February, 1901, was at the date of said decree res judicata by the decision of this court, pronounced on the 6th day of December, 1890, in Cresap v. Cresap, 34 W. Va. 310, 12 S. E. 527. This suit was originally brought by Agnes C. Cresap, widow and executrix of the last will and testament of Charles J. P. Cresap, deceased, referred to above as C. J. P. Cresap, against the devisees and creditors of said testator, to ascertain the several creditors of the decedent, and the amount and priorities of their demands against the estate; to provide for the payment of said demands, when so ascertained; and to have a settlement of the accounts of plaintiff as such executrix. The plaintiff afterwards filed an amended bill, in which she set up a claim individually, under the said will, to the title in fee simple to all of the real estate, and to the absolute ownership of all the personal property, of which said testator died seised and possessed, subject only to the payment of his debts and the lawful expenses of the administration of the estate. She prayed in her said amended bill that the said will be construed by the court, and that her rights, powers, and duties under the provisions thereof be ascertained and declared, in order that she might administer the estate according to the true intent and meaning of said will, and for general relief. Said Gustavus J. Cresap, Mary B. Cresap, and Rachel R. Cresap (now Murdoch), named in said will as residuary legatees, filed their answer to said bill and amended bill, in which they deny the claim of the plaintiff to absolute ownership, under the will, of the estate devised and bequeathed by said will, subject only to the debts of the testator, and the lawful charges of the administration of the estate. They also prayed a construction of the will, a copy of which is made a part of the record. There was a general replication by the plaintiff to said answer. "Upon this state of the pleading, the circuit court, proceeding to construe said will, decreed that the plaintiff Agnes C. Cresap had, under said will, full power and authority to sell, convey, and transfer the said property, both real and personal, and that under said will she is the absolute owner of said personal estate, and the absolute owner in fee simple of any real estate held by him in fee simple, and, as to any estate not held by him in fee simple, she, under said will, hath succeeded to all rights held thereto by him at the time of his death; and a commissioner was appointed, to whom an order of reference had been made in the cause, to ascertain the amount and priorities of the debts of said testator, and to settle the accounts of said testatrix, and was directed to proceed with said accounts." Cresap v. Cresap, 34 W. Va. 315, 316, 12 S. E. 527. This court, in its opinion, delivered by English, J., at pages 321, 322, 34 W. Va., and page 531, 12 S. E., says: "We must conclude that said testator authorized his wife to sell and convey his estate for convenience, so that, in case she might see fit to sell any or all of his real estate, conveyances might be made without trouble or expense, and to avoid the necessity of having the others who might be interested in the proceeds to join in such conveyances; and these sales were to be made, 'so far as she might see proper,' for two purposes: First, for her support, according to her condition in life; and, second, for the benefit of his estate. The will then proceeds to point out the objects of such trusts, as follows: At the death of his wife, and after she has enjoyed a support according to her condition in life out of his estate, he desired one-fourth of the remainder to be disposed of by her, one-half of said residue to be divided equally between his brother Gustavus J. Cresap and his sisters Mary B. Cresap and Rachel R. Cresap, and his niece Nannie I. Evans to have the remaining fourth; and, in the event his said wife did not dispose of said one-fourth, then the said fourth was to be divided between his brother Gustavus J. Cresap and any unmarried sister or sisters at her death. As to the fourth of said residue, which he directed his wife to dispose of, he clearly intended to give her the power to deed or will it to whom she might see proper, and this fourth she derived as a beneficiary under said trust declared in the first part of the instrument; and, in the event that she does not dispose of it, he directs how it shall be distributed." And on page 325, 34 W. Va., and page 532, 12 S. E., it is further stated: "Looking to the entire will, I think the construction hereinbefore indicated is the proper one, and the decree complained of must be reversed, and the case remanded to the circuit court of Randolph county for further proceedings to be had therein."

Afterwards, on the 15th day of October, 1892, the said Agnes O. Cresap, in her own right, and as executrix of the last will and testament of said Charles J. P. Cresap, deceased, filed in said cause her amended and supplemental bill against the said devisees and creditors of the decedent, in which she, among other things, alleged that she was married to said Charles J. P. Cresap on the 25th day of January, 1870; that at the time of her said marriage, she was possessed of personal estate, consisting of money, bonds, notes, etc., well secured, amounting to about $4,000, all of which was collected for her, and was intrusted by her, as the same was collected, to the custody and care of her husband, without any other right thereto or interest therein in him than that of her trusted agent for the care and management thereof for her use; that at the time of their marriage her husband was a young lawyer, just commencing the practice of his profession at Beverly, in Randolph county, and was possessed of not more than $500 worth of property; that not long after their marriage she authorized her husband to purchase for them a home in Beverly from John Burkett, to be paid for out of her separate estate; that, in pursuance of this authority, her husband, on the 2d day of June, 1871, did purchase of said Burkett the said property for $2,500, all of which was paid out of her said separate property by her husband for her use; that no part of said sum was paid by him out of his estate; that she did not at any time, to any extent or in any manner, assign or transfer to him any part of said property, or any interest therein, save only that he occupied and used the same with her as a home and dwelling place during his lifetime, and that she has used it herself as such home since his death; that she did not at any time give, transfer, or set over to her husband any part of or interest in her money which was paid for said property; that her husband, without her knowledge or consent, procured said Burkett and his wife to convey the legal title to said property to himself; that she had unlimited confidence in the good faith of her husband in the transaction, and believed that the property had been conveyed to her; that she remained in perfect ignorance of the fact that it had not been so conveyed for some time thereafter; that, when she learned that the conveyance had been taken by her husband to himself, she complained to him about it; that afterwards her husband repeatedly assured her that he would convey said property to her, which he never did; that he made and published his will on the 29th day of July, 1871, the existence and contents of which plaintiff well knew, in which he devised to plaintiff the whole of his estate, which will he carefully kept in his safe until the time of his death; that after her husband's death, which took place on the 6th day of August, 1886, it was discovered that on the 15th day of May, 1884, he had made a second will, revoking his said former will—the last will being the one in question, but which, as plaintiff was advised, by counsel learned in the law, had the legal effect to vest in her an estate in fee simple in all of the real estate, and an absolute ownership of all the personal property, of the decedent. She then sets out the proceedings, decrees, and orders had and made upon the original and amended first bill, up to and including the decision of this court supra, and says that, by reason of the aforesaid wills and proceedings in the circuit court, she had, before the filing of her amended and supplemental bill, made no claim against her said husband's estate, either for the said property so purchased from Burkett, or for her money invested therein. She then prays that the said Burkett property be decreed to her as her separate estate, and conveyed to her as such, or, if that cannot be done, that the sum of $2,500, the amount of her money used by said testator in the purchase of said property, with interest on said sum from the 2d day of June, 1871, be decreed to her out of the assets of the said estate.

After filing her said amended and supplemental bill as aforesaid, said Agnes C. Cresap departed this life testate, and, by her last will and testament, which bears date on the 5th day of March, 1900, and which was probated on the 18th day of April, 1900, she "willed and bequeathed" to her niece, the said Nannie I. Brown, all of her real and personal estate, of every kind and character. On the 3d day of May, 1900, the death of plaintiff Agnes C. Cresap was suggested on the record, whereupon the cause was revived and ordered to proceed in the name of Leland Kittle, as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of said C. J. P. Cresap, deceased; and at the same time, upon motion of said Nannie I. Brown, the said cause was also revived in her name, as administratrix with the will annexed of said Agnes C. Cresap, deceased. It will be remembered that said Brown was from the commencement of the suit a defendant therein. At the January term of the court, 1901, said Brown filed another answer, alleging that she is the sole devisee of the late Agnes C. Cresap, who departed this life, testate, on the — day of March, 1900. She makes the said will a part of her answer. No person is named in the will as executor thereof.

At the said January term, 1901, said Gustavus J. Cresap, Mary B. Cresap, and Rachel R. Murdoch filed their amended and supplemental answer in said cause, and, with many other averments, say that to the said amended and supplemental bill filed by said Agnes C. Cresap in her own right, and as executrix as aforesaid, they had theretofore appeared and demurred, which demurrer had not then been passed upon by the court; that the grounds of demurrer had been verbally stated by counsel, and that they now state such grounds to be:

"(1) Said Agnes C. Cresap, in her own right, seeks to set up claims to property which are in direct conflict with her claim to the property in her fiduciary capacity.

"(2) Said Agnes C. Cresap by her said last will seeks to assert the title to property by an alleged resulting trust in favor of herself, contrary to the averments of her original and first amended bill, and is for that reason chargeable with a departure in her pleading.

"(3) By her said last-mentioned amended and supplemental bill said Agnes C. Cresap admits that her late husband took title to said real estate on the 2d day of June, 1871, and, while she does not definitely inform the court as to when she first knew that her husband had taken the title to this land in his own name, yet by her said bill she does inform the court that he made and published his last will and testament on the 29th of July, 1871, or less than sixty days after he had taken title to the property, of which will and its contents she had full notice and knowledge, so that she certainly had knowledge as to how the title stood not later than July 29, 1871, and yet did not, prior to his death, in August, 1886, do anything to assert her title, and thereafter, for more than six years, and until the October term, 1892, of this court, she claimed under said will; and respondents now insist that whatever rights said Agnes C. Cresap in her own right may have ever had are long since barred by the statute of limitations, and she and her devisee are barred by her laches from now asserting any title to said land, or setting up any debt against the estate of said Charles J. P. Cresap, deceased."

The said demurrer was by the court overruled, and of this ruling of the court appellants complain. The questions raised by the demurrer will be first considered, and disposed of in the order as stated therein.

Appellants contend, but not very strenuously, that plaintiff should not be allowed to assert, as plaintiff in the same suit, one claim in her own right, and another in her fiduciary character. In Sadler v. Taylor, 49 W. Va. 104, 38 S. E. 583, it is held that in equity it is generally sufficient if all the parties interested in the subject-matter of the suit are before the court, either as plaintiffs or defendants. Story's Eq. Jur. 630; Platt v. Oliver, 3 McLean, 27, Fed. Cas. No. 11,116; McArthur v. Scott, 113 U. S. 366, 5 Sup. Ct. 652, 28 L. Ed. 1015; Hogg's Eq. Proc. vol. 1, § 84; Spooner's Adm'r v. Hilbish's Ex'r, 92 Va. 340, 23 S. E. 751. If one person holding a fiduciary and another person having a personal interest may be joined as plaintiffs, certainly the same person, claiming interests in both capacities, may, as plaintiff, in equity, join such claims in his bill. Plaintiff's amended and supplemental bill is not such a departure in the pleading in said cause as renders it demurrable. Cresap v. Cresap, supra; Hogg's Eq. Proc. vol. 1, §§ 325, 326, 327; Burlew v. Quarrier, 16 W. Va. 108; Bird v. Stout, 40 W. Va. 43, 20 S. E. 852; Belton v. Apperson et al., 26 Grat. 207.

It is also contended by appellants that their demurrer should have been sustained by the court by reason of the laches of the plaintiff Agnes C. Cresap in asserting her alleged right. Laches is inexcusable delay in asserting a right, and is an equitable defense, determinable by the particular facts.

It is further insisted that plaintiff had knowledge of all the facts pertaining to the title of the Burkett property in a short time after the deed therefor was made by Burkett and wife to her husband, because he made his first alleged will on the 29th day of July, 1871. In Halstead v. Grinnan, 152 U. S. 412, 14 Sup. Ct. 641, 28 L. Ed. 495, in discussing the laches which may be successfully interposed as a bar to the enforcement of an alleged right, it is held that "laches is an equitable defense, controlled by equitable consideration; and the lapse of time must be so great, and the relation of the defendant to the rights such, that it would be inequitable to permit the plaintiff to assert them, where he has had for a considerable period knowledge of their existence, or might have acquainted himself with them by the use of reasonable diligence." We think the plaintiff has satisfactorily explained her delay in filing her amended and supplemental bill, if the allegations thereof be true, as they are taken to be on appellants' demurrer thereto. The said demurrer was therefore properly overruled.

Upon the pleadings in the case, at the time of the decision therein by this court, there could not have been an adjudication on the merits of plaintiffs' claim to the Burkett property, as alleged in her said amended and supplemental bill. That contention of appellants is not well founded.

On the 1st day of February, 1901, the decree appealed from was made and entered. It recites that the cause came on again to be heard upon the papers theretofore read, and decrees therein; the answer of Nannie I. Brown, tendered in court and filed, exhibiting therewith a copy of the will of Agnes C. Cresap, deceased, with general replication thereto (and upon her motion, and by consent of parties, the cause was revived in her name and individual right as sole devisee of Agnes C. Cresap, deceased, as well as in her fiduciary character as theretofore ordered; and, the death of Samuel Woods, having been also suggested, by like consent the said cause was also revived and ordered to proceed in the names of and against J. Hop Woods and Samuel V. Woods, as administrators with the will annexed of said Samuel Woods, deceased); upon the said supplemental bill of Agnes C. Cresap, filed in the cause at the October term, 1892, upon the written grounds of demurrer thereto interposed by appellants as aforesaid; upon the joint answers to the bill and amended bill; and upon the exceptions to the first of said answers, filed at the May term, 1894, on the ground that said answer is not verified by respondents, and is not responsive to the allegations of the amended and supplemental bill; and upon the exceptions to their second joint answer, filed on the 25th day of January, 1901, in so far as the same purports to be an answer to said supplemental bill, because said last-mentioned answer fails to controvert any material allegations in said amended and supplemental bill. The said exceptions to said answers were made thereto and indorsed thereon by said Nannie I. Brown during the said January term, 1901, of the court. The general replication to said answers filed by plaintiff was withdrawn for the purpose of allowing said exceptions to be made. Thereupon said demurrer to the amended and supplemental bill was overruled, the exceptions aforesaid to said answers, and each of them, were sustained for the reasons and to the extent as indorsed thereon, and the general replications to said answers were modified accordingly. The decree further recites that it appearing to the court from the report of Commissioner J. B. Ward, supported by the depositions of Nehemiah Carper, Geo. W. K. Yokum, James H. Logan, and Adam C. Rowan, and from the allegations of said amended and supplemental bill, taken for confessed, that the dwelling house and lots occupied by C. J. P. Cresap at the time of his death, and purchased by him on the 2d day of June, 1871, from John Burkett, by deed of that date, exhibited with the bill, were purchased by C. J. P. Cresap at the price of $2,500, and paid for out of the separate estate of said Agnes C. Cresap, deceased, and that the title thereto was improperly vested in him, "the court is of opinion, and doth accordingly adjudge, order, and decree, that the title to said Burkett property was vested in said C. J. P. Cresap in trust for Agnes C. Cresap, who was entitled at the time of her death to be invested with the title to the same." The decree then appoints J. F. Strader a special commissioner, and directs him to convey said property to said Brown, as sole devisee of Agnes C. Cresap, deceased. The decree also overrules certain exceptions to the report of said Commissioner Ward, filed on the 23d day of April, 1894, and confirms said report in so far as the same had not been confirmed by the decree of said court entered at its May term, 1894.

Upon the question of res judicata, relied on by appellants, Blern v. Ray, 49 W. Va. 129, 38 S. E. 530, is cited by them. In that case Judge Poffenbarger reviews not only our own decisions, but many others, bearing upon that doctrine, and refers to Sayre's Adm'r v. Harpold, 33 W. Va. 553, 11 S. E. 16, in which it is held that "an adjudication by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties is final and conclusive, not only as to matters actually determined, but as to every other matter which the parties might have litigated as incident thereto, and coming within the legitimate purview of the subject-matter of the action. It is not essential that the matter should have been formally put in issue in a former suit, but it is sufficient that the status of the suit was such that the parties might have had the matter disposed of on its merits." It is scarcely necessary to say that the case, until the plaintiff filed her amended and supplemental bill, was not such, by the pleadings, that the parties might have had the question of title to and ownership of the Burkett property, by reason of the payment of the whole of the purchase money therefor, out of the money and means of the plaintiff, determined and adjudicated between the parties on its merits. Prior to the filing of her amended and supplemental bill, the plaintiff claimed and relied for title to and ownership of the property on her husband's will, which, she was advised by counsel, did confer such title and ownership upon her. The circuit court so held, and, until this court decided otherwise, she was excusable for not asserting her alleged right to the property as now claimed by her.

Appellants insist that inasmuch as the court, at its May term, 1894, permitted them to file their original answer to plaintiff's amended and supplemental bill, to which answer the plaintiff at that term replied generally, and also allowed them to file their amended answer at its January term, 1901, to which there was also a general replication, the court should not, at the hearing, have permitted a codefendant to except to said answers, and should not have rejected said answers, as in said decree recited; that said answers should be treated as yet in the cause; and that appellants are entitled to the relief sought thereby. As a general rule, one defendant cannot except to the answer of his codefendant to the plaintiff's bill. This rule may be different where relief is sought by one defendant against another. It will, however, be borne in mind that Nannie I. Brown succeeded to all of the property rights of Agnes C. Cresap, the original plaintiff in the cause, by virtue of the will, and her appointment as executrix with the said will annexed of Agnes C. Cresap, deceased. The cause was revived in her name as plaintiff in her respective rights as an individual and as fiduciary, as aforesaid. At the same time (January term, 1901) she excepted to said answers. The answers, and each of them, are insufficient in the particulars pointed out by the exceptions. Therefore the action of the circuit court in sustaining the said exceptions was not erroneous, unless it be so for some other reason. Nannie I. Brown having become plaintiff, she was entitled to make the exceptions, unless that right had in some way been waived by her predecessor plaintiff. She had not the legal status to make the exception until the January term, 1901, and the second amended answer of appellants was not filed until that term. The record, as to it, was then made up for the first time. Said last-mentioned answer was tendered and filed; exceptions were indorsed thereon, which were sustained; a general replication thereto, as modified by the exceptions sustained as aforesaid, was entered; and a final decree was then made thereon. This court, in Hartman v. Evans, 38 W. Va. 669, 18 S. E. 810, held that, "when a replication to the answer is entered or filed, the exceptions to the answer are treated as abandoned, and the answer deemed sufficient as to any discovery prayed for." Code 1899, c. 125, § 54, provides that, "when a plaintiff in equity files an exception to an answer, the exception shall at once be set for argument." The necessity for this rule is very apparent. In Arnold v. Slaughter, 36 W. Va. 589-596, 15 S. E. 250, 252, it is said: "The object of exceptions is to direct the attention of the court to the points excepted to, and to take its opinion thereon, before further proceedings are had, to the end that, if the answer is insufficient, a better answer may be compelled, or, if scandalous or impertinent, that the scandalous or impertinent matter may be expunged." Daniell's Ch. Pl. & Pr. vol. 1, § 766, says: "No exceptions can be taken to any answer for insufficiency after replication; but in some cases, however, the court has, on special application, permitted the replication to be withdrawn, and exceptions to be then filed." In McKell v. Collins Colliery Co., 46 W. Va. 625, 33 S. E. 765, the defendant, at the May rules, 1897, filed his answer to the bill. From that time until September 28, 1897, both plaintiffs and defendant took depositions to sustain their respective pleadings, and the cause was thus fully prepared for hearing on its merits. The answer was excepted to by plaintiffs for insufficiency, on the last-mentioned day. This court held: "In such case the plaintiff will be held to have waived his right to except to such answer for want of proper filing and attestation, and the cause comes within the purview of section 4, c. 134, Code 1899."

Recurring to said original answer filed by appellants at the May term, 1894, we find that it is not verified by affidavit of any kind; the amended and supplemental bill to which it is filed being properly sworn to. The said answer makes no direct denial of the material allegations of said amended and supplemental bill. No depositions appear to have been taken in the cause after said original answer was filed, by either party. In fact, no evidence was at any time taken by the defendants to support their contentions contained in their said answer. The action of the court in sustaining the exceptions to said answer does not appear to have prejudiced the defendants. The court, upon the facts and circumstances of the case, did not err in sustaining the exceptions to each of said answers.

Should the court have then given the defendants leave to file additional or amended answers? The plaintiff did not ask for further answer or discovery from the defendants. Daniell, Ch. Pl. & Pr. vol. 1, § 775, says: "If the exceptions are allowed, the court will, at the request of the parties, at the time of giving its decision, appoint a time within which the defendant is to put in his further answer." In Chapman v. Railway Co., 28 W. Va. 300, an exception to a part of the answer was sustained by the court, and the cause then heard upon the bill and answer, without an opportunity given to the defendant to amend its answer. The court held: "Where exceptions to a part of the answer are sustained, and the defendant does not ask leave to amend his answer, it is not error to proceed to hear the case on the bill, and so much of the answer as is not excepted to." In this case the defendants did not ask leave to file an additional or amended second answer. It must be presumed that they did not desire to do so. They cannot be heard to complain of the action of the court in proceeding to hear the cause, without further denial or delay of the plaintiff.

The evidence in the case is clear, full, and satisfactory that the Burkett property was paid for with the money and means of Agnes C. Cresap. The circumstances of the case, and the acts and admissions of C. J. P. Cresap, rebut any presumption that Agnes C. Cresap intended either the purchase money therefor or the property as a gift to her husband. Perry on Trusts, § 127, says, "If a husband purchase lands with the separate estate of his wife, in his hands, or with the proceeds or accumulations from it, or money put into his hands to invest for his wife, and take the title in his own name, a trust results to the wife." See cases cited in note 1, Id.; Smith v. Turley, 32 W. Va. 14, 9 S. E. 48; Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. vol. 1, § 183; Berry v. Wiedman, 40 W. Va. 36, 20 S. E. 817, 52 Am. St. Rep. 866.

It is also urged that the heirs and devisees of Judge Samuel Woods, deceased, should have been made parties to the suit. It nowhere appears that said Woods, deceased, was ever in any way interested in the Burkett property. J. Hop Woods and Samuel V. Woods, administrators with the will annexed of said Samuel Woods, were made parties before the final hearing. What their powers and duties are under the will of their testator, do not appear. It is presumed their authority is ample for the purposes of the suit.

We find no reversible error in the record. The decree complained of must therefore be affirmed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Randolph county for such further proceedings to be there had therein as may be necessary and proper. Affirmed and remanded.

NOTE BY BRANNON, J. I wish to say that I am not clear that our decision conforms exactly to dry law, in excusing Mrs. Cresap from laches, from ignorance of the legal construction of the will, and in holding that the amended and supplemental bill was no departure from the original bill. But, as to laches, the court has wide range to do equity according to the facts of each case; and the claim of Mrs. Cresap is so just, and her excuse for delay so strong, that I concur under this head. As to departure, the objection is technical, not going to the merits of the case. Why may we not treat the amended and supplemental bill as an original bill to accomplish justice?

VAN WINKLE v. BLACKFORD et al.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 9, 1904.)

ADMINISTRATOR—COMPENSATION—PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—CORPORATION—STOCKHOLDERS—CLAIM AGAINST INSOLVENT—OFFICIAL BOND—ACCOUNTING.

1. A personal representative who, within six months after the end of any one year of his service as such, has fully explained to the parties entitled to the money received in such year, verbally and by informal written statements, the amount so received, together with the sources from which it came, and the amount disbursed, including charges of administration, and has actually paid to such parties all they are entitled to receive on account of such money, is entitled to compensation for his services for such year, in respect to the interests so settled for and paid.

2. When the parties entitled are infants, and the personal representative has neither given their guardian a complete statement in writing, nor paid the money over to the guardian, within the time aforesaid, but has only given information verbally and by informal memoranda to the guardian concerning the receipts for the year, he is not entitled to commission on the shares of the infants.

3. An administrator of a surety, having in his hands, as such administrator, bank stock certificates, when the principal debtor becomes insolvent, may and should apply on the debt for which the decedent is bound as surety the value of the stock and any dividends thereon remaining in his hands.

4. That stock stands on the transfer book of a corporation in the name of a deceased person is not conclusive evidence that it belongs to his estate. As it is equally consistent with his having held the stock as collateral, circumstances clearly indicating that it was so held are sufficient to support a finding to that effect by a commissioner, especially when it is shown that the deceased person kept a careful book account of his investments, which does not disclose an investment in such stock.

5. A creditor of an insolvent person, after having applied on the debt due him the value of securities in his hands, can prove only the balance due him against the estate of the insolvent.

6. When it is shown by public records that an official bond has been given by a public officer, but search for it is unavailing, the presumption in favor of the regularity of the acts of public officers applies, and the court may assume that the condition of the bond was such as the law required.

7. Prima facie, an administrator is liable for the whole amount of the estate of his decedent, and must account for the same; but, as to any assets of the estate, he may so account by showing that the same are worthless, or have been lost without any fault or negligence on his part, or failure on his part to use due diligence to prevent the loss; and his oath is prima facie proof of such worthlessness or loss.

8. A testator whose personal estate amounted to less than $60,000, of which $40,000 was represented by equal amounts of the interest-bearing bonds of two railroad companies, and the balance, for the most part, by other bonds and notes, directed, by his will, that two funds, of $5,000 each, be invested "in some safe public bonds or securities, bearing at least six per centum annual interest," or deposited "with some trust company at the time reported solvent," and the interest thereon paid to his two sisters during their natural lives, and after their deaths the principal sums to be put into the residuum of his personal estate. He died in 1872, and the administrator with the will annexed, by way of compliance, set apart $5,000 of each of the two classes of railroad bonds, believing them to be good; and in the panic of the year 1873 the bonds representing one of the funds greatly depreciated, and were afterwards sold for 48 cents on the dollar. Held that, under the circumstances stated in the opinion here filed, the administrator is not chargeable with the loss, nor, on account thereof, with compound interest, in his settlement.

9. When a personal representative is in no sense at fault, and yet a balance for any year appears against him, the interest on such balance is not carried into the account for subsequent years, but stands over until final settlement, or until sufficient disbursements have been made to discharge it, after having extinguished the balance of principal due.

10. But when the debts have been paid, or there has been time in which to pay them, and the personal representative has only legacies and distributive shares to deal with, he is treated and settled with, as to interest, on the principles governing settlements between ordinary creditors and debtors, except that under peculiar circumstances he may become chargeable with compound interest.

11. Where there is a balance due the personal representative for any year, the interest thereon is carried into the account for subsequent years, except when by so doing he would be allowed interest on interest.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Wood County; L. N. Tavenner, Judge.

Bill by W. W. Van Winkle against G. L. Blackford and others. Decree for plaintiff and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Camden & Peterkin, for appellants. Van Winkle & Ambler and W. N. Miller, for appellee.

POFFENBARGER, P. This is a suit in equity, brought by W. W. Van Winkle, to surcharge and falsify a settlement made by him as administrator with the will annexed of Peter G. Van Winkle, in which capacity he acted from the 13th day of May, 1872, until the 24th day of April, 1883, when, upon his own motion, his powers as such administrator were revoked. Godwin L. Blackford was afterwards appointed administrator de bonis non with the will annexed. One of the items in controversy here formed, in part, the subject-matter of an action at law brought by W. W. Van Winkle against Blackford, administrator, in 1884, which came to this court on a writ of error, and is reported in 28 W. Va. 670. It was also the principal matter of controversy in the chancery suit instituted in 1889 by W. W. Van Winkle against Godwin L. Blackford, administrator, which also came to this court on appeal, and is reported in 33 W. Va. 578, 11 S. E. 26. It will be seen there that the cause was remanded, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his bill by making new parties thereto, and to ask for a settlement of his whole administration account. Syllabus 6. At June rules, 1890, the amended bill was filed and prosecuted to a final decree, which was pronounced on the 9th day of January, 1901, and from which this appeal has been taken by M. C. Van Winkle, H. C. Van Winkle, Harriette G. Van Winkle, and Juliette E. Morrison.

It appears from the bill and proceedings that P. G. Van Winkle had a large estate. He bequeathed $5,000 in trust for Anna Maria Van Winkle during her natural life, and $5,000 in trust for Margaret Elizabeth Van Winkle during her natural life, they to receive the income and profits therefrom; and at their deaths, respectively, said two sums were directed to be distributed with the residuum of the estate. He gave $2,000 to W. W. Van Winkle, to be paid in installments if he should not have reached the age of 25 years at the death of the testator, and, if he should have attained that age at that time, he was to receive the whole of the $2,000. He released his brother Adolphus W. Van Winkle from the payment of any indebtedness that might be due from him to the testator at the time of the death of the latter. He bequeathed to the wives of his sons, Rathbone and Godwin Van Winkle, and the husband of his daughter, J. G. Blackford, $1,000 each, if living at the time of his death, all of whom were living at that time. The residue of his personal property, exclusive of notes, bonds, stocks, debts due him, and money on hand, he gave to the survivors of his three children, Rathbone, Godwin, and Mary, wife of J. G. Blackford, and the children of such of them as might die before the testator, per stirpes. All his real estate he devised to his said sons and daughter, in three equal, undivided portions, the same to be partitioned as soon as practical after his death, and his two sons to take one equal third part of his estate each, and hold the same in fee simple, while his daughter was to have the remaining one-third, with power to take the rents and profits to her own separate use during her natural life, remainder in fee to her children and their heirs, but with power and authority in the executor, upon her request and his approval, to make sale of any of the real estate which might be allotted to her, and to invest the proceeds, and hold the same in trust, and pay over the interest and profits thereof to his daughter during her natural life, and at her death divide and distribute the fund among her children and their heirs; or the executor, should he deem it most expedient, was authorized to sell said share, and divide and distribute the proceeds thereof as aforesaid, or, at the request of his daughter, and upon his approval, invest the proceeds in other real estate, to be held by her during her natural life, and remainder in fee to her children and their heirs. She was also authorized, with the approbation of the executor, or, in the event of his decease, of her brother Godwin, to lease or rent the land for the term of her natural life, etc. Of all the rest and residue of his property and estate, he gave to his sons, Rathbone and Godwin, two-thirds, to be equally divided between them and their respective heirs absolutely, and the remaining one-third to them, or the survivor of them, to be held in trust, and to pay the interest and profits to his daughter during her natural life, and, after her death, to pay to each of the children of his daughter who might then be 25 years of age one equal share therein, and, to such as might be under the age of 21 years, so much of the interest and profits on their respective shares as might be necessary to their maintenance and education while under the age of 21 years, reinvesting any surplus that might remain, and paying to them the whole amount of the interest upon their shares while between the ages of 21 and 25, and at the age of 25 their respective shares, with all accumulations thereon.

Rathbone Van Winkle died in 1870, prior to the death of his father, leaving surviving him his widow, Sarah Van Winkle, and four children, M. C. Van Winkle, H. C. Van Winkle, Juliette Van Winkle, and Harriette G. Van Winkle, all of whom were under the age of 21 years at the time of the death of the testator. The plaintiff here qualified as the administrator of Rathbone Van Winkle, in which capacity he acted until 1877, when he resigned, and was succeeded by M. C. Van Winkle. On or about the 1st day of June, 1873, Anna Maria Van Winkle died, and about September, 1883, Godwin Van Winkle died without issue, leaving surviving him his widow, Sarah E. Van Winkle, and Joseph B. Neale qualified as his administrator. J. G. Blackford died about September, 1884; and A. W. Van Winkle, another of the legatees, in April, 1875.

As already stated, the executor named in the will having died before the testator, W. W. Van Winkle was appointed administrator with the will annexed, and entered upon the execution of the trust, and paid and set apart, as directed by the will, all the specific legacies. About this there seems to be no controversy. He alleges in his bill that during the first year of his administration he divided between and paid to each of the other legatees, so far as the same came into his hands to be administered during that year, all the rest and residue of the property and estate to which the testator was entitled. But this is denied by the joint and separate answer of the appellants and Sarah Van Winkle, and the answer of Mary V. Blackford and others. However, it clearly appears that the great bulk of the estate was paid over during the year.

Presumably, no settlement, such as the statute requires to be made before a commissioner and recorded, was ever made by the administrator, nor any inventory filed. On the 5th day of April, 1883, Mary V. Blackford caused a notice to be served on him to the effect that, on the 23d day of that month she would move the county court of Wood county to require him to execute a new bond, and, if he refused to give it, she would move the court to revoke his powers as administrator, and appoint another in his stead. On the return day of the notice he appeared and moved the court to revoke his powers, refusing to give a new bond. This was done, but he was required to settle his accounts before O. M. Clemens, who was appointed a special commissioner of said court for that purpose. Afterwards he made up a statement of his account, and presented it to the commissioner; and it was approved by him, and returned to the county court, with exceptions taken by Mary V. Blackford. It showed that there was due the administrator upon his administration of the personal estate, $2,858.41; and upon transactions in reference to the real estate, $2,520.45; total, $5,378.86. The court sustained the exceptions, and the account was recommitted to K. S. Snodgrass, commissioner, to be reconsidered and restated. Commissioner Snodgrass' final report was made November 23d, showing an indebtedness of the administrator to the estate in the sum of $4,118.86, as of May 13, 1883, on account of the personal property and estate of the testator. His report further showed that there was due the administrator the sum of $2,342.31, as of the same date, for moneys expended by him, on account of the real estate, over and above what came into his hands from that source. This report was confirmed by the county court in November, 1886, and was never disturbed in any manner until the amended bill in this suit was filed. In the meantime, however, the two suits hereinbefore referred to as having been disposed of in this court had been brought and prosecuted.

The object of the amended bill is to obtain credit for several items which Commissioner Snodgrass, of the county court, refused to allow in the settlement. One of these is a claim for commission on the account settled with and paid to Anna M. and Margaret E. Van Winkle. Another was a claim for $266.10 for commission charged for 10 years' attention to and management of the real estate. Another was for $850 paid to the treasurer of the sinking fund of the city of Parkersburg—the principal item of contention in said two former suits. Another was a claim of $2,315.77 commissions, as administrator, on receipts for the first and second years of the administration. The bill also seeks relief from an alleged erroneous charge of $2,152.15 on account of certain shares of bank stock which stood on the transfer book of the bank in the name of P. G. Van Winkle, and were transferred by W. W. Van Winkle, administrator, to himself individually; he claiming to have been the rightful holder of them, as collateral security to indemnify him as indorser on a note made by J. G. Blackford, the original owner of the stock, who had before that time transferred it to P. G. Van Winkle to indemnify him as indorser upon another and older note, and subsequently the absolute owner by purchase and agreement with Blackford. It is contended by the appellants that the note upon which P. G. Van Winkle was indorser, and to the payment of which said stock was pledged, was paid out of the estate of the testator, and that it was the duty of the administrator to apply the stock on said note, or account to the estate for the value of it. There are two other small items—$125.71 and $121.69, respectively—which it is claimed were disallowed, but the appellants insist that they were allowed. The controversy over them arises from the different methods adopted by Commissioners Clemens and Snodgrass in stating the account.

The answer filed by the appellant not only resists all these attacks upon the settlement made in the county court, but goes beyond that, and sets up several matters with which it is claimed that the administrator should have been charged, but was not. One of these is in respect to dividends collected by him upon said bank stock, amounting to several hundred dollars. Another is in reference to certain bonds of the Little Kanawha Navigation Company, which it is claimed were delivered by J. G. Blackford to the testator as collateral to indemnify him against loss as indorser upon a note made by said Blackford. Another is in reference to a loan of something over $8,000 made by the plaintiff, as administrator of Rathbone Van Winkle, to Godwin Van Winkle, who subsequently went into bankruptcy in the state of Texas, in return for which the appellants received only certain real estate and personal property, which they say was not worth anything like the debt.

On motion of the plaintiff, and over the objection of the defendants, the court on August 24, 1893, entered a decree referring the cause to J. W. Vandervort, commissioner, to settle the accounts of the complainant, late administrator with the will annexed of P. G. Van Winkle, deceased, and to regard the settlement made by him before Commissioner Snodgrass as prima facie correct, subject to be surcharged and falsified by the plaintiff or the defendants, or any of them. The plaintiff was also required in that decree to return and file before the commissioner an inventory of all the assets which came into his possession or knowledge, and also all papers, vouchers, and books in his possession, relating to any of the items in said settlement, so far as they are surcharged and falsified in the bill, answer, or specifications filed by any of the parties. Commissioner Vandervort filed his report August 16, 1897, and returned therewith all the depositions and the evidence taken by and filed with him. He reported against all the claims made by the plaintiff, and gave it as his opinion that the account, as stated by Commissioner Snodgrass, was correct, and should stand, as to the amount, $4,118.86, with interest from May 18, 1883, found to be due from the administrator to the estate. He reported that there is due to the administrator the sum of $2,342.52, with interest from May 18, 1883, on account of his transactions relating to the real estate, but gave it as his opinion that said real estate account was not proper to be considered in the settlement, and submitted it to the court whether any deduction should be made on account thereof from the amount due from the administrator on account of the personal property. As to the attacks made upon the settlement by the defendants, the commissioner reported that, not having sustained any of the allegations of error made by the plaintiff, he did not deem it necessary, under the pleadings, to consider the allegations of error made by the defendants; it being his understanding from the answers that the defendants did not wish to disturb the settlement, unless surcharged and falsified in respect to some of the claims made by the plaintiff. Before the report was filed, the plaintiff filed five exceptions thereto with the commissioner. The first was on the ground that the report failed to show that the administrator had compromised with Mary V. Blackford while the suit was pending. The second was based on the absence of the commissioner's notice, which he certifies, in passing upon the exception, had become lost, but gives the date of its issue and return. The third was based upon the failure of the commissioner to notify Margaret E. Van Winkle, who had never appeared in the cause. The fourth was based upon the refusal of the commissioner to allow plaintiff his commissions and credit for the $850 heretofore mentioned. The fifth seems to have been general, going to the whole report. All of them were overruled by the commissioner.

On January 9, 1901, a stipulation, signed by counsel for all the parties, was filed, wherein it was recited that the court was of opinion that before final decree the cause should be recommitted to the commissioner, and agreed by the parties that such recommitment was thereby waived, and that all matters arising upon such accounts and surcharges and falsifications thereof, and upon all matters presented by the papers, proceedings, and evidence, were referred to the court for final determination and adjudication; "the finding of the court to have the same effect as upon a report of a commissioner regularly made up and filed in the cause." The final clause of the stipulation reads as follows: "And this cause is submitted to the court, in accordance with this agreement and stipulation, upon the pleadings and proofs and evidence taken and filed as aforesaid in said cause." On the same day a decree was entered whereby it was adjudged, ordered, and decreed "that subexception 'b' of the fourth exception of complainant to said report of Commissioner Vandervort, for disallowing the complainant commissions ($266.10) on the real estate account, and subexception 'c' of said fourth exception, for disallowing the exceptor credit for $850 paid April 11, 1891 [1881], to W. N. Chancellor, treasurer," etc., were well taken, and therefore sustained, and "that subexception 'd' of said fourth exception, to the extent of $2,315.77, the amount of the commissions on the receipts and disbursements for the first year, * * * is well taken; the court finding as a fact that, within six months after the end of the first year of the administration of said estate by complainant, the said complainant, as such administrator with the will annexed of Peter G. Van Winkle, gave to the parties entitled to the money received in said year a statement of said money, and actually settled therefor with them." Having made these alterations in the settlement, the decree ascertained and adjudged that there was due from the administrator $953.06, as of May 13, 1883, on account of personal estate, and allowed the administrator credit for $268.10 commission, and his account of $2,608.61, growing out of his transactions in reference to the real estate, and found, by deducting from the amount due to the administrator the sum due from him to the estate, that there was a balance due to him of $1,655.52, as of May 13, 1883, with interest from said date, making a total of $3,409.54, and decreed said sum to be paid by Godwin L. Blackford, administrator de bonis non with the will annexed, out of the goods and chattels remaining in his hands to be administered. But the court refused to decree over against the distributees of the estate for said sum, on account of the staleness of the demand.

On the theory that the bill could not be amended in the manner in which it was, the defendants demurred to it, but the court overruled the demurrer. It is argued that this amendment amounts to a departure in pleading; making a new cause of action, different from that set out in the original bill. If that were true, the demurrer should have been sustained. But this court held the original bill to be, in substance and effect, a bill to surcharge and falsify the administrator's settlement, but defective and insufficient for want of parties only. Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 573, 583, 11 S. E. 26. It sought correction of the settlement in respect to only one or two items, but its object was to surcharge and falsify the settlement in respect to them. That fixes the nature of the bill. Its character, as thus fixed and determined, is not changed by the addition of attacks upon the settlement relating to other items, nor the making of new necessary parties to it. It is a familiar principle of equity that, after sufficient steps have been taken with respect to one or more items in an ex parte settlement or stated account to surcharge and falsify it in respect thereto, all parties to the bill may, by mere informal specifications, attack the settlement as to other items without limit. In view of this, it is not perceived that this bill is in any respect or degree a departure, such as is claimed. However, the court having remanded the cause to the circuit court with an express adjudication of the right of the plaintiff to so amend his bill and to proceed as he has done, is not the question res judicata? Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 573, 11 S. E. 26.

By the decree complained of, the settlement was altered to the extent of giving the plaintiff credit and charging the estate with the sum of $850 paid by him, July 18, 1881, to W. N. Chancellor, treasurer of the sinking fund of the city of Parkersburg. Unquestionably said sum was paid by the plaintiff within 10 years from the time at which the testator, by reason of his death, ceased to be such treasurer. Nor is it denied that said sum went into his hands, and was never by him paid over to the trustees of that fund. It is contended that at the time of his death he held it, not as treasurer, but as borrower. Against this contention, however, stands the decision of this court in the case of Van Winkle v. Blackford, 28 W. Va. 670, holding that the note, which it was claimed was given by the testator, was void for want of delivery. But whether that decision is sufficiently pleaded here to bar this defense is an interesting question. No reference is made to it in the original bill. On the first appeal this court, in its opinion, however, fully and specifically stated the decision of this very point of nullity of the note for want of delivery, in 28 W. Va., and referred to the opinion in that case. The amended bill in this case contains the following: "Your orator further avers that he has been wrongfully and unjustly deprived of the credit of $850 paid to W. N. Chancellor, treasurer of the sinking fund, on the 18th day of July, 1881, which was allowed in the account of said Clemens, and as to which your orator respectfully refers the court to the opinion and direction of the Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia, reversing the decree of this court in this case on the original bill, and holding, as to the said item of $850 that said Snodgrass refused credit to your orator within his said account, that 'this payment was made on the 18th day of July, 1881, when the right of action on the deceased treasurer's bond had still ten months to run before the barring of the statute could constitute a valid defense; and where a debt is not already barred the administrator may pay it, if confessedly just and due, without waiting to be sued, and ordinarily, when he has funds of his testator, it is his duty to do so, and credit himself with such payments in his settlement.' Your orator charges that the said debt upon which said $850 was paid was not paid at the time of such payment on the 18th day of July, 1881; that it was confessedly a just debt, and then due, and that, in the performance of your orator's duty as administrator, he paid such debt, and the same should have been credited to him by said Snodgrass in his said account; and that it should now be admitted as and credited to the account so made by said Snodgrass, revised and corrected in that particular according to the opinion and judgment of the said Supreme Court of Appeals." Can this be treated as making the opinion of this court in 33 W. Va. 573, 11 S. E. 26, part of the amended bill? If so, does it thereby set up the decision in accordance with the opinion in 28 W. Va. 670? That was evidently the intention, and it seems to have been so understood by the defendants, for in their joint and separate answer they say "and they allege that the decision of the Supreme Court, based on false facts, is not binding on these respondents, who were not parties to said suit." Proceeding upon the theory that they are not bound by the decision, because not parties to the suit, they offer evidence of the delivery of the note. If the decision is sufficiently pleaded here, they are undoubtedly bound by it. Nothing is involved here but the personal estate, and any decision, for or against the administrator, in the absence of fraud or collusion, is, as to it, binding upon the legatees and distributees. Hooper v. Hooper, 32 W. Va. 526, 534, 9 S. E. 937; Corrothers v. Sargent, 20 W. Va. 351; Castellaw v. Guilmartin, 54 Ga. 299; Carey v. Roosevelt (C. C.) 83 Fed. 242; Black, Judg. §§ 560, 561; Big. Estop. 148. Whether it is sufficiently brought into this record need not be decided. The evidence relied upon to prove delivery of the note is of the same kind as, and less in amount, if any difference, than, that found in the record upon which the decision reported in 28 W. Va. 670, is based; and, though not bound to find the same way on it now, the court ought to do so, unless the finding is clearly wrong. That decision is a precedent, having at least persuasive influence. Moreover, that decision gave the administrator complete acquittal of liability on one ground, and to find the other way now would acquit him of another demand for the same money, predicated upon the very ground of action disclosed to him by said former decision. It would make two decisions of the same question by the same court directly conflict, as well as defeat the ends of justice. At the time that finding was made in favor of the Van Winkle estate, the bench of this court was occupied by a body of jurists as able and eminent as any of their predecessors or successors—Judges Green, Snyder, Johnson, and Woods.

The only remaining contention about it is that there is no proof that any bond was ever given by the testator as such treasurer, and that, if one was given, its contents are not shown. It appears from copies of the minutes kept by the trustees of the sinking fund that P. G. Van Winkle was designated by the board as their treasurer, and that he, with his sureties, James Cook and W. L. Jackson, entered into a bond in the penalty of $10,000, conditioned as required by the ordinance, and that afterwards, owing to a defect in the form of that bond, a new one was given, with William Logan and Beverly Smith as sureties. What that condition was, the record fails to disclose; and it is shown by the custodian of the papers and records of the city of Parkersburg that diligent search by him for the bond among the records has failed to reveal it. The minutes show that it was given in October, 1859. From these facts, the only reasonable inference is that the bond was given, and has been lost, and that, as it was given by the testator as treasurer of a large fund, it was conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties. The maxim, "Omnia præsuntur rite esse acta, donec probetur in contrarium" (All things are presumed to be rightly done until the contrary is proven), applies here. This was a bond given by a public officer, the condition of which is prescribed by the law, namely, that it shall be for a faithful discharge by him of the duties of his office, and for accounting for and paying over, as required by law, all money which may come to his hands by virtue of the said office. Code 1899, c. 10, § 6. It having been shown that the bond was given, and has been lost, secondary proof of its contents is admissible. Of what such proof may consist is shown by the case of Leland v. Cameron, 31 N. Y. 115. There an execution had been issued and lost. The attorney who issued it, and the sheriff into whose hands it went, were both dead, and the only evidence was an entry by the attorney in his register of the issuing of the execution. In the headnotes the court say: "The contents of the execution in such case may be inferred from the facts that the law prescribes its form, the attorney issuing it was conversant with such instruments, and the sheriff to whom it was directed knew what it must contain to authorize him to sell the property. In view of such facts, and after a lapse of thirty years, the court may assume that the execution was in due form, containing all such directions as the statute required it should contain." In 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 1274, it is said: "The presumption of the regularity of official acts applies, as a general rule, to all kinds of official acts." In view of these authorities, the objection of want of proof of the bond and its contents clearly fails. It being clearly shown that, as treasurer, he failed to pay over said sum of money, there was a breach of the condition of the bond, for which a right of action existed against his administrator, which was not barred at the time he made the payment. That is sufficient to entitle him to credit. Counsel for appellee claim the right to credit for this amount is res judicata by the decision in Van Winkle v. Blackford, 33 W. Va. 587, 11 S. E. 26, but that cannot be. The sufficiency of the bill was the only question before the court then. It is now a question of proof of its allegations.

The next item, in logical order, is the allowance by the decree to the plaintiff of $2,315.77, his commissions on receipts and disbursements for the first year of his administration, to which extent the decree altered the settlement. This claim was disallowed by Commissioner Snodgrass and the county court, and by Commissioner Vandervort, for the reason that the plaintiff had failed to make a settlement of his account before a commissioner within six months after the expiration of one year from the date of his qualification as administrator. It was also held by these commissioners that the plaintiff had failed in his effort to show that with-in that time he had given to the parties entitled to the money received in such year a statement thereof, and actually settled therefor with them, and thus relieved himself from the forfeiture of his commissions, as it is provided in section 7 of chapter 87 of the Code of 1899 he may do. Upon all the evidence in the case brought up and made a part of the record by agreement of the parties, the court set aside this finding of the commissioner, and found as a fact that with-in six months after the end of the first year the administrator gave to the parties a statement, and actually settled with them. This is a finding of fact by the court, and, while not conclusive, this court will not reverse the finding unless it is decidedly against the weight of evidence. Weaver v. Akin, 48 W. Va. 456, 87 S. E. 600; Kennewig Co. v. Moore, 49 W. Va. 323, 38 S. E. 558; Chilhowie Lumber Co. v. Lance, 50 W. Va. 636, 41 S. E. 128.

But, to ascertain whether it is against the weight of evidence, it is necessary to see what the evidence is, and whether, upon the facts disclosed by the evidence, there was a settlement within the time stated. The inventory filed by the plaintiff shows the total amount of personal estate in his hands to have been $59,132.11. Of this, $40,000 was in railroad bonds. These bonds were disposed of by the administrator in the year 1872 as follows: Set apart to Margaret E. Van Winkle and Anna Maria Van Winkle, under the second clause of the will, $5,000 each; delivered to Godwin Van Winkle, trustee for Mary V. Blackford, $8,666.67; delivered to W. W. Van Winkle, for the heirs of Rathbone Van Winkle, $8,666.67; delivered to Godwin Van Winkle $8,666.67; delivered to Sarah Van Winkle, $1,000; to Sarah E. Van Winkle, $1,000; and to W. W. Van Winkle, $2,000. It was ascertained that it would require $7,106.99 to pay the J. G. Blackford legacy of $1,000; the amount due the city of Parkersburg on account of the sinking fund; taxes for the years 1872-73, due and to become due; estimated expenses and for contingencies amounting to $175; and commissions on receipts, estimated at $2,396.93. This, added to the $40,000 of bonds, makes $47,196.49. The administrator shows that, up to May 13, 1873, in addition to the bonds, he had collected from various sources $5,573.94. The balance of the estate in his hands at that time consisted of solvent claims amounting to $4,859.20, and actual and supposed insolvent claims amounting to $8,698.97. According to this showing, the ascertained and approximated liabilities of the administrator and what he paid out in said first year were in excess of what he had collected at that time, although he then held $4,859.20 worth of good assets, and $1,500 of shares of the Little Kanawha Navigation Company, which he says were supposed at that time to have no market value. The administrator shows that the deficit was partially covered by withholding payment of interest, amounting to $1,776.75, received on account of railroad bonds and other securities, until January, 1873, thus carrying these amounts as credits of the estate for that year, and reducing the deficit to $481.04. His general statement for the first year shows disbursements, $45,616.26; commissions, $2,315.77; debts, taxes, etc., to be paid, as stated, $7,106.99; total, $55,039.02. Against this he places receipts, $47,813.33; actual and supposed solvent assets, specified, $4,859.20; total, $52,672.53. This shows deficiency of assets May 13, 1873, of $2,366.49. Now, it is claimed by the defendants that the administrator should have charged himself with about $3,000 on account of the 25 shares of stock of the First National Bank of Parkersburg, and also with the value of certain bonds of the Little Kanawha Navigation Company, of the par value of $1,700. These are the only items which are claimed to be assets in excess of what is included in the inventory, and they are matters of contention in this suit. This record fails to disclose that any such contest existed at the time of the alleged settlement within the period of 18 months. It is to be observed, also, that the $7,106.99 of indebtedness, taxes, and administration charges found in the statement do not include a note of $4,000 made by J. G. Blackford, and indorsed by P. G. Van Winkle, bearing date May 2, 1870, and for which the estate was liable, and for which it is claimed the First National Bank stock and the Little Kanawha Navigation Company bonds were held by P. G. Van Winkle as collateral. As J. G. Blackford, to whose estate these matters properly belong, was at that time living, doing business, and supposedly solvent, he not having failed until 1876, it is not at all likely that the estate was supposed during the first year of the administration to have been affected one way or another by this liability or the collateral, nor that either the administrator or the distributees of the estate paid any attention to them, or took them into account in any settlement or statement that may have been made. Hence, if it be true, as claimed by the plaintiff, that in June, 1872, he ascertained the amount of the assets, and classified them as hereinbefore set out, and had frequent interviews with Mary V. Blackford, Sarah Van Winkle, as guardian for the children of Rathbone Van Winkle, and Godwin Van Winkle, personally and as trustee for Mary V. Blackford, thus representing all parties interested as residuary legatees, preliminary to the distribution of the $40,000 of bonds (pointing out the fact that by doing so he would reduce the available assets in his hands to an amount insufficient to pay the debts, taxes, and administration charges), and afterwards made the distribution as shown by his vouchers taken from Godwin Van Winkle, Sarah Van Winkle, Sarah E. Van Winkle, and Godwin Van Winkle, trustee, bearing dates in May and September, 1872, and in July, 1872, set apart to Anna Maria and Margaret E. Van Winkle their trust funds of $5,000 each, and for Sarah Van Winkle, guardian for Rathbone Van Winkle's children, $8,666.67, and in September took out his own legacy of $2,000, it would seem that in that year he made to all the parties a full disclosure of the condition of the estate in his hands as it then stood. His uncontradicted testimony is that he had frequent interviews with Mary V. Blackford, and kept her informed of the condition of affairs; exhibiting to her slip statements of the results, not only in that year, but every time she asked it for the next two years, and up until the fall of 1882. In August, 1873, he gave her and the other interested parties, or their representatives, a written statement of the distribution. He says that in October of that year he gave another statement, covering the rents and profits of the real estate. Objection is made to his testifying to transactions between himself and Godwin Van Winkle, who is dead; but, it having been shown that in June, 1872, he wrote Godwin Van Winkle a letter relating to the condition of the estate, and that unsuccessful efforts had been made to obtain the original, he was properly permitted to file a copy prepared from the copy retained by him in his copying book, which shows an approximation of debts and assets, exclusive of investments with which he proposed to pay them. It also mentions an advancement in bonds to Godwin Van Winkle prior to that time, and speaks of the necessity of making the dates of the distribution to the other parties correspond with the date of his. The voucher signed by Godwin Van Winkle for $6,000 bears date May 20, 1872. In the record, as exhibits, are copies of statements of the account of the administrator with Mary V. Blackford, bearing date August 27, 1873. All these appellants are the children of Rathbone Van Winkle. At the time of this alleged settlement the plaintiff here was the administrator of the estate of Rathbone Van Winkle, and Sarah Van Winkle was the guardian of these children. The plaintiff testifies that he fully informed Sarah Van Winkle, their guardian, of the condition of the estate, and gave her verbally the result of his approximation of the condition of the estate, and afterwards, within the 18 months from the date of his appointment, gave her a written statement of the distribution. The statute does not require any particular form of statement; nor is it, in terms, required to be in writing. The record contains no copy of the statement rendered Sarah Van Winkle, guardian, but the testimony is that it was similar to the statement rendered Mary V. Blackford. One of these is a mere statement of the distribution of bonds, and the other is an individual account of Mrs Blackford with the administrator, relating to her share of rents, and her interest on bonds, disbursements on account of taxes, improvements on her real estate, and moneys paid to her. Neither of them can be regarded as fully showing his receipts as administrator for the year. But, as no particular form or method of statement is required, and as it appears that a verbal statement was made, in which a fuller and more formal statement would, no doubt, have been given, if asked, it would seem to be sufficient. Whether the statute contemplates actual payment within six months from the end of the year in requiring actual settlement for the money received therein, or not, it is certain that payment will include actual settlement. From what has been stated, it is manifest that the administrator, within the year, actually paid all that Godwin Van Winkle and Mary V. Blackford were entitled to receive on account of the assets which came into his hands during the first year of his administration. The view that there was a statement and settlement is much strengthened by the fact that in the year 1872 the bulk of the estate was distributed, and that there is nothing in this record to indicate that for a period of 10 years thereafter there was any dissatisfaction with the conduct of the administrator, or any complaint against him. No steps were taken to bring him to a final settlement until in April, 1883. It is hardly probable that the parties interested in a large estate, such as this, would have remained so long a time without information as to its condition. This is regarded as an important circumstance tending to support the testimony of the administrator to the effect that they were fully informed.

It is objected that the court has allowed too much for commission, for the reason that the bonds of the Central Railroad Company of Iowa, amounting to $7,333.34, set apart and held for the Rathbone Van Winkle estate, and loaned to Godwin Van Winkle, were lost by reason of the bankruptcy of Godwin Van Winkle, and the remainder of said railroad bonds, amounting to $1,333.33, held for the Rathbone heirs, depreciated in value, and finally became worthless, and were lost by reason of the negligence of the administrator. It is claimed that he ought not to be allowed commission on these sums, but, on the contrary, should be charged with the same as lost by his negligence. The $8,666.67 of bonds belonging to the Rathbone Van Winkle estate were set apart to that estate by the administrator in 1872. In the same year $7,333.33 of them were loaned by the administrator to Godwin Van Winkle, together with an additional $5,000. Notes were taken for these amounts, and secured by a deed of trust upon real estate, executed by Godwin Van Winkle and wife, and dated December 14, 1872. Afterwards, May 15, 1883, Godwin Van Winkle and wife conveyed absolutely the real estate upon which these debts were secured to M. C. Van Winkle, H. C. Van Winkle, Juliette Van Winkle, and Harriette G. Van Winkle, the appellants here, in payment and discharge of said debts; the deed reciting that the value of the real estate and the amount of the debt ascertained were nearly equal. There is nothing in this record to show that the property was not worth the amount of the debt. On the contrary, the recitals of this deed show that the debt was fully paid out of the security taken by the administrator when the loan was made. However, commission cannot be allowed on the $8,666.66, face value, of the bonds set apart for the heirs of Rathbone Van Winkle. There was no actual payment of that part of the estate, so as to make it appear that as to it there was a statement and actual settlement. Had the bonds been delivered to the guardian, and accepted by her as so much cash, the administrator would have been entitled to his commission thereon. Farneyhough's Ex'rs v. Dickinson, 2 Rob. 582; Hipkins v. Bernard, 4 Munf. 83. Merely designating these bonds as belonging to the Rathbone Van Winkle heirs is not enough. W. W. Van Winkle was not entitled to hold them as administrator of Rathbone Van Winkle, who died before the testator. By his death the bonds went to his children, and should have been delivered to their guardian. There having been no actual payment to the guardian, there is nothing from which it can be inferred that within six months after the end of the year the administrator gave her a statement, and actually settled with her for the money to which her wards were entitled. Commission should not have been allowed on said sum, and the decree in favor of the administrator should be reduced to the extent of $433.33.

The complaint or claim that the estate has been charged with $17.50 each year as commission on interest collected on bonds held for M. E. Van Winkle, and paid to her, is absolutely groundless. The whole amount of interest, $350, is credited to the estate each year. Then the estate is charged with $17.50, the commission on it, and with $332.50, the balance as paid to M. E. Van Winkle. So the charges and credit exactly offset each other, and the transaction leaves the account of the estate just as if it had never been carried into it at all.

The only other alteration in the settlement in favor of the plaintiff is the allowance of $266.10 as commission on the amounts received from real estate during the period of plaintiff's administration of the estate. It is objected that this service was wholly outside of the duties of the administrator, and that whatever he may be entitled to for them cannot be included in his administration charges. The principle laid down in Dunn's Ex'rs v. Renick, 33 W. Va. 483, 10 S. E. 813, seems to settle this question. The court did not stop there to decide whether it was the duty of the executors to pay the taxes on the land. It only ascertained that they had paid them in good faith, and under the belief that it was their duty to do so, and did what the heirs had neglected to do. The opinion then proceeds as follows: "The payment of these taxes was for the benefit of the estate, and, those entitled to the residuum being those whose duty it was to pay them, it is entirely equitable that the executors should be credited for the amount they paid, as against the residuary legatees for whose benefit the payment was made." This record makes it absolutely certain that the collection of rents, payment of taxes and insurance, and the making of repairs on the real estate was with the consent of all the parties interested in this suit. Otherwise the plaintiff would not have obtained the rents from this property for a period of 10 years, amounting to several hundred dollars. It is suggested that he took charge of the real estate, collection of rents, etc., simply because he could do so. But it is hardly likely that he would have sought the privilege of paying out, on account of it, about $2,500 in excess of what he received. The appellants here were represented by a guardian in respect to all these matters, and surely it cannot be pretended that she was ignorant of the fact that the plaintiff was discharging a duty which protected the estate of her wards along with, and as a part of, his administration of the estate of his decedent. Nor can it be said that she was without power to take the management of the real estate of her wards out of his hands and perform those duties herself. It is also manifest that, had she done so, it would have been at a cost of considerably more than one-third of $266.10. Clearly, it was an arrangement made, by all parties interested, for convenience and economy in the management of the whole estate, both real and personal, and the equitable principle asserted in Dunn v. Renick ought to be applied. In that case, as in this, the executors had a naked power of sale, more extensive than the one given in this case, but still a mere naked power of sale. Here the power extended to one-third of the real estate, and was to be exercised only upon request of Mrs. Blackford, while in Dunn v. Renick it was practically unconditional, and extended to the whole of a certain farm. If such power confers the right to pay taxes and take credit for the amount thereof in the settlement of the administration account, the limitations upon the power above noticed cannot affect the principle. But the decision in Dunn v. Renick is based, not alone upon the power of sale vested in the executors, but upon their payment of the money for the benefit of the estate, in good faith, under the belief that it was their duty to pay it, and the fact that the payment so made benefited equally those who, as residuary legatees, took, in equal proportions, the surplus of the proceeds of the land on which the taxes were paid, and also the personal estate. The Van Winkle lands, on which the administrator with the will annexed paid taxes and insurance and made slight repairs, were devised to the persons who took the bulk of the personal estate as legatees, and the divisions of the real estate and residuum of the personal property among these persons were made in almost, if not exactly, the same proportions. Hence the rule adopted in Dunn v. Renick is clearly applicable. To the suggestion that this case involves only the settlement of the administration account, while that of Dunn v. Renick was an ordinary suit in equity to construe Dunn's will and for other purposes, the reply is that so much of the decision as related to the taxes went no further in its effect than to give the executors credit for the amount of the taxes in their settlement. As, under that case, the administrator is entitled to credit for the money expended, less the amount of rents received, why should he not have commission on the rents collected? What is the difference between applying the whole amount of rent collected, and allowing commission on the same, and crediting the rents less the commission? None. The question presents two methods of calculation, each of which produces the same result.

Having disposed of the objections to the alterations of the settlement made by the decree of the court in favor of the plaintiff, the complaint made by the appellants on account of the failure of the court to charge the plaintiff with certain sums, with which it is claimed he is justly and legally chargeable, is now to be disposed of. From what has been said respecting the commissioner's report, the stipulation upon which the cause was submitted, and the decree, it will be seen that the record presents a novel question in procedure. No exceptions to the commissioner's report were filed by the appellants. That report shows on its face that the specifications filed by the appellants were not considered by the commissioner. The decree recites that, in the opinion of the court, a re-committal of the report was necessary. By the stipulation filed the re-committal was waived, and the cause was by agreement submitted to the court, upon all the evidence and papers filed, for final determination and adjudication, "the findings of the court to have the same effect as upon a report of a commissioner regularly made up and filed in the cause." But, with one exception, the court failed to certify in the decree, or otherwise, what facts were found. The decree deals with the report of the commissioner as if the cause had been submitted upon that report and the exceptions thereto filed by the plaintiff. The defendants, the appellants here, filed no exception to the report, nor does the decree set forth any exceptions to the findings or rulings of the court. It is a well-settled rule in equity that where a decree is based upon a commissioner's report, and there is no exception to the report, pointing out, with reasonable certainty, the particular errors complained of, so as to direct the minds of the court to them, the appellate court cannot consider any error in the decree, unless it be such as appears upon the face thereof. Ward v. Ward, 21 W. Va. 262; Estill & Eakle v. McClintic's Adm'r, 11 W. Va. 412; Keck v. Allender, 37 W. Va. 214, 18 S. E. 520; Kester v. Lyon, 40 W. Va. 161, 20 S. E. 933; Kester v. Hill, 46 W. Va. 750, 34 S. E. 798. Errors in the report and decree, not apparent on the record, nor made the subject of exceptions to the report, are regarded as waived, or, rather, the parts of the report not excepted to are deemed to be admitted to be correct. Kester v. Lyon, cited. But the court, having acted upon the stipulation, was bound to follow and adhere to its terms. By that instrument the findings of the commissioner were set aside, although the report and the evidence taken by the commissioner were made parts of the record by the same instrument. Hence this decree, although apparently based upon the commissioner's report and exceptions thereto, must be treated as a decree of the court upon all the pleadings and evidence in the cause, made independently of the findings of the commissioner. It stands, therefore, upon the footing of a decree in a case in which there is no reference nor any report of a commissioner, and the assignment of error may be considered.

The first disallowance complained of is in respect to the bank stock hereinbefore mentioned. It will be remembered that the plaintiff is charged with $3,000, which he claims was the value of that stock in 1876, when he settled for it with the estate, taking it into his own hands, and charging himself with $3,000 as its value. In 1894 the stock was worth $3,875, and, from 1872, dividends had been paid on it amounting to $3,882. The contention is that this stock belonged absolutely to the estate of P. G. Van Winkle, and is still a part of the unadministered assets of that estate, and wrongfully withheld from it by the plaintiff. Wherefore it is insisted that he should be charged not only with $875 more on account of its value, but also with the dividends. There is no evidence that this stock belonged to P. G. Van Winkle, except that, at the time of his death, it stood upon the transfer book of the bank in his name, J. G. Blackford having formally transferred it to him on the 22d day of November, 1871. W. W. Van Winkle testifies as follows, in reference to the cause of that transfer: "I was present at the transaction between them [P. G. Van Winkle and J. G. Blackford, on or about November 22, 1871] in the rooms of P. G. Van Winkle's—residence of J. G. Blackford—where he lived about the date mentioned. It had reference to the indorsement by P. G. Van Winkle of the note of four thousand five hundred dollars for the accommodation of J. G. Blackford. J. G. Blackford requested P. G. Van Winkle to make such indorsement for him, but P. G. Van Winkle declined, unless J. G. Blackford would give him collateral to secure such indorsement, for the reason stated, that he, P. G. Van Winkle, was already his security. Thereupon J. G. Blackford offered twenty-five shares of the stock of the First National Bank as collateral for the indorsement of the four thousand five hundred dollar note so requested." He then states that the note was executed by Blackford, and indorsed by P. G. Van Winkle, on the faith of the bank stock as collateral, and on the same day the stock was transferred as aforesaid, all with the understanding that, upon the maturity of the note, it was to be reduced to $2,500, for which sum only renewals were to be made. The obligation upon which P. G. Van Winkle was already surety for Blackford was a note for $4,000, dated May 2, 1870, payable to W. W. Van Winkle, administrator of the estate of Rathbone Van Winkle, given in part settlement of the value of 520 United States bonds, of the face value of $5,000, for which Blackford, at the death of Rathbone Van Winkle, was indebted to him. Their ascertained value at that time was $5,670.25, which was reduced to $4,000 by a note of $1,000 due from Rathbone Van Winkle to P. G. Van Winkle, with $60 accrued interest, accounts due from Rathbone Van Winkle to Blackford amounting to $256.86, and a check for $353.37. These facts also are testified to by W. W. Van Winkle. His testimony as to these, as well as to the facts relating to the execution of the $4,500 note, and the transfer of the stock as collateral therefor, was objected to as being testimony to a personal transaction between the witness and deceased persons. W. W. Van Winkle further testifies that P. G. Van Winkle indorsed Blackford's note for $2,500, at 60 days, in part renewal of the $4,500 note, and that in March, 1872, P. G. Van Winkle being sick and unable to transact business, Blackford came to him and requested him to indorse for him a note in part renewal of the $4,500 note, upon the faith of the same bank stock as collateral for his indemnity; and that in that month, upon the agreement with Blackford that he should hold the bank stock for his indemnity, he did indorse Blackford's note for $2,000, at 60 days, with the understanding that he would continue to indorse for him to the amount of $2,500, the par value of the bank stock, in such amounts as Blackford would from time to time request. He further says that, at the time of the original pledging of the bank stock to P. G. Van Winkle, the certificate of stock was handed to him (W. W. Van Winkle), he being then a clerk or assistant in the office of P. G. Van Winkle, and that it had ever since remained in his possession. He claims that, in pursuance of the agreement between him and Blackford, he continued to indorse for the latter, and at the time of Blackford's failure, in 1876, he was liable as such indorser for three notes, one at 90 days, for $350, dated December 9, 1875, another at 90 days, for $600, dated February 17, 1876, and another at 75 days, for $1,200, dated January 15, 1876, and was compelled to pay, on account of said notes, the sum of $2,150. Copies of these three notes, and of the checks given in payment thereof, are filed as exhibits with W. W. Van Winkle's deposition. He files, also, copy of account of First National Bank with him as administrator, taken from the passbook, showing that from 1872 to 1876 he deposited the dividends on the bank stock, amounting to $1,200, in his name as administrator, and paid nearly all of them out by check to J. G. Blackford. Blackford having failed in 1876, and made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, fixing the liability upon W. W. Van Winkle to pay the notes indorsed by him, he says he agreed about that time with Blackford that he would take the bank stock at $3,000. In pursuance of that agreement, he wrote out a form of transfer of the stock to himself, under date of October 11, 1878, and signed it as administrator of P. G. Van Winkle, and, in pursuance thereof, the stock was transferred to him upon the books of the bank. After 1876, Van Winkle appropriated the dividends on the stock to his own use. J. W. Leese, cashier of Parkersburg National Bank, testifies that on November 22, 1871, a 60-day note for $4,500, made by Blackford and indorsed by P. G. Van Winkle, was discounted, and the money used by Blackford. It fell due January 24, 1872, when Blackford discounted his note at 60 days for $2,500, indorsed by P. G. Van Winkle, and the proceeds were placed to his credit, and paid the $4,500 note by his check. The $2,500 note was paid by Blackford, March 25, 1872, on which date there was placed to Blackford's credit a 60-day note for $2,000, made by Blackford and indorsed by W. W. Van Winkle. On May 25, 1872, the $2,000 note was paid by Blackford, and a note for $1,500, made by him and indorsed by W. W. Van Winkle, was placed to his credit. On July 27, 1872, the $1,500 note was paid, and a note for $1,000, indorsed by W. W. Van Winkle, was credited to Blackford. On October 3, 1872, the $1,000 note was paid by Blackford, and a $600 note, indorsed by W. W. Van Winkle, was placed to Blackford's credit. On December 5, 1872, the $600 note was paid, and a 90-day $500 note, made by Blackford and indorsed by W. W. Van Winkle, was placed to the credit of Blackford, and paid by Blackford March 8, 1873. C. A. Bukey, assistant cashier of the same bank, testifies to numerous notes handled by that bank, made by Blackford and indorsed by W. W. Van Winkle, in the years 1874-75, all of which were paid by Blackford, except the $350 note, dated December 9, 1875, which was paid by Van Winkle in 1876. The other two notes paid by him as indorser were handled in the Second National Bank of Parkersburg. Mr. Van Winkle testifies that from March 13 to June 13, 1874, his indorsements for Blackford amounted to $6,500, and on the latter date he indorsed a 74-day note for $4,000 for Blackford. The amount charged to the estate of P. G. Van Winkle on account of the $4,000 note of May 2, 1870, is $3,589.71, with interest thereon from February 23, 1876, to April 2, 1876, amounting to $29.91 making a total of $3,619.62. Against this, Commissioner Snodgrass charged the administrator with $3,000, the value of the bank stock, and $198.27 received by the administrator from the assignee of J. G. Blackford, being 32 per cent. dividend on $619.62, the balance due on the $4,000 note, after crediting thereon the $3,000, making in all $3,198.27, as a credit upon the amount paid by the Van Winkle estate on account of the $4,000 note, leaving the loss to the estate $421.35.

Independently of the testimony of the plaintiff, there is enough evidence in this record to warrant the finding that the bank stock was held by P. G. Van Winkle, not absolutely, but as collateral. It was transferred to him on the very day on which he indorsed the $4,500 note. P. G. Van Winkle is shown by his books to have been a very careful man and an accurate and systematic bookkeeper, and his books do not disclose any investment by him at any time in the stock of that bank, although they do show all his investments in other stocks and bonds. From the death of P. G. Van Winkle, early in 1872, until the failure of Blackford, early in 1876, a period of four years, during all which time Blackford was transacting a large business and handling large amounts of money and property, and during which, as indicated by the evidence, nobody suspected that there was any danger of his becoming insolvent, the dividends on the stock were paid to him by W. W. Van Winkle, the administrator, who, having been in the office of Mr. Van Winkle for several years, undoubtedly had some knowledge of his relations to Blackford and the status of that stock. Commissioner Snodgrass, the county court, and the circuit court have all found and held that the stock was collateral in the hands of P. G. Van Winkle, and not his property absolutely, and the facts herein stated as disclosed by the record, independently of the testimony of the plaintiff concerning any personal transaction between him and P. G. Van Winkle or between him and J. G. Blackford, are sufficient to support that finding. There is no evidence against it, except that at the time of the death of P. G. Van Winkle the stock stood on the books of the bank in his name, which fact is clearly insufficient to overcome the inference arising from the other facts, with which it is also perfectly consistent. Jones, Pled. & Col. Secu. § 153. Either as collateral in Van Winkle's hands, or as his own property, the stock would properly have stood in his name on the transfer book.

The only circumstance in the record from which, in the absence of anything to the contrary, it might possibly be inferred that that bank stock was pledged for the payment of the $4,000 note, as well as the $4,500 note, is the application of part of the proceeds of that stock to the payment of said $4,000 note, as hereinbefore shown. This application, however, is referable to a right on the part of the administrator of an entirely different kind. Blackford, the principal in the $4,000 note, was insolvent at the time the application was made, and this stock was a chose in action belonging to Blackford's estate, remaining in the hands of the administrator of the estate of Peter G. Van Winkle, the surety in said note. The insolvency of Blackford, the principal, conferred upon the surety the right in equity to withhold and apply this stock to payment of the debt by way of relieving himself as surety. Mattingly v. Sutton, 19 W. Va. 19. The act being attributable to this right, the inference that the application was made on the ground of the stock having been pledged for the payment of the note is negatived. In addition to this circumstance, Van Winkle says he applied it as a creditor of Blackford, and not as pledgee. He is certainly competent to explain his own act. This raises the question whether the administrator exercised his right of application to its full extent, and with reasonable care and diligence, to absolve the estate from loss on account of said $4,000 note. There was a loss of $421.35, as has been shown. Did the administrator give to the estate the full value of that stock? It seems so. The commissioners, county court, and circuit court have fixed the value at $3,000.00. On that valuation it was paying 8% per cent. at the time. Van Winkle says that was the market price, and the statement stands unchallenged. But any dividends accrued or remaining in his hands when the Blackford failure came were equally applicable in the same right. The last dividend shown to have been paid to Blackford was the May dividend of 1875. Another, amounting to $125, was received in November of that year, and the failure seems to have occurred between that date and May, 1876, when the next dividend accrued, for on March 11, 1876, Van Winkle paid off, with his individual check, one of the notes on which he was indorser for Blackford. As to the exact date of the failure, the testimony is silent. Hence the best evidence of the time, as related to dividend accruals, is the circumstance of payment of the note above referred to. Van Winkle says the failure occurred, and he took and held the stock in his own right, in 1876. So it must have been after the receipt of the dividend of November, 1875, and before that of May, 1876. Clearly, therefore, the administrator ought to be charged with the $125 dividend of November, 1875, which he did not pay to Blackford nor charge himself with.

In immediate connection with the foregoing, relating to the bank stock, arises the contention that the administrator failed to collect from the assignee of J. G. Blackford the full amount of what belonged to the P. G. Van Winkle estate, as its share of the assets of J. G. Blackford, upon the pro rata distribution thereof. The amount charged to the administrator as having been received from the assignee is $198.27, being a dividend on Blackford's liabilities, but it is insisted that the whole amount due upon the note, without deducting the value of the stock, should have been put in against the Blackford assets, reserving the stock to pay the balance, after applying the amount received in the pro rata distribution of the general assets. In the first instance that was done. W. W. Van Winkle combined the amounts due to himself individually, $2,157.15, less $400, agreed value of the Little Kanawha Navigation Company bonds, leaving $1,757.15, and to himself as administrator of Rathbone Van Winkle, on account of the $4,000 note, $3,589.71, making a total of $5,346.86, on which he received a 32 per cent. dividend from the assets of Blackford—$1,710.98. Afterwards, he and the assignee came to the conclusion that the value of the bank stock should have been deducted and the dividend computed on the balance—$2,346.86—showing an excess of $960 paid by the assignee to Van Winkle on account of the two claims, on which interest had accrued to the amount of $816.40, making a total due from Van Winkle to the assignee of $1,776.40. They also found an additional dividend of $330.53, due on the two claims, which was credited on the excess and interest, leaving a balance of $1,445.87, which was paid by Van Winkle to the assignee. By the general rule in equity, the pledgee may prove his whole claim against the pledgor's estate in insolvency without deducting the value of his security. Jones, Pled. & Col. Secu. § 587; Lewis v. U. S., 92 U. S. 618, 23 L. Ed. 513; Merrill v. Bank, 178 U. S. 181, 19 Sup. Ct. 360, 43 L. Ed. 640; Mason v. Bogg, 2 Mylne & Craig, 443. But this principle is not applicable here. The security had been converted into money, or, at least, its value had been ascertained and applied in satisfaction pro tanto of the debt, and the creditor could prove only the balance due against the assets of the insolvent debtor. Jones, Pled. & Col. Secu. § 587; Midgeley v. Slocomb, 32 How. Prac. 423.

As to the bonds of the Little Kanawha Navigation Company, which by some means came into the hands of the plaintiff from J. G. Blackford, there is not a particle of evidence that they ever belonged to the estate of P. G. Van Winkle, or that they were held as collateral by him, or for the $4,000 note upon which he was surety for Blackford. It only appears that they were in the hands of the plaintiff, and that he credited $400, as their agreed value, upon the amount due him by reason of his having paid the three notes of Blackford upon which he was indorser. That is in no sense an admission that they were in any way applicable to the payment of the $4,000 note, and there is no evidence that they were so applicable. Hence the court properly disallowed the claim of the appellants made in reference to them.

Only one other item remains to be considered. On the 18th day of October, 1888, a decree was made by the circuit court of Wood county, in a suit brought to sell real estate of the Rathbone Van Winkle heirs, reciting that certain real estate, belonging to the estate of P. G. Van Winkle, in which said heirs were interested, had been sold for the sum of $1,650, out of which W. W. Van Winkle had received, as special commissioner, the sum of $220 as the share of said heirs, and that the estate of P. G. Van Winkle, of which he was administrator, having also sole charge of the real estate, was indebted to him in the sum of $982.30, for money necessarily paid out for taxes, repairs to buildings, and insurance in excess of the receipts from rents, of which $327.43 was charged to said heirs, and ordering that he retain said sum of $220 and apply it as a credit upon said sum of $327.43. The refusal of the court to charge W. W. Van Winkle with this sum is assigned as error. All that can be said of this decree is that it gave the plaintiff the right to retain the $220 and apply it as a credit as therein stated. It does not show that he did so, nor is there anything in this record which shows it. He swears that the money was not retained by him, but was paid out and expended in this suit and in the improvement of the estate of these appellants. Whether he did retain the money which he was so authorized to retain is the vital question. The real estate account and settlement, made by Commissioner Snodgrass and approved by the court, shows neither a charge nor a credit relating to the transactions under the decree of October 18, 1888. If it were shown that the plaintiff retained out of the $372, this $220, he ought to be charged with it here, otherwise he ought not to be so charged. He says he did not so retain it, but paid out the whole amount for the benefit of said heirs, and his testimony is uncontradicted. There being no dispute about the indebtedness to the plaintiff on account of his services and expenditures in caring for the real estate, the burden is upon the appellants to show payment, and they have clearly failed to show that said sum of $220 was actually applied on that indebtedness. They have only shown that his right to do so was adjudicated. Had the parties who were entitled to the fund been adults, that right would have existed without adjudication, and the adjudication was no doubt asked for the sole reason that they were infants, and the fund belonged to the corpus of their estate, and could only be expended upon an order of the court.

Two errors have been noted, either of which is sufficient to reverse the decree. A more serious one, however, remains to be indicated. Taking the report of Commissioner Snodgrass, which disallowed to the administrator his claim for commission for the first year, amounting to $2,315.77, as the basis of its action, the circuit court gave credit for said sum on the amount found due by said commissioner from the administrator to the estate—$4,118.86. This sum included $1,189.62 charged against the administrator as interest. Had the court gone back and credited said commissions in the first year of the account in the statement, there would have been no balance of $2,197.17 against the administrator, for that year, on which to charge interest. And if, after giving credit there for the commission, the court had restated the whole account for subsequent years, it is not likely that the close of it would have contained any interest charged against the administrator of any consequence. We now find and hold that, instead of allowing $2,315.77 as commission, the circuit court should have given credit for $1,882.44, and this sum should be credited in the account for the first year of the administration, and the whole account reformed and restated. This commission was earned in the first year, and should be credited as of that year. All the forms of statements in the settlements of administration accounts, found in the books, show credits for commissions in the years in which they were earned. 4 Min. Ins. 1500. The hardship and injustice of postponing such credits until final settlement is too apparent to require an argument to show it. As the item of $125 became chargeable to the administrator, apparently, before May, 1876, it should be entered in the account for the year ending May 13, 1876. The item of $850 paid on account of the debt due to the sinking fund of the city of Parkersburg should be entered as of July 18, 1881.

As the case is to be remanded for restatement of the account, the principles governing the allowance of interest in such accounts will be set out, and, in connection therewith, an additional assignment of error will be disposed of. When the personal representative is not in default, although there is a balance against him in favor of the estate, the interest on the balance is not carried into the account, but stands over until final settlement, or until sufficient disbursements have been made to discharge it, after the balance of principal against him has been extinguished. 3 Min. Ins. 641. This is the method followed by Commissioner Snodgrass in his report. In restating the account, a different rule is to be applied. The administrator should have separated from his general account the accounts of payments, to legatees and distributees, long before he made his settlement, as it does not appear that the existence of any debts prevented his doing so. Therefore he ought to settle under the rule of debtor and creditor, charging interest on money due, and applying payments to the liquidation of the interest first, and then of the principal. Garrett v. Carr, 3 Leigh, 418; Handly v. Snodgrass, 9 Leigh, 484; 3 Min. Ins. 642. If a balance shall appear at any time in favor of the administrator, the same rule is to be applied. 3 Min. Ins. 641. Nothing appears in the case calling for the application of the rule of compound interest against the administrator. He is so charged when he uses the money of the estate in trade and will not disclose the profits he has made, or where the fund is directed to be laid out to accumulate, or where he has acted as quasi guardian as well as executor. 3 Min. Ins. 640, 642. The plaintiff has not used the funds of the estate in trade. By the second and third clauses of the will, two separate funds of $5,000 each were directed to be invested "in some safe public bonds or securities, bearing at least six per centum annual interest," or deposited in some trust company reported to be solvent, the interest on which was to be paid to the testator's two sisters during their natural lives, and after their deaths the principal sums were to fall into and constitute a part of the residuum of the estate. This direction of the will was not strictly observed, and it is urged, for this reason, not only that compound interest should be charged against the administrator, but that he should be compelled to account also for alleged resultant losses. By way of compliance, $10,000 in railroad bonds were set apart and held for the purposes aforesaid. Soon afterwards, one set of these bonds, part of which constituted one of the $5,000 funds, greatly depreciated in value, something like 52 per cent., as a result of the panic of 1873. These were bonds in which the administrator found his testator's funds already invested. He could not foresee the panic of the following year. He might well have assumed that the testator himself considered them a safe investment. A short time before his death, some time in the fall of 1871, he exchanged United States bonds for these railroad bonds, $20,000 of Cincinnati, Baltimore & Ohio Railroad bonds, and $20,000 of Central Railroad of Iowa bonds. These bonds constituted by far the larger part of the solvent personal estate. There was but little cash. To have followed strictly the directions of the will, it would have been necessary to convert $10,000 of the bonds or of other assets into cash and change the investment. Whether that could have been done before the Central Railroad of Iowa bonds depreciated is not shown. It may have been practicable, and it may not have been. The sequel shows they were not as good as the Cincinnati, Baltimore & Ohio bonds, but there is nothing here to indicate that there was not ground, at the time they were set apart, for considering them equally as good. Considering them good, W. W. Van Winkle took his own legacy of $2,000 in them. It is not the case of a requirement to invest actual cash, for the testator did not leave as much as $5,000 in cash, nor could his debts have been paid, and these two funds invested as directed by the will, without converting some of the bonds or other property into cash. Not only was it necessary to do this in order to comply with the direction found in the will, but an investment in safe public bonds or securities bearing at least 6 per cent. interest must have been found. It may be that such opportunities were at hand, but there is nothing in this record to show it, or that the railroad bonds could have been readily converted. An executor or administrator is not to be charged with losses, nor with compound interest, unless guilty of negligence or misconduct. Hooper v. Hooper, 32 W. Va. 541, 9 S. E. 937; Holt v. Holt, 46 W. Va. 397, 35 S. E. 19. Prima facie, he is chargeable with all the assets undoubtedly, and must account for them, but if he account by showing a loss, which he could not have prevented by the exercise of due diligence and vigilance, he thereby discharges himself as to the assets lost. 3 Min. Ins. 634; Evans v. Shroyer, 22 W. Va. 581; Reitz v. Bennett, 6 W. Va. 417; Cavendish v. Fleming, 3 Munf. 198. Some of the authorities say he is not to be charged with a debt not collected unless it is shown that it has been lost by his negligence. Under the circumstances shown by this record, it cannot be said or held that the loss on account of the bonds is due to the negligence of the administrator. The statement of the account shows that the bonds of the Central Railroad of Iowa were charged off early in 1874, as being in default of interest and of no salable value. How could the administrator have foreseen this? It was a result of a great financial panic which suddenly swept over the whole country, spreading financial havoc and ruin on every hand. Who can say that he could have converted them into safe bonds, or into cash, within the short time allowed him, without sacrifice? It is not to be assumed that this could have been done. The occasion of the loss was a great public calamity. By extreme wariness and caution its effect might have been avoided, not because the disaster was foreseen or anticipated, for that was impossible, but merely by extreme caution, which the law does not require. As to compound interest, an executor acting as a de facto guardian, under a will requiring him to invest a fund for accumulation or to pay interest to some designated person, is chargeable with compound interest when he fails to so invest it and uses the money himself. Is there any rule under which he is to be so charged for mere failure to invest in the particular class of securities, or in the mode, indicated by the testator? No such rule has been produced, or found. In case of negligent loss of the fund, he probably would be, but such question does not arise here.

In the brief of counsel for appellant there are some references to alleged errors in the report of Commissioner Clemens. That is not the report upon which the decree complained of is based. Nor are the supposed errors referred to attributable to the cause assigned. In one the estate is credited with $265.65 as interest received, and then charged with $243.82 as interest paid out. The difference is the commission, and not interest. The same is true of the other item complained of—$296.69 interest received, and $281.06 interest disbursed—the difference being practically the amount of commission. Evidently, there is an error in the calculation. The disbursement was clearly intended to be the amount received, less the commission.

Another apparently groundless complaint in the brief filed for appellant M. C. Van Winkle says compound interest is allowed in the real estate account, because it is made up with annual rests. A hasty examination of it reveals no charge of interest upon interest, though made with annual rests. Against each charge of interest, on an annual balance, credits of rents received, largely exceeding the interest, appear to have been entered, and the interest charges thus extinguished under the partial-payment rule. But if there is any compound interest in the account, it should be expunged.

It is urged in the brief that this court enter a decree finally settling this case, but counsel for appellant asks the court to go back into the account and apply the two sums, in respect to which there is error in the decree, so as to show the final result. This work properly belongs to a commissioner, and counsel, by agreement, cannot impose it upon the court. It is manifest that no proper decree can be entered without a restatement of the account upon the principles herein stated. For this purpose, the cause must be remanded, and, in restating the account, the report of Commissioner Snodgrass is to be taken as the basis, and altered according to the findings and directions herein given.

For these reasons, the decree is reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of Wood county to be further proceeded in according to the principles here stated, and, further, according to the rules and principles governing courts of equity.

WALDRON v. HARVEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 9, 1904.)

PARTITION—SALE FOR COSTS—DECREE—VALIDITY—PRAYER FOR RELIEF—EQUITY—JURISDICTION—MARRIED WOMAN—SALE OF REALTY—VOID DECREE—COLLATERAL ATTACK—PARTIES IN PARTITION—ESTOPPEL—LACHES—ADVERSE POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE—TAXES—PAYMENT.

1. Upon a bill purely and only for partition of land in kind between parceners, asking no sale for costs, or other cause, there can be no sale for costs, and a decree of sale is void, not simply erroneous. A sale and conveyance under it confer no title.

2. Where there is no pleading to warrant a decree, or part of a decree, the decree, or such part of it, is not merely voidable, but void, as it is not on matter in issue.

3. Where the subject-matter and purpose and nature of a suit are such as not to warrant a given decree, but the decree is foreign thereto, it is null and void.

4. A prayer for general relief will authorize a decree upon matter of the bill, though such decree is not asked by a prayer for specific relief; but not unless the matter of the bill warrants the decree in law.

5. While a court of equity having jurisdiction for one purpose may go on and give full relief as to all matters comprehended under the allegations of fact in the pleadings, yet it is limited in its relief to the allegations of the bill or other pleading, and cannot decree beyond their scope.

6. After a final decree at one term, giving the full relief warranted by the facts stated in the bill, the case is ended, and out of court, and the court has no further jurisdiction of the subject-matter or parties, and all orders and decrees at a later term are null and void.

7. A decree selling in fee land of a married woman, not separate estate, for debt made during coverture, is wholly void, and passes no title. A decree selling in fee the separate estate land of a married woman for a debt made during coverture and before chapter 3, p. 6, Acts 1893 (Code 1899, c. 66, § 15), is wholly void, and passes no title.

8. A decree which is void, not merely erroneous, may be attacked directly by appeal or bill of review or by collateral attack.

9. In a suit purely for partition of land, unless a sale and distribution of its proceeds are sought, a trustee and creditor in a deed of trust are not necessary parties.

10. A married woman cannot lose her land, separate or not separate estate, by estoppel by conduct (in pais) without actual fraud, if even by it.

11. One cannot lose vested title to land by oral admission that it is the property of another.

12. Laches cannot be imputed to a married woman to defeat her suit for land not her separate estate.

13. Laches will not defeat a suit for land when the adverse claimant is not in actual possession.

14. Where one is vested with legal title to land, laches will not defeat a suit for it when the right is yet not barred by the statute of limitation applicable to it.

15. Adverse possession of a married woman's land, not her separate estate, beginning during coverture and continuing for the term of the statute of limitations, will bar the wife's and husband's right during coverture; but, though the right during coverture is barred, the wife, or those claiming under her, has five years after the coverture ends to sue for the land.

16. Waldron has actual possession of a tract of her land, and Nighbert has actual possession of a tract of his land. A part of Waldron's land is sold under a decree void, not merely voidable, and is purchased by Nighbert. The part sold adjoins the land of Nighbert, and also the remaining land of Waldron. Neither ever has actual possession within the part so sold. By law the constructive actual possession of Waldron over the part sold commencing before the void sale continues after it, and Nighbert has no constructive actual possession of the part sold so as to be adverse to Waldron and bar Waldron's title by limitation.

17. A deed for land to a purchaser under a judicial sale, though the decree is without jurisdiction and void, is color of title for adverse possession, and actual possession under it is adverse to the owner of the land.

18. Possession by a purchaser under a judicial sale not wholly void is adverse to the owner.

19. Passing the state title to forfeited land to another claimant under the Constitution, art. 13, § 3.

20. Payment of taxes by a purchaser under a void judicial sale inures to the benefit of the former owner, so as to save his title from forfeiture for failure to enter it upon the taxbooks in his name.

21. Equity has jurisdiction to remove cloud over title to land by vacating a void judicial sale and a deed under it, the former owner being in actual possession.

22. A purchaser of land from a purchaser under a decree void for want of jurisdiction is not a bona fide purchaser without notice. He is bound to know the want of jurisdiction and defect of title apparent in documents under which he derives title.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mingo County; E. S. Doolittle, Judge.

Bill by Hester A. Waldron against Thomas H. Harvey and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John W. English and Robert H. Hoyle, for appellant. John B. Wilkinson and Thos. H. Harvey, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. George W. Clark died in 1861, owning a large tract of land in Logan county. In 1885 M. H. Waldron and Hester A. Waldron, his wife, filed a bill against Luemma Clark and others in the circuit court of Logan county, stating in it the death and seisin of Clark; that he left a widow, Luemma Clark, and three children, Hester A., John B., and Jane Clark; that Hester A. Clark had married M. H. Waldron, and Jane had married — Waller, and died leaving one child, George R. Waller. The bill prayed that the widow's dower be assigned, and the land divided between the three heirs. The bill contained the common prayer for general relief. A decree was made at April term, 1886, assigning the widow's dower, and assigning to Hester A. Waldron, John B. Clark, and George R. Waller each a separate parcel of the land, and requiring each heir to pay a third of the costs, and retiring the case from the docket. U. S. Buskirk gave a notice to the parties to the suit, saying that he was the beneficiary of the several parties entitled to costs in the case, and that he would at the October term, 1886, move the court to reinstate the case on the court docket. At that term an order was entered reciting that, as at the April term, 1886, the cause was dropped from the docket without any provision for payment of costs, "on motion of the plaintiff this cause is ordered to be reinstated upon the docket of this court that an adjudication and proper process may be had for the costs herein." At the same term another decree was made reciting that the former decree had required Hester A. Waldron, J. B. Clark, and George R. Waller to pay the costs equally, and fixing the amount of costs, and decreeing that, unless said parties should pay the costs and interest, a special commissioner should sell sufficient of the land which had been set apart to said heirs to pay the costs chargeable to them respectively. Under this decree 99 acres of the tract which had been allotted to Hester A. Waldron was sold, and purchased by J. A. Nighbert, and the sale confirmed by decree. Nighbert's right passed to Thomas H. Harvey, S. S. Altizer, Niele Nighbert, and G. F. Miller. By deed of trust, September 17, 1883, M. H. Waldron and Hester A. Waldron, his wife, and John B. Clark conveyed to William Stratton, as trustee, to secure a debt to James A. Nighbert, all their interest, then undivided, in the land descended to them from George W. Clark. In a suit to enforce liens against John B. Clark a decree was made to sell John B. Clark's tract allotted to him, and in this suit the said trustee and Nighbert were parties, and under the decree the tract of John B. Clark was sold, and bought by Nighbert by decree. That suit was brought and the sale under it made before the sale to Nighbert of the 99 acres out of Hester Waldron's land. The John B. Clark land bought by Nighbert adjoins said 99 acres. When Nighbert purchased the John B. Clark land, he at once took possession of it, and yet has such possession; but his possession actual includes no part of the 99 acres. Before George W. Clark's death he allotted a portion to Hester A. Waldron, and she and her husband took actual possession of it, built a house upon it, and have ever since been in actual possession; and the part assigned to her in the partition included this improvement, and ever since such partition they have continued such possession. The 99 acres sold from her is part of the tract assigned her, and adjoins the remainder of her tract; but she has never had actual possession within the 99 acres, if we can give it a boundary. The said 99 acres seems to have no definite boundary. The decree under which it was sold prescribes no definite boundary; simply tells the commissioner to sell a sufficient amount of land to pay the debt. The said 99 acres was, for taxation, deducted from Hester A. Waldron's tract, and ever since Nighbert's purchase of it the 99 acres has been taxed to Nighbert and those claiming under him, and not to Hester Waldron. The sale to Nighbert of the John B. Clark land paid the deed of trust, but it was not actually released until after the sale of the 99 acres under the decree. The said 99 acres is in a state of nature. In the year 1900 Waldron and wife brought a chancery suit in the circuit court of Mingo county, wherein the land now lies, against Thomas H. Harvey and others, owning the 99 acres under Nighbert's purchase under said judicial sale, basing their claim to relief on the theory that the decree of sale and the sale and confirmation decree were all void, and conferred no title, because the court was without jurisdiction to make the decrees, and praying that said decrees and sale and deed under them be set aside as clouds upon the title of Hester Waldron. The court entered a decree denying any relief to Waldron and his wife, and dismissing their bill, and from this decree they have appealed.

One important question is this: The bill for partition was purely and only a bill for partition. It stated only the facts that Clark owned the land at his death, his title, who were his heirs, and that they were entitled to partition. It asked nothing as to costs, did not pray that they be charged on the land and that the land be sold for them. The utmost the court could do on that bill was to divide the land, order each party to pay his share of costs by personal decree, and perhaps, as some courts do, declare such costs a lien on the lands assigned, which would be unnecessary, because the decree personal would be a lien. This decree did not declare the costs a lien. If it had done so, there could not be a sale for costs on that bill. The decree that the heirs pay costs was a judgment. It had to be enforced by another bill, because it did not exist at the date of the suit, and the bill made no allegation as to its payment, and made no statement or prayer as to costs or their nonpayment. There had been no execution for such costs. It was not a judgment lien suit. It did not seek a sale of the land for any cause. "A decree is a conclusion of law from pleading and proofs, and where there is a failure of either pleading or proofs there can be no decree." Keneweg v. Schilansky, 47 W. Va. 287, 84 S. E. 773; Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. 553. A decree, or any matter of a decree, which has no matter in the pleadings to rest upon, is void, because pleadings are the very foundation of judgments and decrees. "Matters not charged in the bill or in the answer, and not in issue in the cause, are not proper to be considered on the hearing." Hunter v. Hunter, 10 W. Va. 321. There must not only be jurisdiction as to the person affected by the decree by having him before the court by process or appearance, but there must be jurisdiction of the matter acted upon by having it also before the court in the pleadings. Multitudinous cases attest this elementary axiom of jurisdiction. If either is wanting, the decree or judgment is void, not merely voidable or erroneous. Hogg's Eq. Proced. § 573; Haymond v. Camden, 22 W. Va. 180, point 5; McCoy v. Allen, 16 W. Va. 724; Shaffer v. Fetty, 30 W. Va. 248, 4 S. E. 278; Bland v. Stewart, 35 W. Va. 518, 14 S. E. 215. Akin to this case is Seamster v. Blackstock (Va.) 2 S. E. 36, 5 Am. St. Rep. 262, where a widow sued to assign dower, making the heirs parties, and the court decreed a sale, and the decree was held void because in selling the court exceeded its jurisdiction. So, in Hull v. Hull, 26 W. Va. 1, and Hoback v. Miller, 44 W. Va. 635, 29 S. E. 1014—suits brought by widows for dower—sales decreed were held absolutely void. Why? Because in such suit, upon such a cause of suit, a sale was improper, the court not having proper jurisdiction for that purpose. So, in this case, a suit purely for partition, there could be no sale except for the reason that the land was indivisible; certainly not for costs. In the cases just given there was more reason to justify decrees than in this case, because the bills asked a sale, and this bill did not, and stated no ground for sale. You cannot, in a suit for one purpose, decree for another. Billingsley v. Menear, 44 W. Va. 651, 30 S. E. 61, is like this case, in that the bill was good for part, but not all, of the decree. It was held bad as to the part not covered by the facts stated in the bill.

It is argued that the prayer for general relief makes the decree good over the defect just stated. This cannot be so. Under a prayer for general relief you can get relief not specifically asked, provided the facts alleged in the bill and the nature of the case warrant it; not otherwise. Hogg's Eq. Proced. § 105; Vance Shoe Co. v. Haught, 41 W. Va. 275, 23 S. E. 553.

It is further argued that, as the court had unquestionable jurisdiction to decree partition, the sale decree was warranted by the rule that, having jurisdiction for one purpose, it must go on, and give full relief on principles stated in Sinnett v. Cralle, 4 W. Va. 600; that is, where the nature of the case and the facts given in the bill justify it. A court cannot do everything in a case. This case was only one for partition. Sale was not its object or nature. The bill contained nothing to call for it. That was not in the issue. "It is impossible to concede that because A. and B. are parties to a suit a court may decide any matter in which they may be interested, whether such matter be involved in the litigation or not." Black on Judg. 241. So the decree for sale was ultra the case.

Another reason why the sale is void is the indefiniteness of the land sold. It seems simply a sale of 99 acres out of 378. No boundary, no description; all vague and general. Ejectment could not be maintained for it, for it was agreed in the present suit that it had never been surveyed, and that its boundaries had never been ascertained; and, if the case should go for defendants, the court should direct a survey, and its metes and bounds be fixed and entered of record. Thus the surveyor, not the court, would be the vendor, in effect. Blakey v. Morris, 89 Va. 717, 17 S. E. 126.

Another reason occurs to me to show this decree void. The suit sought partition only. When the decree making final partition and adjudicating costs was entered, it disposed of everything involved in the case. It was a final decree, and ended the case, because it had fully performed its office of giving full relief according to the facts, and the court had nothing further to do. A final decree puts the case out of court. Cocke v. Gilpin, 1 Rob.

22; Vanmeter v. Vanmeter, 3 Grat. 148; Hogg's Eq. Proced. § 568; Morgan v. Railroad, 39 W. Va. 17, 19 S. E. 588. Childers v. Loudin, 51 W. Va. 559, 42 S. E. 637, holds that after the term the powers of the court are closed. The decree alone put the case out of the court, but the decree expressly struck it from the docket. There was no case in court for a further decree, and the decree of sale was a nullity. McKinney v. Kirk, 9 W. Va. 26; Crim v. Davison, 6 W. Va. 465. It is no answer to this to say that Code 1899, c. 127, § 11, allows reinstatement. That does not apply to suits closed by final decree, but only to nonsuits and dismissal before decree.

Another reason for holding the decree of sale void comes from the question, where did the court find its jurisdiction to sell the fee simple of a married woman's land for her debt? At the date of the decree equity could subject the issues and profits during the coverture. This was the extent of its powers until Acts 1893, p. 6, c. 3, Code 1899, c. 66, § 15. Under no state of facts could it go further to pay her debts, if the land was her separate estate, without a lien. Radford v. Carwile, 13 W. Va. 572; Williamson v. Cline, 40 W. Va. 194, 20 S. E. 917. Was the land Hester Waldron's separate estate? We do not know. She inherited it in 1861. We do not know when she was married. If before April 1, 1869, it was not separate estate; if after that date, it would be, under chapter 66, § 2, Code 1899. If the land was not separate estate, I do not see how it could be at all subjected. As a contract to pay costs, her promise would not be enforceable. But say there is the decree against a married woman. It would be void, as would a judgment at law. The suit was not one to sell her land. But, as the costs were in partition, they might be charged expressly on the land; but this was not done. Let us say, however, that the decree is personal, and, being in partition, is valid; still, could you sell the corpus of her land? Whether we view the land as maiden land, not separate estate, or separate estate, I do not see how the land could be sold in fee. Under Thorn v. Sprouse, 39 W. Va. 706, 20 S. E. 676, it seems her land would not be liable for costs.

Counsel for the defense say that the court had jurisdiction for partition, and that, even if it erred in a decree of sale, it is merely error, and is res judicata, and forever binding, and could be attacked only by appeal, not collaterally, as is done in this case. But this is answered by the fact that the decree is void, not voidable. A void decree may be reversed on appeal or bill of review, or attacked collaterally. Cook v. Dorsey, 38 W. Va. 196, 18 S. E. 468; 2 Cyc. 590.

It is argued that, as the trustee and creditor were not parties, the decree is also for that reason void. It would be as to them; but as to other parties it would be only eraneous, not void. It was only a partition suit, to which they were not necessary parties, unless a sale was asked. 1 Daniel, Ch. Prac. 257; 2 Minor's Inst. 418.

It is claimed that the plaintiff is estopped to say the decree of sale is void on the theory that that decree was at her instance. To bar one of his right, the case must be plain. The record does not show that Hester Waldron moved the decree. It is likely that Buskirk did. An order does show that she moved the reinstatement, which, though it so states, is not likely, and probably an unauthorized statement, as Buskirk gave the plaintiff notice that he would ask reinstatement. But pass this. The decree of sale—another order than that of reinstatement—was not moved by her. Is it likely she would move a decree against herself? She got the benefit of the decree in having its proceeds pay her debt, but did not ask its benefit. Though the record does not disclose that she did anything working an estoppel, yet, as it is argued that she did, I will say that, if she did, yet, as she was a married woman, whether this land is or is not separate estate, she could not lose her title by estoppel in pais for reasons given in Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411, point 11, 38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891. In that late excellent chancery work, Amer. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. vol. 4, p. 363, in a full note on estoppel by conduct, I find this: "She cannot be estopped with reference to her legal title to real estate, however, since that can only be conveyed according to the statutory requirements." Very many cases are cited from all quarters to support the proposition. Heavener v. Godfrey, 3 W. Va. 426; McNeeley v. Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 643, 44 S. E. 508, 62 L. R. A. 562. The answer says Hester Waldron admitted in conversation that Nighbert owned the land. Title to land cannot pass by admissions when statute requires a deed. Cases given in McNeeley v. Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 644, 44 S. E. 508, 62 L. R. A. 562; High v. Pancake, 42 W. Va. 607, 26 S. E. 536. But the replication denies this allegation. It was mere mistaken opinion, not misleading any one to outlay.

Laches. This defense cannot avail. View Hester Waldron's estate as not separate, and the rule applies that laches cannot be imputed to a married woman. Baker v. Morris, 10 Leigh, 284; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 107; Hogg's Eq. Princip. 418. The Waldrons being in possession, laches is not imputable to them, as the defendants were not in possession. State v. Sponaule, 45 W. Va. 415, 32 S. E. 283, 43 L. R. A. 727. In addition, this case is one of legal title, and is governed by the statute of limitations—that is, the right to the land—and, as that statute does not bar the plaintiffs, as will be presently sought to be shown, laches cannot bar, as clearly a right yet good under the statute is not lost by laches. Laches applies to equitable demands, where the statute of limitations does not. "Mere delay in asserting a right, short of the limitation fixed by statute, does not bar the right in equity." 8 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 677. If a legal right gets into equity, the statute governs. Hogg's Eq. Princip. 415; Wilson v. Harper, 25 W. Va. 179. The cases of Pusey v. Gardner, 21 W. Va. 470, and Trader v. Jarvis, 23 W. Va. 101, do not apply because they were about equitable rights. View Hester Waldron's land as separate estate, and say that laches are imputable to a woman as to her separate estate. If the statute does not bar, laches do not bar, as just stated.

Statute of limitations: If the land was maiden land, not separate estate, and there had been actual possession by the purchaser, Nighbert, of the 99 acres, the statute would bar the joint right during coverture. Merritt v. Hughes, 36 W. Va. 366, 15 S. E. 56; Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Grat. 505. But the wife's estate would be saved by coverture. But the joint right of Hester Waldron and husband cannot be so barred for want of actual possession of the 99 acres by those claiming under the sale. Before that sale Hester Waldron and husband had actual possession of the tract assigned her, and that possession, though not on the 99 acres, included it, as possession of part is of the whole. If Nighbert's purchase were not void, it may be that his possession of the John B. Clark land would be extended over the 99-acre coterminous tract on the same principle, as it would in such case be the better right, and would displace the constructive actual possession of the Waldrons; but the sale, being void, did not displace the constructive actual possession of the Waldrons of the 99 acres, because it did not for a moment extend to it. Overton v. Davisson, 1 Grat. 211, 42 Am. Dec. 544. So Nighbert and those under him never had actual, or constructively actual, possession of this 99 acres. Thus the joint estate is not barred. So, if we view it as separate estate, the wife's right is not barred, for like reason—want of possession.

The defendants ask, are not our purchase and deed under it color of title? The plaintiffs say that they are not, because it has been held that one who buys at a court sale that is void holds no adverse possession against the former owner. For this broad position that a deed under a void sale is no color of title Hall v. Hall, 27 W. Va. 468, Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751, Sturm v. Fleming, 26 W. Va. 54, are cited. I think the last case only holds that payment of taxes by the purchaser keeps the land from being forfeited for nonentry by the former owner. The first two cases at first seem to conflict with Mullan v. Carper, 37 W. Va. 215, 16 S. E. 527, and with Swann v. Thayer, 36 W.

Va. 47, 14 S. E. 423, holding void sales good for color of title and adverse possession, which they certainly are on sound principle. Bennett v. Pierce, 50 W. Va. 604, 40 S. E. 395; McNeeley v. Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 616, 44 S. E. 508, 62 L. R. A. 562. But on examination we see that in the cases of Hall v. Hall and Lynch v. Andrews the litigation in which the sales were made continued, and the sales were set aside in those same cases. The purchasers were like pendent lite purchasers, who cannot plead the statute. Those cases do not apply in this case for the reasons just stated. It is clear that, except under special circumstances, possession under a sale is adverse, though the sale be void. "The possession of a purchaser at a judicial sale is adverse to the judgment debtor." 1 Cyc. 1054; 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 850. On page 854 we read: "A deed which is executed pursuant to a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction gives color of title, even though the decree is void." Possession under a deed from a vendor is adverse to him; possession under a void tax deed is adverse to the former owner. By a parody of reason, a deed under a void decree purporting to pass the owner's title is color of title. Simpson v. Edmiston, 23 W. Va. 875; Ketchum v. Spurlock, 34 W. Va. 597, 12 S. E. 832. A void deed was so held in Cooey v. Porter, 22 W. Va. 121. Whilst I assert that a deed under a void decree would give good title by adverse possession, yet for want of actual possession in this case it avails nothing. Besides, the decree was void for want of description of the land, and thus not good for color of title. And if the land was maiden land, not separate estate, no possession would avail against Hester Waldron or her heirs until after the death of her husband. McNeeley v. Oil Co., 52 W. Va. 617, 44 S. E. 508, 62 L. R. A. 562; Caperton v. Gregory, 11 Grat. 505. She has been under disability every moment since the sale, and her right is protected by section 3, ch. 104, Code, giving one, or those claiming under him, five years for suit after the end of disability.

I do not understand that it is contended in the brief that payment of taxes by Nighbert and his alienees and the failure of Waldrons to pay tax vest title in Nighbert by reason of forfeiture of Waldron's right for nonentry for taxes under section 3, art. 13, Const. If such is the meaning of the allegation of such payment by Nighbert and nonentry by Waldrons, it is not tenable. There has been no actual possession under the first and last clauses to apply them, and no claim under a grant from the state to apply the second clause. And, further, Sturm v. Fleming, 26 W. Va. 54, and Lynch v. Andrews, 25 W. Va. 751, and Hall v. Hall, 27 W. Va. 468, hold that taxes paid by a purchaser under a void decree inure to the former owner's benefit to prevent forfeiture by his non-entry for taxes. This is on the theory of identity of title and privity of estate.

Equity jurisdiction: I have shown above that the Waldrons have always been in actual possession. That gives them right to sue in equity to remove cloud. Smith v. O'Keefe, 43 W. Va. 172, 27 S. E. 353; Hogg's Eq. Princip. 81. Likely we may say they have jurisdiction to vacate a void decree.

As the money of Nighbert and those under his title paid just claims against Waldron and wife to pay costs of partition and taxes, the plaintiffs must do equity by refunding the same, with 6 per cent. per annum interest from proper dates, which shall be ascertained, and declared a lien on the 99 acres.

I believe it is not claimed that, though the sale and deed are void, the purchasers under Nighbert can be protected. They cannot be for these reasons: First. Their answer does not show that they are complete purchasers by payment of purchase money before notice of defect of title. Hogg's Eq. Proced. § 433. Second. They are not complete purchasers, because the legal title was outstanding in trustee Stratton, who was not a party to the suit in which Waldron's land was sold. Third. A purchaser from a purchaser under a decree void for want of jurisdiction is not a bona fide purchaser without notice. He is bound to know the want of jurisdiction. He is bound to know defects in papers showing his claim of title. Hoback v. Miller, 44 W. Va. 635, 29 S. E. 1014; 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 508; Wood v. Krebs, 30 Grat. 708; Williamson v. Jones, 43 W. Va. 562, 27 S. E. 411, 38 L. R. A. 694, 64 Am. St. Rep. 891. Code 1899, c. 132, § 8, does not protect a sale under a totally void decree. Title falls with its vacation. The title was never for a moment good; never existed.

Therefore it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed that the decree of the circuit court of Mingo county entered on the 21st day of February, 1901, be reversed; that the decrees entered in the case of M. H. Waldron and wife against Luemma Clark and others by the circuit court of Logan county on the 14th day of October, 1886, and 15th day of April, 1887, be vacated and annulled, and that the deed made under said decrees by H. C. Ragland, commissioner, to J. A. Nighbert, on record in the office of the clerk of the county court of Logan county in Deed Book J, page 341, be vacated and set aside, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned therein; and that the title or right of Thomas H. Harvey, S. S. Altizer, Nicie Nighbert, and G. F. Miller in the tract of 99 acres of land specified in said commissioner's deed be vacated, and held for naught as to the plaintiffs. The cause is remanded to the circuit court of Mingo county to ascertain the proper sum payable by Waldron and wife for costs and taxes as according to this opinion.

Reversed and remanded.

HAZELTINE v. KEENAN et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.

Feb. 9, 1904.)

NOTE—PAYEE—SALE—NOTICE—ATTORNEY'S LIEN.

1. A negotiable note is payable on its face to a payee, with the word "attorney" suffixed to his name; and he indorses it to a party, suffixing to his own name the word "attorney," in his signature to the indorsement. The note is owned by the payee and other parties. The word "attorney" indicates an interest in such other parties, and puts the purchaser upon inquiry as to their rights, and the right of the payee to sell the note.

2. An attorney's charging lien for his fee is confined to the judgment or fund recovered by him as attorney. His retaining lien on papers of his client for fees due him for general services depends on his possession of such papers, and ceases when he voluntarily parts with possession of them.

Dent, J., dissenting.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Petition by D. D. Hazeltine against L. H. Keenan and others. Decree for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Scott, Cobb & Maxwell, for appellants.
Harding & Harding and W. B. Maxwell, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. Hazeltine, L. H. Keenan, and Wilson together effected a sale to Patterson of some timber belonging to Caplinger, the price being $2,500, of which $2,000 was paid Caplinger by Patterson, and $500 was profit to Hazeltine, Keenan, and Wilson; and for this balance Patterson made two promissory notes, one for $200, and one for $300, purporting to be negotiable, payable on their faces to "L. H. Keenan, attorney." Before maturity of the notes, L. H. Keenan transferred one of them to his father, by an indorsement reading, "Transferred the within note to Thomas G. Keenan, L. H. Keenan, Atty.;" and the other he transferred to his brother by similar indorsement. Judgments were obtained on them in the names of indorsees against Patterson, and in two cases, of Ward and Brown, Trustees, v. Patterson, and Nalle v. Patterson, in Randolph, a joint decree was rendered, subjecting property to the payment of Patterson's debts. These judgments were decreed to be paid to said indorsees out of a fund in the hands of a trustee, realized by a sale of Patterson's property under the decree. After this decree, Hazeltine filed what is styled a "petition" in the cases, claiming that he was owner of one-third of the debt represented by said notes, and that their transfer by L. H. Keenan to his father and brother was invalid, and made to defraud said Hazeltine; that nothing was paid for such transfers, and at their date said indorsees well knew that the notes were not the property of L. H. Keenan, as their faces imported that they were the property of other parties, and only executed to Keenan as attorney. The petition asked that Hazeltine be paid out of the fund in the hands of the trustee under the control of the court one-third of said notes. A decree was made giving Hazeltine one-third of the amount of said notes, and from it T. J. Keenan and T. G. Keenan appeal.

The right of Hazeltine to one-third of the debt represented by the notes is clearly established by the evidence, as the circuit court found on the evidence. It is scarcely contested here. But appellants contend that they are bona fide holders for value of negotiable paper, and, no matter if Hazeltine had an interest in the notes, it is not good against them. The notes are payable to Keenan as attorney, and so they were indorsed by him. Does the word "attorney" detract from their negotiability? If it derogates from their currency or negotiability; if one buying them is by that word warned of rights of others, and is put on notice of their rights, and therefore cannot say he is a holder without notice of defect of right in the indorser—then the notes cannot be negotiable. In Third Nat. Bank v. Lange, 51 Md. 188, 84 Am. Rep. 304, a note payable to the order of one as "trustee" was held not negotiable. The court said the word "trustee" restricted its free circulation. But whether negotiable or not, the authorities say that when the word "trustee," "guardian," or any word suggesting rights in others, is upon a note, it puts a purchaser on inquiry, and he purchases subject to the just rights of others, and does not hold the place of an innocent purchaser. In the case just cited the court said: "In the case of the present note, it cannot be read understandingly without seeing upon its face that it is connected with a trust, and is part of a trust fund. It was the duty of the bank, before purchasing it, to have made inquiry into the right of the trustee to dispose of it"—and quoted from Story's Eq. § 400: "Whatever is sufficient to put a party on inquiry is, in equity, held to be good notice to bind him." In Shaw v. Spencer, 100 Mass. 382, 97 Am. Dec. 107, 1 Am. Rep. 115, a stock certificate was in the name of one as "trustee." The court said: "The rules of law are presumed to be known by all men, and they must govern themselves accordingly. The law holds that the insertion of the word 'trustee' after the name of stockholder does indicate and give notice of a trust." "Express notice is not indispensable. There may be evidence of the infirmity of the paper apparent on its face, or such indications as put the purchaser on inquiry." 1 Dan. Nego. Instru. § 795a. In section 271 that author says that the better opinion is that, though a fiduciary may pass good title, if the transfer is in execution of the trust, yet if there is suffixed to the payee's name "such words as 'trustee,' etc., they put the indorsee upon inquiry as to the title, and, if the transfer be in fraud of the trust, the indorsee must suffer the consequences." The words, "Agt. Glass Buildings," added to a signature to a check, are enough to put one receiving it in payment on inquiry as to the signer's authority to use the fund to pay his debt. Gerard v. McCormick (N. Y.) 29 N. E. 115, 14 L. R. A. 234. If the word "trustee" is on the face of the note, that compels the purchaser's "ascertaining whether the trustee has power to sell." Bank v. Lowney, 99 Tenn. 278, 42 S. W. 149, 38 L. R. A. 837, 63 Am. St. Rep. 830. The word "trustee" is notice of a trust, and calls for inquiry and examination. Marbury v. Ehlen, 72 Md. 206, 19 Atl. 648, 20 Am. St. Rep. 467, and note. An indorsement by "A. H., Syndic," put the purchaser upon notice. Nicholson v. Chapman, 1 La. Ann. 222, cited in 2 Randolph, Commercial Paper, §§ 1010, 1012, under the proposition that "where paper is held by a trustee or guardian, and this appears on its face, it will put the purchaser on inquiry as to the authority and title of such officer." "The fact that the instrument on its face is made payable to a person in his fiduciary capacity is notice that the payee is acting in such capacity, and that he can only give title or deal with such instrument for the benefit of the person whom he represents." Eat. & Gilb. on Commercial Paper, § 75, clause "d," p. 370. "Where a bill or note is indorsed by a person in an official capacity, as guardian, syndic, or trustee, the purchaser is put upon inquiry." 4 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. (2d Ed.) 305. An attorney, at law or in fact, is but an agent. He cannot sell his client's paper, especially, as did the party in this case, for his own private use. 3 Am. & Eng. Ency. L. 369. The party might collect from the debtor, but not sell.

An objection is made to the decree because the petition was filed after final decree, too late to file a petition or a bill of review. Of course, it is not a bill of review, as it is not filed by a party, and does not seek a reversal for law error or on new evidence. No matter what it calls itself. We look to its matter. The fund was in court. Is it possible that one claiming an interest in it could not petition the court to give it to him according to his right? How else could he get it? The fact that the fund was in court justifies what is usually termed a "petition," because it is an application to the court. In so far as the interests of the defendants are concerned, they were made parties, given the right to defend, and we may call it an original bill to overthrow or modify their rights under the decree. If it were to rehear on same matters, a stranger can come in by petition and ask a rehearing. Heermans v. Montague (Va.) 20 S. E. 899. But as it is on matter not in the record, I regard it a bill to affect the decree—an original bill to impeach or change a decree—and not too late.

As to the point that the decree does not fix out of which note Hazeltine should be paid: What has he to do with that? Both notes made one solid debt, as to him, in which he had an undivided share. He had right to payment out of the fund regardless of rights of appellants as between themselves. He did not have to settle their equities. Moreover, the indorsements of the two notes seem contemporaneous.

I will add, as pertinent to what is said a few lines back as to the contention that a petition does not lie in this case, because the decree is final, that the fund is in court, subject to its control. The design of Hazeltine is not to complain of the matters involved in the suit, and the decree on them, but merely to vary the decree as to the disposition of that fund; and he intervenes only to say that he has a share, though decreed in the name of Keenan, and begs the court to vary the decree as to the disposition of that fund. The Virginia case cited above is ample authority to justify the petition; but I will add that Story's Eq. Pl. §§ 429, 430, allow a bill not only to enforce a decree already rendered, but to modify or vary it. Keenan claims that Hazeltine agreed that the latter's share in this Patterson deal (so called in the case) should be applied to pay fees to Keenan as attorney in litigation of a firm called Hazeltine & Hall, and perhaps some litigation of Hazeltine individually. In the first place, whilst Keenan so swears, Hazeltine swears to just the opposite; and the circuit court has passed its verdict on conflicting evidence, and we cannot overrule that verdict. In the second place (and this is very important) Keenan's claims for such fees are of the most general, indefinite character. He files no specification to say what cases they were in which such fees arose, what cases were those of Hazeltine & Hall, what cases were those of Hazeltine alone, nor what were his fees in such cases, respectively. How can the court see whether Hazeltine's share in the fund in this case equals, is less, or greater than those fees? True, Keenan swears that Hazeltine agreed to apply his share on those fees, and that fees would still be left unpaid; but this is a general, indefinite statement. In the third place, Keenan wants to charge Hazeltine individually with fees against a firm. They would not be chargeable as a set-off without express agreement. The burden of proof for this is heavy on Keenan, and the evidence of man against man defeats it.

It has been suggested that, without evidence, the law itself gives Keenan a lien for those attorney's fees upon the fund. This lien cannot be supported. It cannot be what is called a "charging lien," because the notes constituting the fund were not recovered in a suit by Keenan, and for this reason he has no charging lien. Fowler v. Lewis, 36 W. Va. 113, 14 S. E. 447. But it is claimed that Keenan has another kind of lien as attorney; that is, a retaining lien, to secure all and any attorney's fees in any cases. To this a definite answer is given by Jones on Liens, § 128: "This lien is lost by the attorney's voluntary surrender of the papers to his client."

ent, for possession is indispensable to the lien. The lien is lost when the attorney has parted with the possession of the papers by his own act, even though this was a mistake on his part." This retaining lien is like the common-law lien discussed in Burrough v. Ely, 54 W. Va. —, 46 S. E. 371, of a sawyer on lumber sawed by him. The very life of the lien depends on the continued retention of the article, because the lien is, in terms and nature, a thing fastening itself on the very thing itself. In this case Keenan, by his own voluntary act, transferred these notes, and gave up possession of them.

Therefore we affirm the decree of the circuit court.

DENT, J. (dissenting). L. H. Keenan et al. appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Randolph county in favor of D. D. Hazeltine for the sum of $195.25 and costs, on a petition filed by him in the chancery cause of Ward, Trustee, et al. v. M. M. Patterson et al. The petition was filed after final decree, and sets out that the petitioner is entitled to one-third of the proceeds of two certain negotiable notes executed by M. M. Patterson to L. H. Keenan, attorney, and assigned by him to his father and brother, J. P. and L. H. Keenan, in violation of petitioner's rights, and without his knowledge and consent, for the purpose of defrauding him; that the assignees had taken a decree for the full amount of the notes; and prayed that he might be decreed the one-third thereof, and also $30 additional which one P. L. Wilson had left in L. H. Keenan's hands for the benefit of petitioner. The Keenans appeared, demurred, and filed their answers to the petition, in which they denied the fraud charged, and claimed the transaction was in good faith, with the knowledge and assent of the petitioner, who no longer had any interest in the notes, as he had consented that L. H. Keenan should apply the proceeds, when collected, on attorney's fees owed him by the petitioner individually and as a member of the firms of Hazeltine & Hall and Hazeltine & Erb, both of which firms and the petitioner were insolvent, and the amount due, being in excess of the amount claimed by Hazeltine, could not be realized otherwise than out of the same. The demurrer to the petition was overruled. This is alleged as error, first, because the petition was filed after a final decree ending the suit; second, because of ample remedy at law. As the fund was still under the control of the court, even after final decree, any claimant thereof, not a party to the original suit, had the right to intervene by petition for the purpose of settling the true right to the same. B. & O. R. Co. v. Vanderwerker, 33 W. Va. 191, 10 S. E. 280. The petition sets up a right to the fund, but it does not make out a clear case of attempted fraud. It admits that L. H. Keenan was entitled to receive the fund as an attorney, and it does not allege he was either insolvent or irresponsible, but leaves these matters to be inferred from the allegation of fraud. If disposed to be technical, the court might well hold that petitioner's remedy at law was full and adequate. The failure of an attorney to pay over money collected by him is a matter of legal, and not equitable, jurisdiction; and there can be no breach of trust on the part of an attorney authorized to collect a fund until he has actually received it, and refused to pay on demand, or within six months after receipt thereof, without good and sufficient reason. Section 11, chapter 119, Code 1899.

Waiving this question, and passing on to the merits of the controversy, it appears from the evidence, which is somewhat conflicting, that the fraud charged in the petition is wholly without foundation; that Hazeltine knew of the assignment of the notes made by L. H. Keenan, and was present, without making objection thereto, when the assignees obtained judgments on the notes; that Hazeltine & Erb and Hazeltine & Hall were indebted to L. H. Keenan for legal services rendered in an unsettled amount, which Keenan claims will much more than cover the amount in controversy; that Hazeltine individually was under obligation to pay these fees; and that Hazeltine and both the firms were insolvent. It is true that Hazeltine claims he is able and willing to pay these fees, when properly ascertained, yet, when interrogated as to the solvency of the firms, which necessarily involves the solvency of the individuals thereof, he refuses to answer. The proof otherwise in the case undoubtedly establishes insolvency. Partnership debts are both joint and several, and the individual partner and his property are liable for the payment thereof. Lee v. Hassett, 41 W. Va. 368, 23 S. E. 559; 2 Tuck. Bl. Com. 141; Courson v. Parker, 39 W. Va. 524, 20 S. E. 583. Such being the case, L. H. Keenan, without even the assent of Hazeltine, had a lien on the notes in controversy, as long as they were in his possession and control, to secure the payment of attorney's fees owed by Hazeltine individually or as a partner with some one else, as all partnership obligations are both joint and several. McCoy v. Jack, 47 W. Va. 201, 34 S. E. 991; 3 Am. & Eng. En. Law (2d Ed.) 454. A court of equity will not interfere to deprive an attorney of such lien, especially when the client has consented that the attorney should collect and disburse the proceeds of such notes, and when he would have the right to apply such proceeds to the payment of his fees. The notes, though assigned, are shown to be still under the control and in the custody of Keenan.

The petition in this case is in the nature of a bill for specific execution of a verbal arrangement regarding a pecuniary transaction, and, the petitioner having failed to show fraud, insolvency, or any other just cause for equitable interference, but it appearing that there exists a doubtful controversy as to the ownership of the fund, the parties should be remitted to their legal remedies. The only real question in controversy between the parties is the determination of the amount of the attorney's fees, and there appears to be a suit already pending for this purpose. The decree should therefore be reversed, and the petition dismissed, without prejudice to the legal rights of the parties.

Decree affirmed.

BELINGTON & N. R. CO. v. TOWN OF ALSTON.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia. Feb. 9, 1904.)

RAILROADS—ASSENT FROM TOWN COUNCIL—REPEAL—INJUNCTION.

1. Assent from town council to a railroad company authorizing the occupation of the streets of such town under section 10, c. 52, Code 1899, is not a franchise within the meaning of chapter 29, p. 82, Acts 1901.

2. An injunction is not the proper remedy to prevent the council of a town from repealing orders granting assent to the occupation of the streets of the town.

3. Where a railroad company has lawfully laid its track through the streets of a town, an injunction will lie to prevent the town authorities from tearing up or removing such track. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Barbour County; John Homer Holt, Judge.

Bill by the Belington & Northern Railroad Company against the town of Alston. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed in part.

W. B. Maxwell and J. B. Ware, for appellant. Fred O. Blue, for appellee.

DENT, J. The town of Alston appeals from a decree of the circuit court of Barbour county perpetuating an injunction awarded at the instance of the Belington & Northern Railroad Company inhibiting the officers of such town from repealing certain orders of the common council of said town granting the plaintiff a right of way through certain of its streets, and from tearing up and removing the tracks of the plaintiff, put down in pursuance of such right of way. Appellant insists that such orders are void, because the notice required by chapter 29, p. 82, Acts 1901, was not given before such orders were entered, and that by reason of their void character the appellant has the right to repeal them, and the right to tear up and destroy appellee's tracks as a nuisance.

The first and most important question presented in this case is as to whether the assent of the corporate authorities of a town to occupy its streets, required by section 10, c. 52, Code 1899, given to a railroad company, is a franchise within the meaning of chapter 29, p. 82, Acts 1901. The chapter consists of but one section, and is as follows: "No franchise shall hereafter be granted by the county court of any county, or other tribunal acting in lieu thereof, or by the council of any city, town or village incorporated under the laws of this state, where the application for such franchise has not been filed at least thirty days prior to the time when it is to be acted upon, by such county court or council, with the clerk of such court or council, and notice of such application, stating the object of such franchise, shall have been given by publication for thirty days in some newspaper of general circulation published in such county or city wherein such franchise is to be granted. Nor shall such franchise be granted within thirty days after the application has been filed, nor until an opportunity has been given any citizen or corporation interested in the granting or refusing of said franchise to be heard. Nor shall any franchise hereafter be granted by any county court, or other tribunal acting in lieu thereof, or by any council of any city, town or village incorporated under the laws of this state, for a longer term than fifty years; provided, however, that nothing in this act shall prevent the renewal of any such franchise for a term not exceeding fifty years, when the same shall have expired. No franchise hereafter granted for any longer term than fifty years shall be of any force or validity." A franchise is an incorporeal hereditament, and not the tangible property necessary in the exercise thereof. Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe, etc., R. Co., 11 Leigh, 78, 36 Am. Dec. 374; Bridgeport v. New York, etc., R. Co., 36 Conn. 286, 4 Am. Rep. 63. An action to test the authority of a railroad company to use a public street does not involve a franchise. Parlin v. Mills, 11 Ill. App. 396; Mills v. Parlin, 106 Ill. 60. Assent by a town to use of its streets by a railroad company is no more a franchise than the grant of a right of way through his lands by a landowner. C. C. R. Co. v. The People, etc., 73 Ill. 541. It is an easement in corporeal property, and not a franchise. 3 Elliott on R. Roads, § 632. The limitation in the act that no franchise shall be granted for a longer term than 50 years shows that it was not intended to apply to the assent of the council to the passage through its limits of a railroad or perpetual highway, whose franchises are without limit as to time. It would be a strange thing at the end of 50 years to see immense lines of railway cut into useless sections by reason of the authorities of the various villages, towns, and cities through which they pass refusing their assent to the continuance of its so-called "local franchise." Instead of being a franchise, its right of way through the streets is an easement, and the council's assent thereto is a license or grant thereof. Hence the act referred to does not govern or have any application to the plaintiff's rights acquired from the council. No notice thereof was necessary, and the orders of the council complained of are valid. Nor have the abutting property owners any right to object thereto. If their property is injured, but not taken, their remedy is to be had in an action for damages. Spencer v. Point Pleasant & O. R. R. Co., 23 W. Va. 406. The orders granting assent to the plaintiff being valid, gives plaintiff no right to enjoin the repeal thereof. The plaintiff would not be injured thereby.

The defendant's council is clothed with limited legislative, judicial, and executive or administrative functions under the supervision and control, when the rights of persons and property are involved, of the superior judicial tribunals of the state, without the necessity of an appeal to equity, unless irreparable injury is threatened and the legal remedies are inadequate. If the council improperly annulled its orders or ordinances assenting to the plaintiff's occupancy of its streets, the plaintiff could treat such annulment as void, or it could have the same reviewed and reversed by proper judicial method of review. If, however, the council should repeal such valid orders, and then threaten and undertake to tear up and destroy plaintiff's road, and eject it from the streets, the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, for such injury would be irreparable. 2 Elliott on Railroads, § 632; Easton, etc., Pass. Ry. Co. v. City of Easton, 133 Pa. 506, 19 Atl. 486, 19 Am. St. Rep. 658; Asheville St. Ry. Co. v. City of Asheville, 109 N. C. 688, 14 S. E. 316.

The decree complained of must be reversed and annulled in so far as it enjoins "the defendants, the town of Alston and the members of its common council and its mayor and recorder, from attempting to or repealing the said three orders or resolutions mentioned in plaintiff's bill," and in all other respects it is affirmed, with costs to the defendants, because their appeal was made necessary by the illegally excessive injunction obtained.

Reversed in part and affirmed in part.

BOSLEY v. BALTIMORE & O. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Feb. 9, 1904.)

CARRIERS—SHIPMENT OF CATTLE—DELAY—LIMITATION OF LIABILITY—VALIDITY —EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. B. shipped 24 head of cattle at Rollyson Station, in Braxton county, over the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, to Baltimore, Md. On the day of shipment, B. and the company made and signed a contract which, among other things, provided, "that in the event of any unusual delay or detention of said live stock, caused by the negligence of the said carrier, or its employees, or its connecting carriers, or their employees, or otherwise, the said shipper agrees to accept as full compensation for all loss or damage, sustained thereby, the amount actually expended by said shipper, in the purchase of food and water for the said stock while so detained."

Held, that the company cannot, by said contract, or any of the provisions thereof, exempt itself from any liability for loss or damage occasioned to the plaintiff which was in any degree caused by the negligence or misfeasance of itself or its servants.

2. On proof of a delay in the delivery of the cattle by the company at the place of their destination, a prima facie case was made out against it, and the burden of proof then rested upon it to show that it was not responsible for the delay; and the question as to the reasonableness and sufficiency of the excuse which the carrier made for the delay was for the jury.

3. Where a case has been fairly submitted to a jury, and a verdict fairly rendered, it ought not to be interfered with by the court, unless manifest wrong or injustice has been done, or unless the verdict is plainly not warranted by the evidence.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error to Circuit Court, Braxton County; W. G. Bennett, Judge.

Action by J. H. Bosley against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. E. Haymond, for plaintiff in error.
Dulin & Fox and Edward A. Brannon, for defendant in error.

MILLER, J. A civil action was commenced by J. H. Bosley, the defendant in error, before a justice of the peace within and for the county of Braxton, against the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Company, now plaintiff in error, for the recovery of money alleged to be due for damages for a wrong, in which action the plaintiff demanded judgment for $300, with interest and costs according to law. The demand of the plaintiff is based upon the alleged unreasonable delay by the defendant, which is claimed to be negligence, in the transportation of 24 head of cattle belonging to plaintiff from Rollyson Station, on said railroad, in the said county, and in the delivery thereof in the city of Baltimore, Md.—a distance stated in one of the briefs, and not denied, to be 870 miles. On the trial of the action before the justice, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the company for $10, with interest thereon from the 10th day of November, 1902, the date thereof, and costs. From this judgment the defendant company appealed to the circuit court, wherein, on the 1st day of May, 1903, upon a trial of the action on the appeal, the plaintiff recovered a judgment against the defendant company for $120, with interest thereon from that date until paid, and costs. On this trial the company excepted to various rulings of the court, and made its exceptions parts of the record.

The evidence, as certified, shows that on Monday, September 22, 1902, plaintiff shipped on defendant's railroad, at Rollyson Station, 24 head of cattle, to be delivered in Baltimore; that he put them in the cattle pens at that point near 8 o'clock that morning, to be loaded in the car; that the car with the cattle arrived over the road at Weston at 5:50, on the evening of the same day (a distance of 32 miles from Rollyson); that they left Weston at 9 p. m. the same day, and arrived at Clarksburg (a distance of 25 miles from Weston) at 11:45 p. m. the same day; that they left Clarksburg at 3:05 a. m. next day, and arrived at Grafton at 5:20 the same morning (a distance of 23 miles from Clarksburg); that they left Grafton at 11:20 a. m. the same day, and arrived at Cumberland, Md., at 8:05 the evening of the same day; that they left Cumberland at 11:45 p. m. that day, and arrived at Brunswick 6:15 a. m. next day; that they left Brunswick at 9:50 a. m. same day, and arrived at Baltimore at 3:50 p. m. on Wednesday, 11 hours and 50 minutes late. It is further proved that Wednesday is the stock market day at Baltimore, and that plaintiff's object was to have his cattle there in time for the Wednesday market of that week; that when the cattle arrived the market had closed; that the stock sales are made on the market from 7 a. m. until 1 p. m.; that the cattle had had neither food nor water from Monday morning until Wednesday evening, after they arrived in Baltimore, and that they were tired and almost worn out; that plaintiff then engaged a live stock dealer to sell them, who did sell them the same evening, but for a less price than they would have brought on the market. The dealer swears that he sold other cattle, about equal in quality, on the market the same day, for a quarter to three-eighths of a cent more on the pound. It is also shown that the cattle, when shipped, weighed about 27,700 pounds, and, when sold, about 24,000 pounds. Plaintiff swears that he was damaged $200 by injury to, and loss in the weight of, his cattle, and by reason of extra expenses for transportation of himself. Another witness puts the loss to the cattle at $125. There is evidence that plaintiff urged the railroad officials in charge of the train to permit him to unload and feed and water his cattle on the way, but that he was not allowed to do so; that he also urged those in charge of the transportation to send the cattle forward; that the train dispatcher at Grafton assured the shippers that they would be put into Baltimore at 6:30 Wednesday morning; and there is also evidence that officers of the company knew of the desire of plaintiff to reach the Wednesday market; but there is no proof of any special contract of the company that it would put the cattle in Baltimore in time for that or any other market. It is further shown by plaintiff that he is a shipper of stock; that he has had experience in shipping stock from Rollyson, Roanoke, and other points on the railroad; that his cattle should have reached Baltimore on Tuesday evening; that Tuesday would have been a reasonable time for the railroad to have put the cattle into Baltimore, and that another load of cattle shipped from Roanoke by him on Monday over defendant's road, put into the stock pens after the cattle in question were penned, reached Baltimore about 4 o'clock on Tuesday evening. Roanoke is shown to be 20 miles nearer to Clarksburg than is Rollyson, and on the same line of railroad. Plaintiff says it is the practice to load cattle at the points named, on Monday, to reach the Wednesday market in Baltimore, and that he always loaded on Monday to get the Baltimore market on Wednesday. It was proved by the defendant that the said cattle were taken from Rollyson on Monday by train No. 7 (a mixed train, but a first-class train, upon which passengers were carried); that it left Rollyson at 3:32 p. m.; that it is due at Weston at 5:20 p. m.; that a local freight leaves Rollyson at 2:25 p. m., but that No. 7 runs around it, before reaching Weston; that a passenger train passes Rollyson in the direction of Weston at 11:52 a. m.; that the regular stock trains on the main line passing Clarksburg and going east are No. 98, due at Clarksburg at 4:22 p. m., and No. 94, due at the same place at 12:40 a. m.; that the cattle in question were moved from Clarksburg to Grafton on No. 94, and were then sent east on No. 82, which was run as an extra from Grafton; there being no schedule for such trains from that point east. It is further shown by the defendant company that no train carrying stock passed Clarksburg, earlier than No. 94, after the said train from Weston arrived there with the cattle, and that No. 98 had passed Clarksburg before that time. It is further shown that at that particular time there was quite a congestion of freight, both in the yards and on the road, east of Clarksburg, and that it was difficult for even the passenger trains to get over the road, on account of it. Defendant's witness, an assistant trainmaster, testified that it was unusual to have a delay of stock for six hours at Grafton; that train No. 82, which took the stock from Grafton, should have left there at 5:42 p. m., and was due at Baltimore at 2:30 next day; that the "specials" were the regular freight trains, run on extra time; that there was no regular time for them; that they just keep out of the way of regular trains, and get in when they can. "We move these trains just as soon as we can get the engines to move them with." Lee Jack, a witness, states that he has shipped from south of Weston over the defendant's road for the Wednesday market at Baltimore; that he usually loaded his stock for that market day at Rollyson on Monday morning, to have it ready for the train which sometimes came along about 11, and sometimes about 2, o'clock; that he did this so as to connect with the train at Clarksburg; that stock loaded on Monday morning at 11 o'clock ought to get to Baltimore at any time from 5 p. m. on Tuesday until midnight; that if stock were loaded at Rollyson Station on Monday morning, which did not reach Baltimore until 3:50 Wednesday evening, that would be an unusual delay; that such delay would damage the stock; that, if the stock did not reach the Wednesday market, it would bring a less price, because there would be less buyers.

There is, in the record, as part of the evidence, a contract made between and signed by the defendant company and the plaintiff, bearing date on the 22d day of September, 1902, relating to the shipment, transportation, and delivery of said 24 head of cattle, which stipulates and agrees that said company had received said stock, for itself and on behalf of connecting carriers, for transportation, subject to the official tariffs, classifications, and rules of the said company, and upon the "following terms and conditions, which are admitted and accepted by the said shipper as just and reasonable, viz.: That said shipper or consignee is to pay freight thereon to the said carrier at the rate of 22c per 100 lbs. which is the lower published tariff rate based upon the express condition that the carrier assumes liability on the said live stock to the extent only of the following agreed valuation, upon which valuation is based the rate charged for the transportation of the said animals, and beyond which valuation neither the said carrier nor any connecting carrier shall be liable in any event whether the loss or damage occur through negligence of the said carrier or connecting carriers or their employees or otherwise. * * * If cattle or cows, not exceeding seventy-five dollars each. * * * That in the event of any unusual delay or detention of said live stock, caused by the negligence of the said carrier, or its employees, or its connecting carriers, or their employees, or otherwise, the said shipper agrees to accept as full compensation for all loss or damage sustained thereby the amount actually expended by said shipper, in the purchase of food and water for the said stock while so detained."

The case presents two principal questions: Was there such delay in the transportation and delivery of the cattle, under the circumstances, as amounts to negligence on the part of the defendant? If there was negligence, does the contract aforesaid between plaintiff and defendant release defendant from liability for all loss or damage sustained by the plaintiff thereby, except the amount actually expended by the plaintiff in the purchase of food and water for his cattle while so detained?

In McGraw v. B. & O. R. Co., 18 W. Va. 361, 41 Am. Rep. 696, it is held that, "when a common carrier undertakes to convey goods, the law implies a contract that they shall be carried and delivered at the place of destination safely and within a reasonable time. * * * What is 'reasonable time,' within which goods are to be delivered, cannot be defined by any general rule, but must depend upon the circumstances of each particular case." This is a well-considered case, and the conclusions reached therein by the court are supported by a great many decisions of other states. Elliott on Railroads, vol. 4, § 1483, says: "There is no fixed rule of law determining what will or will not constitute an unreasonable delay in all cases. The carrier is in all instances bound to use ordinary care and diligence to avoid unreasonable delay, but many elements must be taken into consideration in determining whether there was or was not unreasonable delay in the particular instance. The fact that there was unusual delay does not always show a breach of duty.

* * * Where the delay is an unusual one, and is not explained, it is held to be prima facie evidence of negligence, but that in a case where there is only a slight delay the rule is different."

During the trial, plaintiff was permitted to testify, over the objection of defendant, that the car load of cattle, the delay in the transportation of which, he claimed, occasioned the damages sought to be recovered in the action, reached the city of Baltimore (the place of destination) too late for the market on Wednesday, and that, by missing the market on that day, he was obliged to sell the cattle for less money than he would have gotten, had they reached their destination in time for the market. This evidence and objection thereto constitute defendant's bill of exception No. 1. It is true that there was no contract by the company with the plaintiff that the cattle should be delivered at Baltimore for Wednesday's market, or any other market; but there was evidence before the jury showing the time of the shipment of the cattle, and the delays in the delivery thereof in Baltimore, and also tending to prove that such delays were unusual and unreasonable, and that one of the results thereof, entering into plaintiff's damage, was the failure of the cattle to reach the Wednesday market. The evidence was admitted as tending to prove negligence, and as tending to show how the loss or damage to the plaintiff was a result of the alleged negligence. It was proper for the purpose, and it was not error to allow it.

Bill of exceptions No. 2 certifies that, after the plaintiff had introduced all of his evidence in chief on the trial of the case, and before the defendant had introduced any evidence, the defendant moved the court to exclude the evidence of the plaintiff from the jury; but the court overruled said motion, and refused to exclude said evidence, or any part thereof, from the jury, to which ruling the defendant excepted. The question whether the delay in the transportation to, and delivery of the cattle in, Baltimore, was reasonable or unreasonable, was one peculiarly for the jury. "The question as to what is a reasonable time for the transportation, and as to the reasonableness and sufficiency of the excuse which the carrier makes for delay, is for the jury." 6 Cyc. 449; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 247; Johnson v. Railroad Co., 25 W. Va. 571. By the statement of facts, it appears that the plaintiff had established, at the least, a prima facie case before the jury, when defendant made its motion to exclude plaintiff's evidence as aforesaid. "A motion by defendant to exclude the plaintiff's evidence upon the ground that it is not sufficient to warrant a verdict in his favor will not be granted if there be any evidence which tends in any degree, however slight, to prove the plaintiff's case. If it tends to prove the plaintiff's case in any degree whatever, the case cannot be withdrawn from the jury. The motion can never prevail or be sustained merely because the court may think the weight of evidence is against the plaintiff. Smith v. Parkersburg Co-operation Ass'n, 48 W. Va. 239, 37 S. E. 645; Carrico v. W. Va., C. & P. R. Co., 35 W. Va. 389, 14 S. E. 12; Ketterman v. Railroad Co., 48 W. Va. 606, 37 S. E. 683. We think the motion to exclude the plaintiff's evidence was properly refused.

After all of the evidence had been given to the jury, and before they retired to consider of their verdict, the defendant asked the court to give to the jury the following instructions, to wit:

"(1) The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action anything but the amount actually expended by him in the purchase of food and water for the stock while detained, if they believe it was detained by unusual delay in shipment.

"(2) The court instructs the jury that the contract of shipment between plaintiff and defendant dated September 22, 1902, read in evidence, is a valid and binding contract on both parties thereto, and the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action any damages against the defendant which he by the said contract agreed to waive.

"(3) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the stock of plaintiff was taken by defendant by first scheduled train passing after the cattle were loaded, and that, at the points at which changes of divisions and schedule occurred, the car containing the cattle was taken by first train scheduled for the purpose of moving stock after said cars arrived at such point, then the fact that the arrival of the cattle at destination was after the timescheduled for the arrival of the train carrying them is not of itself sufficient to establish negligence of the defendant.

"(4) The court instructs the jury that the defendant could not be bound to deliver the cattle of the plaintiff for any particular market unless it, by special contract, agreed to do so.

"(5) The court instructs the jury that, under the contract of shipment between the plaintiff and defendant, the plaintiff was required to load his cattle, and the defendant could not, under the evidence, be held responsible for delay in loading from cattle pens at Rollyson."

And the court gave to the jury said instructions Nos. 3 and 5, but refused to give Nos. 1, 2, and 4, to which ruling the defendant excepted.

The court also gave, at the instance of the plaintiff, the two following instructions:

"(2) The court instructs the jury that the defendant in this case could not lawfully stipulate by special contract or otherwise for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of itself or its servants; and if the jury believes from the evidence that there was an unreasonable delay in transporting the cattle referred to in this cause from Heater Station to the city of Baltimore by the defendant, and that such delay was caused by the negligence of the defendant or its servants, they should find for the plaintiff.

"(3) The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that there was such unreasonable delay on the part of the defendant or its servants in transporting said cattle to the city of Baltimore, they should find for the plaintiff; and, if they further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff was damaged by said delay, in assessing such damages they should take into consideration all damages naturally and proximately resulting from such delay."

To the giving of these instructions the defendant objected.

After the verdict was found by the jury, and before judgment was rendered thereon, the defendant moved the court to set it aside, and grant to defendant a new trial, on the ground that said verdict was contrary to the law and the evidence, and contrary to the instructions of the court, which motion was also overruled, and thereupon judgment was rendered in accordance with the verdict, and the defendant again excepted.

Rejected instruction No. 4 was properly refused, because there was no evidence in the case upon which to base it. It was not contended for, or attempted to be proved by plaintiff, that the defendant had agreed or was bound to deliver the cattle in Baltimore for any market. Carrico v. W. Va. C. & P. R. Co., supra. The instruction would have been misleading. As there was no special contract of delivery, the defendant was required by law to deliver the cattle in Baltimore in a reasonable time. The evidence tended to show that by a compliance with the law, the defendant could have delivered them there in time for the Wednesday market. If the evidence was sufficient to establish that fact—of which the jury were the sole judges—then the instruction would have been contrary to law.

Rejected instructions 1 and 2 offered by defendant, and said instructions 2 and 3 given at the instance of the plaintiff, involve the question of the legal effect of the contract, portions of which are hereinbefore set out, and will all be considered together. "A railroad carrier is liable for loss caused by unreasonable delay in transporting goods unless the delay is attributable to some cause which exonerates a common carrier from liability." Elliott on Railroads, vol. 4, § 1482. "The attempt, on the part of carriers, to limit their liability as against their own negligence or that of their servants, has been particularly persistent where the contract of transportation is with reference to live stock; but such limitations have been universally held ineffectual." 6 Cyc. 391, and cases there cited. "A carrier may contract with the owner of live stock against liability for losses arising from inherent nature, vice, or propensity of the animals themselves, but not from its own negligence in running its trains, or the like." Elliott on Railroads, supra, § 1511. "It is urged by the authorities in favor of the extension of the carrier's right to contract for a complete exemption from liability, that men must be permitted to make their own agreements, and that it is not a matter of public concern on what terms an individual consents to have his goods carried for him. But this argument, however plausible it may be made, is unsound, and has never received the sanction of the courts outside of one or two jurisdictions. It overlooks the inequality in the respective positions of the carrier and the shipper, and the advantage and quasi monopoly by the former. It leaves out of consideration the principle, now of universal recognition, that railroad and express companies are quasi public institutions, owing a duty to the public which they cannot avoid by private contract, and which public policy forbids they should escape. It is therefore held by the great weight of authority that a carrier cannot make a contract by which it is to be exempt from liability for any loss resulting from its own negligence or that of its servants. Such a contract is void, as being against public policy, and affords the carrier no protection." 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 307, 308; 6 Cyc. 392, and cases cited; also Parker v. Atlantic Coast Line R. R. Co. (N. C.) 45 S. E. 658; 3 Thomp. on Neg. § 3328. Some courts which have been inclined to recognize the validity of contracts relieving carriers from liability for negligence, have drawn a distinction between ordinary negligence and gross negligence, and have sustained exemptions so far as they did not exonerate the carrier from gross or willful neglect or fraud on his part or on the part of his servants. This assumed distinction is by the best authorities unequivocally repudiated, and all attempted exemptions from liability on account of negligence, whether gross or ordinary, are held to be ineffectual. 6 Cyc. 391. At page 388 of the same book it is said: "Outside of New York the current of authorities is almost unbroken that for reasons of public policy, carriers cannot exempt themselves by any contract, notice or stipulation from liability for the consequence of their own negligence." To the same effect generally have been the decisions of this court. In B. & O. R. R. v. Rathbone, 1 W. Va. 87, 88 Am. Dec. 664 (decided in 1865), it was, among other things, held that "it is competent for a common carrier to diminish and restrict his common-law liability by special contract; and he may absolve himself in this manner from all liability resulting from any degree of negligence, however gross (if it fall short of misfeasance or fraud), provided the terms and language of the contract are so clear and definite as to leave no doubt that such was the understanding and intention of the parties." In B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Skeels, 3 W. Va. 559 (decided in 1869), it is held that "common carriers may restrict their common-law liability by special contract." In the opinion it is said: "It seems well agreed that by express stipulation in the contract to that effect they may at least exonerate themselves from all liability that does not arise from the want of ordinary care and diligence on their part." In Maslin v. B. & O. R. R. Co., 14 W. Va. 180, 35 Am. Rep. 748 (decided in 1878), it is held that a railroad company is a common carrier of cattle, and "that a common carrier for hire by special contract, based on a valuable consideration, may exempt itself from loss or damage resulting from inevitable accident, though such accident was not the result of the act of God, or of the public enemy, provided the common carrier or its servants in no manner contributed to such accident; but it cannot exempt itself from loss or damage which has in any degree been caused by the negligence or misfeasance of itself or its servants." Judge Green, who delivered the exhaustive and masterly opinion in that case, says in part: "It seems to me highly unreasonable that a common carrier for hire should in any case be permitted by special contract to exempt himself from responsibility from losses arising from his own negligence. And it is no less unreasonable to permit him by special contract to exempt himself from losses which result from the carelessness or negligence of his servants; for the main object of the common law in making common carriers insurers was to secure the most exact diligence and fidelity on the part of the servants of the common carrier. As corporations can only act through servants, to hold that as common carriers they may, by special contract, exempt themselves from all liability for losses arising from the negligence of their servants, is really to hold that they may exempt themselves from all liability as common carriers. And as a very large portion of the transportation of the world is now carried on by railroad companies as common carriers, and as they almost always in the transportation between different places have practically a monopoly of the business, so that, if they insist that such special contracts be made, the passenger or shipper has practically no choice but to submit to entering into such special contracts, or to forego his journey or the sending off of his freight, the result would be practically the abolition of the whole law of common carriers, and all corporations would become substantially private carriers on their own terms, instead of common carriers, as designated by their charters. Indeed, they would not have placed on them even the responsibilities of private carriers, for neither they nor any other party ought to be permitted by special contract to avoid the responsibility of answering for losses the direct result of their own carelessness or negligence. Judge Redfield, in his work on Carriers and other Bailees, well says (section 156): "There is something very incongruous and not a little revolting to the common sense that a bailee for hire should be allowed to stipulate for exemption from the consequences of his negligence, ordinary or extraordinary. A laborer, domestic, or mechanic who should propose such a stipulation would be regarded as altogether unworthy of confidence in any respect; and the employer who would submit to such a condition must be reduced to extreme necessity, one would suppose." In Brown v. Adams Express Co., 15 W. Va. 812, it is again held that "a common carrier for hire by special contract based on a valuable consideration may exempt himself from his common-law responsibilities in some respects, but cannot exempt himself from loss or damage which may in any degree be caused by the negligence of himself or his servants." In the recent case of Beatty Lumber Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 52 W. Va. 412, 44 S. E. 310, Brannon, J., who delivered the opinion of the court, says: "It is a well-established rule that a common carrier cannot make any contract or stipulation with one dealing with it, by which it can screen itself from liability for loss arising from its negligence. This court recognizes this doctrine in Brown v. Adams Express Company, 15 W. Va. 812." See, also, Va. & Tenn. R. R. Co. v. Sayers, 26 Grat. 328. The later decisions of this court do not regard the case of B. & O. R. R. Co. v. Rathbone, supra, as the law of this state.

To demonstrate that such a contract as the one under consideration is both unreasonable and unjust, it is only necessary to make a practical application of it to the case before us. The plaintiff on Monday shipped 24 head of cattle, weighing at the time of shipment, as plaintiff testified, about 27,700 pounds. According to the evidence, if they had been transported and delivered at Baltimore without unreasonable delay, their drift would have been approximately 60 pounds per head, or 1,440 pounds, leaving 26,260 pounds to have been put upon the market. It is shown that the cattle, when sold on Wednesday evening, weighed 24,000 pounds, a loss of 3,700 pounds, instead of 1,440 pounds, the ordinary drift thereof had they been delivered without unusual delay.

Plaintiff swears that the cattle ought to have sold for five cents per pound, but did not bring so much, because of their bad condition, resulting from their long confinement on the trip without feed or water, and because upon their arrival in Baltimore the market had closed for the week, and the buyers were mostly gone to other markets. Plaintiff says the cattle sold for $4.35 per hundredweight. They brought in market, on that assumption, $1,044. They should have sold for $1,313; thus showing an actual loss of $269, not including the extra expenses to the shipper for himself while delayed, which he says were $10. The reduction on the freight conceded to the shipper by the company in consideration of the agreement is not shown by the contract, or otherwise in the case. As the freight on the car load of cattle, under the contract, was not a large sum—22 cents per hundredweight, making about $61—the part of the schedule tariff released to the shipper was probably not more than $15 or $20. The commission merchant who sold the cattle says that from the time they were shipped they ought to have arrived a day earlier, and that plaintiff was damaged by the heavy loss of weight on the cattle, and by the absence of buyers and their competition on the market.

The contract provides: "That in the event of any unusual delay or detention of said live stock, caused by the negligence of the said carrier, or its employes, or its connecting carriers, or their employers or otherwise, the said shipper agrees to accept as full compensation for all loss or damage sustained thereby, the amount actually expended by said shipper, in the purchase of food and water for the stock while so detained." In this case it has been ascertained and determined by the jury and trial court that by the unreasonable delay and negligence of defendant or its servants damage resulted to the plaintiff. It is proved that part of that damage was the result of the failure to feed and water the cattle on the trip; and that no opportunity was given to the plaintiff by the defendant company to either feed or water his cattle, although he asked permission of the person in charge of the train so to do, during the journey. Therefore plaintiff expended nothing for food or water, and under the agreement, if valid, the company was liable to pay him nothing, although his cattle were damaged by this neglect. Under the contract, according to its contention, the company may refuse permission to the shipper to feed and water his cattle, and thereby impair their condition, decrease and destroy their value, and then escape the payment of all damages; or it may delay the delivery, without limit of time, until the market be over, and the buyers gone, or until the condition of the cattle renders them of little or no value on the market; the measure of damage in such case being the amount actually expended by the shipper in the purchase of food and water for his stock if he has been granted an opportunity by the company to so expend any sum while so detained, and the consideration for such an arbitrary agreement and privilege being the small concession and release to the shipper on his freight. The company would be liable for such expenditure for feed and water in the absence of a special contract to the contrary. Elliott on Railroads, vol. 4, § 1553; Hutch. on Carriers, §§ 322-324. Thus, by its agreement, upon the small consideration aforesaid, to pay what the law would require it to pay in the absence of such agreement and the reduction in tariff, the defendant seeks to shield itself of all other damage to the shipper occasioned by all and every kind and degree of the negligence of itself and its servants. Zouch v. Ches. & Ohio Ry. Co., 36 W. Va. 524, 15 S. E. 185, 17 L. R. A. 116, has been mentioned as having some bearing upon the case before us. That was an action of trespass on the case, brought by Zouch against the railroad company claiming $175 damages for the loss of a horse delivered to the defendant as a common carrier, and which was alleged to have been killed by reason of the negligence of defendant. The facts in the case show that the actual cash value of the horse was $175; that the horse was killed, and never delivered to the consignee. The bill of lading or shipping contract contains the usual stipulations as to a reduced rate of freight and the clause agreeing that the shipper would not hold the carrier responsible in any manner for the care and safety of the stock, or of the persons traveling therewith, unless arising from fraud or gross negligence, as specified. The shipper further agreed, for the consideration of a lower freight rate, that he would in no event hold the carrier responsible for any loss, damage, or injury whatever to said stock which might occur beyond its own line, and in case of any loss or damage on its line for which the party of the first part might be responsible under the contract such responsibility should be and was thereby limited to $100. The circuit court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant for $175, and the case was brought to this court on a writ of error, wherein the judgment of the circuit court was reversed, this court holding that: "A common carrier may, by special agreement, just and reasonable in itself, and fairly made between it and the consignee of a horse at the time of shipment, fix the value of such horse, upon consideration that the rate of charges for transportation shall be commensurate with the value of the horse thus ascertained, and may also limit its liability in the case of loss to the amount thus agreed upon, even though the loss may be the result of negligence on the part of the carrier, provided said negligence be not gross, wanton, or willful; but it cannot wholly exempt itself from liability for loss resulting from negligence." There appears to have been some contrariety of opinion in that case. One of the judges concurring said, among other things: "If, however, to obtain a lower rate, he [the shipper] chose to enter into a fair contract limiting the liability, but not wholly exempting the carrier from liability for negligence, he is bound by his contract." It is not stated, however, to what extent the carrier may be thus exempted, or from what kind or degree of negligence he may in this way relieve himself. Another one of the judges dissented, and filed a vigorous opinion, supported by Railroad Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. Ed. 627, and other authorities, in which he fully discusses the question of the liabilities of common carriers. 4 Elliott on Railroads, § 1510, says: "The general rule is well established by the weight of modern authority, in accordance with reason, that a fair bona fide valuation of goods as a basis for the carrier's charges is binding upon the shipper, and that a valid contract may be made limiting the liability of the carrier to that sum, where it is supported by a sufficient consideration, such as a reduced rate of freight. There can be no question, we think, as to the justice of the rule as above stated. Where, however, the valuation is an arbitrary one, made by the carrier, or the latter thus seeks to escape liability for its own negligence beyond the amount fixed, and such amount is obviously much less than the true value of the goods, a different question arises." 6 Cyc. 400; Hutch. on Carriers, § 237. Zouch v. Ches. & Ohio Ry. Co., supra, is not applicable to this case, the main question therein decided being entirely different from the one under consideration here. There the court gave effect to the contract by which the parties beforehand had fixed the amount of money to be paid by the defendant to the owner of the horse upon the future loss thereof, if loss should afterward happen, instead of requiring the company to pay the full value of the horse as otherwise proved.

Upon reason and the great weight of the authority we hold that the defendant company cannot, in this case, by its contract, or any of the provisions thereof, exempt itself from any liability for loss or damage occasioned to the plaintiff which has in any degree been caused by the negligence or misfeasance of itself or its servants. It follows, therefore, that the court did not err in giving to the jury said instructions Nos. 2 and 3 asked for by plaintiff, nor in refusing to give to the jury instructions Nos. 1 and 2 asked for by defendant.

Is the judgment right upon the evidence? Did the defendant deliver the cattle at the place of destination safely, and within a reasonable time? An unusual delay in their delivery having been proved, it devolved upon the defendant to show that the delay was from a cause for which it was not responsible. "It seems, however, that on proof of a delay in delivery a prima facie case is made out against the carrier, and the burden of proof rests upon it to show that it was not responsible. It rests on the carrier for the additional reason that such facts are peculiarly within the knowledge of the carrier, and not easily ascertained by the shipper." 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 254; 2 Green. Ev. § 219; Parker v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (N. C.) 45 S. E. 659; Brown v. Express Co., supra; Hutch. on Carriers, § 766. The question as to what is a reasonable time for the transportation, and as to the reasonableness and sufficiency of the excuse which the carrier makes for delay, is for the jury. 6 Cyc. 449, and cases cited; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 270; Elliott on Railroads, vol. 4, § 1520; Hutch. on Carriers, § 843. It is the peculiar province of the jury to determine the credibility of the witnesses and to weigh the evidence, and a verdict will not be set aside merely because the court, if trying the question of fact, would have found differently. A verdict must be manifestly and palpably wrong to justify a new trial. 14 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 722. The weight of the evidence is for the jury, and, unless it plainly preponderates against the verdict, it will not be disturbed. Scott v. Ches. & Ohio Ry. Co., 43 W. Va. 484, 27 S. E. 211. Where a case has been fairly submitted to a jury, and a verdict fairly rendered, it ought not to be interfered with by the court, unless manifest wrong and injustice have been done, or unless the verdict is plainly not warranted by the evidence or facts proved. State v. Yates, 21 W. Va. 761; Miller v. Insurance Co., 12 W. Va. 116, 29 Am. Rep. 452; Grayson's Case, 6 Grat. 712; Smith v. N. & W. Ry. Co., 48 W. Va. 69, 35 S. E. 834. Where a motion for a new trial is on the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and the motion is denied, the opinion of the trial court is, on such point, entitled to great respect in the appellate court, which will grant such new trial only in case there has been a plain deviation from right and justice. Smith v. Parkersburg Co-operative Ass'n, 48 W. Va. 232, 37 S. E. 645; Sigler v. Beebe, 44 W. Va. 587, 30 S. E. 76.

The questions of fact involved in this case were fairly submitted to the jury, and a verdict fairly rendered thereon in favor of the plaintiff. The court also heard the evidence, refused to interfere with that verdict, and overruled the motion of defendant to set it aside. We are of opinion that the circuit court did not err in so refusing.

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, the judgment aforesaid is affirmed.

COFFEE et al. v. COFFEE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1904.)

WILL—REVOCATION—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A will cannot be revoked by mere declarations, made by the testator after the date of his will, indicating an intention on his part to revoke it, nor by such declarations made by him in connection with the execution of deeds conveying a portion of the property covered by the will. See Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3341-3345.

2. The evidence in the present case demanded a finding that there was no revocation of the will offered for probate; and, this being true, the errors, if any, committed by the trial judge in charging the jury as to this branch of the case, do not afford cause for a new trial.

3. No material error was committed in instructing the jury as to the law relating to the appointment of an administrator with the will annexed, and no reason appears for setting aside their verdict.

The petition also prayed that Wilkinson, the cashier, be required to account to the plaintiff, and for a judgment against him for damages on account of the levy. The grounds on which equitable interference was asked were that the debt to secure which the property levied on was conveyed to Wilkinson was infected with usury, and that the levy was grossly excessive. The plaintiff admitted that he owed an unpaid balance on his debt amounting to more than $400, but his petition contained no offer to do equity by paying into court the amount admitted to be due. The defendants demurred generally and specially. At the hearing, evidence was introduced on both sides, and the court "ordered that defendants be restrained and enjoined from proceeding to advertise and sell said property levied on, upon the ground that said levy is excessive. Further ordered that the defendants may dismiss said levy, and levy upon a sufficiency of said property and sell same to pay said execution, provided said levy shall not be excessive." The defendants excepted.

There can be no doubt that the judgment complained of was erroneous. Coming into court, as he did, with the admission of an unpaid indebtedness by him to Wilkinson, the plaintiff could only properly invoke the aid of equity after an offer to do equity and pay off that indebtedness. It is unnecessary to cite authority to sustain the well-established proposition that he was precluded by the judgment against him from setting up usury in the debt covered by those judgments. The court below seems to have based the judgment rendered on the sole ground that the levy was shown to have been excessive, but in the present case that furnished no reason for the grant of an injunction. We know of no provision of law by which a levy can be made on a part only of property which has been conveyed by deed to secure a debt. The contract between the parties, as well as the statute governing it, contemplates that the entire property pledged shall be liable for the payment of the debt. In Vickers v. Hawkins, 111 Ga. 120, 36 S. E. 493, it was held "that an execution in rem against certain specific property may properly be levied upon that property, and that the levy will not be void for excessiveness, though the value of the property be far greater than the amount of the execution." We would not be understood as holding that upon a sale under the levy it would be necessary to sell the entire property levied on. On the contrary, in a case like the present, where the property is easily susceptible of division, it would be the duty of the sheriff to expose it for sale in parcels, in such a way as to discharge the amount due on the executions with as little loss to the plaintiff in the present action as possible. This, however, is a matter not now before us. The judgment complained of was erroneous, and must be reversed.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

FUSSELL v. HEARD & FULLINGTON.

TROVER—EVIDENCE—VERDICT—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action of trover to recover personal property sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, part of the purchase price having been paid, and a note given for the remainder, which reserved title to the property in the seller, and which was not paid when due, a verdict finding "for plaintiff for full amount of note," $250 principal, and interest * * * at 8 per cent. per annum," will not be set aside as contrary to law; the finding being clearly authorized by the evidence.

2. The verdict was not for a greater amount than was warranted; the charge as to express and implied warranty was not open to the objection urged against it; and upon none of the grounds of the motion which were argued before this court should a new trial have been granted.

Error from Superior Court, Irwin County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by Heard & Fullington against W. B. Fussell. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

E. H. Williams, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Martin, for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. The motion for a new trial presents numerous points raised on the trial of the case in the court below, but in the argument here, which for the plaintiff in error was by brief, nearly all of these points were abandoned; and, under the well-settled practice of this court, they will not now be considered. This was an action of trover to recover certain live stock which it appeared had been sold by the plaintiffs to the defendant at an agreed price of $500; the defendant paying $250 in cash, and giving his note for the balance, in which title to the stock was reserved in the plaintiffs. The note was not paid. In the petition the value of the animals was alleged to be $275. The jury returned a verdict "for plaintiff for full amount of note, $250 principal, and interest from May 19, 1898, at 8 per cent. per annum." By consent the court passed an order which in effect amended the verdict so as to make the interest begin on June 19, instead of May 19, 1898; the order reciting that the last-named date was put in the verdict by mistake.

We have no hesitation in holding that the complaint in the motion for a new trial as to the form of the verdict is without merit. "When, in a trover suit for the recovery of personalty sold, of which the seller had reserved the title, and which had been partly paid for, the plaintiff elects to take a money verdict, the proper amount to be recovered is the unpaid balance of the purchase money, with interest thereon, embraced in one aggregate sum." Ross v. McDuffie, 91 Ga. 121, 16 S. E. 648 (3); O'Neill Mfg. Co. v. Woodley, 118 Ga. 114, 44 S. E. 980. It is true that in the present case the jury, in their verdict, did not combine the principal and interest of the note in a lump sum, and that interest was not recoverable eo nomine, but merely as damages for the conversion of the property; but the plain spirit of the law having been followed, and the verdict, in its substance, being exactly in accordance with the principle of law announced in the case above cited, a reasonable intendment will be given it, and a technical defect in its formal wording will not require the grant of a new trial.

There is no merit in the contention that the verdict was for a greater amount than the sum sued for. Strictly speaking, the suit was not for a sum of money at all, but for the possession of the property in dispute; and, the plaintiff having elected to take a money verdict, the measure of his recovery was, as before stated, the face of the note for the unpaid balance of the purchase price of the property, with interest thereon. The defendant, having relied on a plea of breach of warranty, cannot complain that the judge erred in charging on that subject, and this ground of the motion likewise discloses no reason for the grant of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

CITY OF ALBANY v. LYNCH.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)

MECHANIC'S LIEN—PUBLIC PROPERTY—JUDGMENT.

1. In this state a mechanic is not entitled to a lien for work done on property belonging to a municipal corporation, and used for public purposes.

2. In the absence of such a lien, the mechanic cannot recover a general judgment against the city for money due him by the contractor; there being no privity of contract between him and the city.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Dougherty County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by M. Lynch, Jr., against the city of Albany. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

D. F. Crosland, for plaintiff in error. J. T. Mann, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. Lynch brought suit in Dougherty superior court against Joyce and the city of Albany; the material allegations of his petition being, in brief, as follows: In March, 1901, the city of Albany contracted with Joyce to bore an artesian well on described property belonging to it, and in the city limits. The plaintiff, in turn, contracted with Joyce to work as a mechanic on the well at an agreed compensation of $4 per day, and, in compliance with his contract, did work thereon for 471 days, entitling him to $1,884. Joyce has paid him only $646.80, and refuses to pay the balance of $1,237.20 due. "Petitioner claims a lien on the aforesaid well and premises, and in compliance with the law did on the 1st day of October, 1902, within three months after the completion of the contract, file such lien in the office of the clerk of the superior court of [Dougherty] county." Joyce is insolvent. The city has appropriated sums sufficient to pay Joyce for boring the well, and is now indebted to him in a sum more than sufficient to pay plaintiff's claim against Joyce. Plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law by which he can recover the amount due him, and, unless Joyce is enjoined, he will collect the amount due him by the city, and leave plaintiff without recourse. The prayers of the petition were for (1) a temporary restraining order, directed to Joyce, enjoining him from collecting the amount due him by the city until the further order of the court; (2) a decree against defendants for principal and interest "on said principal due your petitioner as aforesaid"; and (3) process. The city demurred on the grounds, first, that, so far as the petition seeks to set up and claim a mechanic's lien, it cannot be maintained, because the artesian well referred to, and the premises on which it is situated, are public property used by the city for public purposes, and not subject to a mechanic's lien; and, second, that, so far as the petition seeks to recover a general judgment against the city, it sets forth no cause of action, because it affirmatively shows that there was no privity of contract between the city and the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was in no sense an employé of the city. The court overruled the demurrer, and the city excepted.

1. Although the petition contained no prayer for a foreclosure of the plaintiff's alleged lien against the property of the city, or for a special judgment against that property, it was treated by counsel for both the plaintiff and the city as a suit to foreclose such a lien; and we will therefore decide the case upon the questions made in the demurrer, and argued in the briefs of counsel in this court. So treating it, we are clear that the court below erred in not sustaining the demurrer to so much of the petition as sought to enforce a mechanic's lien on the municipal property. "There can be no mechanic's lien on public property, unless the statute creating such lien expressly so provides, since such a lien would be contrary to public policy, and would also be incapable of enforcement; public property not being subject to forced sale." Boisot on Mech. Liens, § 208. "It is clear that property owned by a municipal corporation, and used for public purposes, cannot be sold by virtue of an execution issued on a judgment rendered against the corporation. As one of the results of this general rule, there is no right to a mechanic's lien against such property." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 577. While we are not aware of any Georgia case directly involving the question whether or not public property of a city is subject to a mechan-

le's lien, the whole trend of the decisions of this court in cases of similar character supports the view that such a lien does not exist. Leake v. Lacey, 95 Ga. 747, 22 S. E. 655, 51 Am. St. Rep. 112, was a case where a creditor of a contractor sought to garnish a city, and subject to his debt an amount due the contractor by the city, the work for which the contractor was engaged having been completed. Mr. Justice Lumpkin, delivering the opinion, recognized a distinction between cases where garnishment was served upon the city pending the work being done for it, and those where the work had been completed, and all that remained to be done was the payment of the contractor, but added: "We are decidedly of the opinion that public policy forbids that a municipal corporation should be subjected to garnishment in any case where its indebtedness arose on account of the exercise by it of governmental functions, which include, of course, the prosecution of public works and improvements for the benefit of the body politic. It is not to the municipal authorities, after the work has been completed, a matter of the slightest concern to whom the money due for the work should be paid. The municipality has no interest in aiding a creditor to collect his debt, or in shielding the debtor from paying it; and therefore there is no reason why it should be drawn into litigation pending between these parties, but many good reasons why it should not." In Morgan v. Rust, 100 Ga. 346, 28 S. E. 419, a judgment creditor of a man to whom the county of Fulton was indebted in the sum of $500 for services as an expert accountant sought to require the county to pay that amount into the registry of the court, and to have it adjudged to be subject to the plaintiff's execution. In the headnote to that case the following language, which would seem to be decisive of the point now under consideration, was used: "The same public policy which exempts a county from the process of garnishment forbids that it should in any manner be interfered with in settling for necessary public work, even after the same has been completed."

2. In the absence of a right to a lien, it is, of course, apparent that the plaintiff could not, under the allegations of his petition, recover a general judgment against the city. There was no privity of contract between him and the city. He dealt alone with Joyce, and to Joyce he must look for the payment of this debt.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

HARRELL v. NICHOLSON.

GIFT—VALIDITY—DELIVERY.

1. The payee of a note, a short time before his death, sent for the maker, and directed him to look in a certain box in the house for the note, and to take it and keep it. Upon being informed that the note could not be found in the box, he told the maker to look in his private file at the bank, where he would find the note, and to keep it when he found it. The maker was unable to find the note at the bank or elsewhere. After the payee's death a third person found the note in the house, and turned it over to the administrator. Held, that the transaction did not constitute a gift; there being no actual delivery of the note to the maker, and nothing which the law would accept in lieu thereof.

Error from Superior Court, Stewart County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by S. J. Harrell, administrator of D. B. Harrell, against D. W. Nicholson. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Blalock & Cobb and B. F. Harrell & Son, for plaintiff in error. J. B. Hudson and E. A. Hawkins, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was an action by the administrator of D. B. Harrell against D. W. Nicholson upon a promissory note signed by the defendant, and made payable to D. B. Harrell. The only questions with which we find it necessary to deal arise out of a plea that the intestate, shortly before his death, gave the note to the defendant, intending thereby that the debt should be canceled. The plea set up that the intestate "canceled and surrendered" the note to the defendant in consideration of past services rendered by him, but that the note itself could not be found, though diligent search was made for it, at the request of the intestate, both at the bank where he kept some of his papers and at his home; that the intestate thought the note was at the bank, and instructed the defendant to go there and get it and keep it. There was evidence for the defendant to the effect that while the intestate was ill, and a short time before his death, he told the defendant to get his private box, and to look in it and get his note. Upon being told that the note could not be found in the box, the intestate told the defendant that the note would be found in his private file at the bank, and that he had intended taking it to defendant. The defendant afterwards looked through this private file, but could not find the note. Some months after the intestate's death the note was found in his house, and turned over to his administrator.

The evidence shows a gift inter vivos, if gift at all. There was nothing to show that the intestate intended the gift to be absolute only in the event of death, and hence it could not be a gift mortis causa. The distinction between the two will be found stated in Burt v. Andrews, 112 Ga. 466, 37 S. E. 726. This distinction is, however, unimportant in this case. All are agreed that, to constitute a gift, there must be a present intention to give, and this intention must be accompanied with delivery. Actual manual delivery is not essential in all cases. Constructive and symbolical delivery has been held to be sufficient under certain circumstances. If the property is bulky, and the present intention to give is clear, and the donee, as soon thereafter as practicable, reduces the property to possession, and exercises dominion over it, the gift will be upheld. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 1021, 1022; Thornton on Gifts, § 140. And it has been held that the delivery of a key to a chest or trunk is sufficient, if all the other elements are present. 14 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 1021, 1022; Thomas' Adm'r v. Lewis (Va.) 15 S. E. 889, 18 L. R. A. 170, 37 Am. St. Rep. 848. It has also been held that the gift was complete where the donor pointed out to the donee several places where money was buried; the donee afterwards going to the places thus indicated, digging up the treasure, and reducing it to possession. Waite v. Grubbe (Or.) 73 Pac. 206.

Our Code, which is but a codification of the common law on the subject, states the rule thus: "To constitute a valid gift, there must be the intention to give by the donor, acceptance by the donee, and delivery of the article given, or some act accepted by the law in lieu thereof." Civ. Code 1895, § 3564. There must be in every case a delivery of some sort—such a delivery as would put it beyond the power of the donor to revoke the gift. He must relinquish all dominion and control over it as owner, and part absolutely with the title. Evans v. Lipscomb, 31 Ga. 71 (3); Mims v. Ross, 42 Ga. 121 (2); Smith v. Peacock, 114 Ga. 691, 40 S. E. 757 (1), 88 Am. St. Rep. 53. In Burt v. Andrews, 112 Ga. 465, 37 S. E. 726, a woman, during her last illness, and a short time before her death, said to her sister: "There is the china washstand set, and you may have them." No actual delivery of the property was made, and after the owner's death her husband sold the articles. In a suit brought by the sister against the purchaser, the gift was held to have been incomplete. The rule as to delivery is not so strictly applied to transactions between members of a family living in the same house, the law in such cases accepting as a delivery acts which would not be so regarded if the transactions were between strangers living in different places. See Thorn. Gifts, § 169. Accordingly, in Moore v. Cline, 115 Ga. 405, 41 S. E. 614, a gift of a horse from a son to his mother was upheld, where it appeared that both lived in the same house, that there was but one horse lot on the place, that the horse remained in the stable, that no actual delivery of it ever took place, but that the mother accepted the gift, and exercised rights of ownership and control over the horse. The fact that the subject-matter of the gift may be lost or inaccessible at the time the intention to give is expressed can make no difference, if nothing equivalent to delivery takes place. Thornton on Gifts, §§ 140, 157. In Appeal of Horner, 2 Penny. 289, the payee and holder of promissory notes, a few days before his death, said to a third person that he did not want the maker to pay them. Within 48 hours of this time he sent for the maker to draw his will. He directed that the notes be deducted from an estimate of his personality, and told the maker that the notes were his, that they were in a drawer in another room, and that the key to the drawer was in a secretary in the room where he lay, and told him to get the notes. After the departure of the maker, the payee told his housekeeper that he had given the notes to the maker, naming him. Four or five days after his death, the maker took possession of the notes. It was held that there was no delivery of the notes sufficient to render the gift complete.

As title to a promissory note may pass by delivery, it needs no written assignment of a note to make a gift of it complete. But in this case no actual delivery of the note has been shown, and nothing which the law would accept in lieu of such delivery. Nothing more than a present intention to give was shown. The note was not found, and the gift was not completed. The defendant was told to get the note and keep it, but he never did this. He made an effort to do so, but the fact remains that he never exercised any dominion or control over the paper. The plea setting up the gift was bad in substance, in that it failed to aver with certainty a delivery of the note, actual, constructive, or symbolical; and the verdict, which merely found that this plea, which was bad in law, was true in fact, should have been set aside. See, in this connection, Crew v. Hutcheson, 115 Ga. 533, 534, 42 S. E. 16.

HAYGOOD v. HADEN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—RULE TO PAY MONEY—ASSOCIATE COUNSEL.

1. The right to enforce payment of money by rule is penal in its nature, and must be strictly construed.

2. The right to rule an attorney, for money alleged to be in his hands as such, depends upon the existence of the relation of attorney and client, and is limited to the client.

3. Associate counsel cannot by rule enforce a contract for the equal division of fees; and where a proceeding was brought by the defendant in error against the plaintiff in error, alleging that they were associate counsel, and seeking by rule to enforce such an agreement, a demurrer thereto should have been sustained.

4. In Smith v. Goode, 29 Ga. 185, there was no attempt to enforce the remedy now incorporated in Civ. Code 1895, § 4416; but the motion was ancillary to a bill then pending, to which the clients were parties, and amounted to the summary enforcement of the lien of attorneys against money of the client then in the hands of an officer of the court.

Error from Superior Court, Macon County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Petition by O. J. Haden for a rule on J. W. Haygood to show cause why he should not pay over certain money. From an order granting the writ, Haygood brings error. Reversed.

Haden brought a petition in Macon county, alleging that on the 26th of July, 1900, he delivered to Haygood a number of papers and documents in the matter of a claim of Wilson, involving certain real estate in Irwin county; that these papers were receipted for by Haygood as attorney at law, and received under an agreement between himself and Haygood that the fees in the case should be divided equally; that the suit was brought in Irwin county, and the plaintiff recovered; that Haygood collected the fees, and now has in his hands $300, being the portion belonging to plaintiff; and that demand has been made on Haygood, and payment thereof refused. Haden thereupon asked for a rule nisi calling upon Haygood to show cause why he should not pay over the money aforesaid, or, in default, be attached for contempt. Haygood demurred on the ground that the petition set out no cause of action, that the plaintiff's remedy was by action at law, and that the relation of attorney and client did not exist between plaintiff and defendant, and therefore defendant is not subject to a rule, there being no law authorizing one attorney to rule another attorney to determine a division of the fees. The judge overruled the demurrer, and Haygood excepted.

Eldridge Cutts, for plaintiff in error. O. J. Haden and J. A. Edwards, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. Attorneys who retain in their hands the money of their clients are liable to rule. Civ. Code 1895, § 4416. The remedy is penal in its nature, and must be strictly construed. Banks v. Cage, 1 How. (Miss.) 293. The right grows out of the relation of attorney and client, and the remedy is expressly limited to the client, not being available to the client's assignee. Nor can the attorney rule the client, though the latter has possession of the fund created by the counsel's services, and for which he has a lien. Whittle v. Newman, 34 Ga. 378. Nor is a rule intended as a means of enforcing the attorney's lien. Id. Here the proceeding was brought by one attorney against his associate for the purpose of compelling a division of the fee collected, there being between counsel an agreement that it should be equally divided. The client is not proceeding, and it is not alleged that the defendant "retained the money of the client," so as to bring the case within the terms of the Civil Code of 1895, § 4416. Nor is the case within the provisions of the Civil Code of 1895, § 4047, par. 4, that "every court has power to control, in the furtherance of justice, the conduct of its officers and all other persons connected with a judicial proceeding before it in every matter appertaining thereto." For here not only had the litigation ended, but the rule was instituted in the superior court of Macon county, whereas the suit in which the collection is alleged to have been made was prosecuted and terminated in Irwin county.

The only authority relied on by the defendant in error to support the proposition that one attorney can rule another for his fee is what was said in Smith v. Goode, 29 Ga. 185. That case was decided before the Code, and is apparently opposed to the ruling in Whittle v. Newman, 34 Ga. 377, in so far as it permits anything in the nature of a rule by the attorney against the client. But the facts there were essentially and materially different from those in this case. That was in a proceeding in equity still pending, and the motion was treated as ancillary to the main bill. The money was still the property of the client. The attorney holding the same had never refused to deliver the fund to the client or to the associate counsel. He was not in contempt, nor had he done any act warranting the summary and drastic remedy provided for by the Civil Code of 1895, § 4416. Nor did he resist the motion to distribute, nor the right of the associate thus to collect the fee. The clients were made parties, and alone made a defense. An analysis of the decision will show that the court, during the pendency of the bill in equity, in effect allowed the attorneys a speedy and summary enforcement of their liens on the fund raised by the litigation, and then in the

McGOWAN et al. v. BROOKS et al.

TRIAL—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. When this case was before this court at the March term, 1901, it was held that the evidence failed to disclose any facts in support of the plaintiffs' contention that they were entitled to invoke the doctrine of "conventional subrogation," as against the claim of prior lien asserted by the defendants, and for that reason a new trial was ordered. See, 39 S. E. 115, 113 Ga. 532, 537. When the new trial was had, the plaintiffs showed by uncontradicted evidence that there was, in point of fact, an express agreement which entitled them to the equitable relief for which they prayed. This being the only question involved, and the evidence demanding a finding in their favor, the trial judge properly directed a verdict against the defendants.

1. It is not apparent from the evidence that the main witness for the state in this case was an accomplice, and, if he were an accomplice, he was sufficiently corroborated by other evidence.

2. The refusal of the court below to rule out as evidence, on motion of the defendant, a paper purporting to be the statement of the accused before the coroner's jury, is not cause for a new trial; it appearing from a note made by the trial judge that defendant's counsel expressly consented to the admission of the paper when it was offered, and it not appearing that counsel acted under any misapprehension as to the nature or contents of the paper, or upon what ground the motion to rule it out was based.

PUBLIC ROAD—ALTERATION—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. The order or judgment of an ordinary, making or establishing an alteration in a public road, stands until set aside, and cannot be collaterally attacked in mandamus proceedings, under the act approved August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 41), to require the county officials having jurisdiction and supervision of public roads to put the road so altered in the condition required by that act.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Dooly County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Application of D. A. R. Crum for writ of mandamus against J. D. Hargrove, ordinary, and others. From a judgment denying the writ plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Crum & Jones, for plaintiff in error. J. T. Hill, for defendants in error.

FISH, P. J. Under the provisions of the act approved August 17, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 41), D. A. R. Crum applied to the judge of the superior courts of the Southwestern circuit for a mandamus against J. D. Hargrove, ordinary of Dooly county, and W. B. Matthews, B. B. Pound, and M. M. Doyle, road commissioners of the Cordele district of that county, and S. R. Bolton, road overseer for such district, to compel them to have a designated portion of a public road of that district worked "up to that standard now required by the existing laws of this state, embodied in sections 512, 513, and 533 of volume 1 of the Code of 1895, so that ordinary loads, with ordinary ease and facility," could be continuously hauled over that portion of such public road. The answer of the respondents was to the effect that the road in question had been altered upon the application of Crum, and that he, in order to get a favorable report from such road commissioners as to the public utility of the alteration, agreed with them to put the new portion to be made by the alteration in lawful condition, and that he,

for the purpose of procuring the order from the ordinary, making and establishing such alteration, made a similar agreement with him; that Crum failed to comply with his agreements, and that the condition of the road, of which he complained in his petition for mandamus, was due solely to the nonperformance of his agreements so made. There was a demurrer to the answer on the ground that it was immaterial and irrelevant. The case was submitted to the court by consent, to be decided upon the pleadings and the evidence. Both sides submitted affidavits. Those submitted by the defendants tended to prove the allegations in their answer; the commissioners deposing that they would not have recommended the alteration as being of public utility, and the ordinary that he would not have granted the order establishing the alteration, but for the agreements of Crum to put that portion of the road made by the alteration in lawful condition; the ordinary further deposing that the failure to embody such agreement in his order was due to an oversight. Crum, in his affidavit, said that he had agreed with the road commissioners before they made their report, and with the ordinary before the order was granted, that he, at his own expense, would open the new portion of the road made by the alteration, and put it "in reasonably passable condition," and that he had complied with such agreements. All the proceedings to have the alteration made in the road were in evidence. The report of the road commissioners, that the alteration would be of public utility, was in the usual form, except that the words "after applicant putting road in lawful condition" were added to the report. With this exception, all the proceedings were regular. The order or judgment of the ordinary making or establishing the alteration was absolute and unconditional. The judge refused to grant a mandamus absolute, and to this ruling Crum excepted.

Our Civil Code of 1895 states the doctrine, which is universally recognized, that "the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction can not be attacked in any other court for irregularity, but shall be taken and held as a valid judgment until it is reversed or set aside." Section 5368. And again: "A judgment that is void may be attacked in any court, and by anybody. In all other cases judgments can not be impeached collaterally but must be set aside by the court rendering them." Section 5373. Our Constitution (article 6, § 6, par. 2; Civ. Code 1895, § 5853) declares that "the courts of ordinary shall have such powers in relation to roads, bridges, * * * and other county matters as may be conferred on them by law." Civ. Code 1895, § 4233, provides: "The ordinary, when sitting for county purposes, has original and exclusive jurisdiction * * * in establishing, altering, or abolishing all roads, bridges, and ferries, in conformity to law." "The ordinary also has authority (1) to sit at any time as a court for county purposes and for the exercise of any power he possesses as a quasi corporation contra-distinguished from his power as a court." Section 4240. The Code also provides that proceedings before the ordinary, when sitting for county purposes, must be in writing; that he must keep a docket; that, when individuals are to be affected by any order or judgment of his, they shall have reasonable notice of the time and place of hearing; that he shall cause to be kept a minute of such proceedings; that he shall have power to punish for contempt under the same rules and regulations as are provided "for other courts"; and that amendments shall be allowed as provided "in other courts." Sections 4263 to 4268, inclusive. It is clear, therefore, under the Constitution and statutes above referred to, that the ordinary, when exercising his jurisdiction in the establishment and alteration of public roads, performs judicial functions, and is a court. The rule that a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be collaterally attacked in any other court for irregularity has been applied by many courts to the orders of county officers, exercising their statutory authority in proceedings for the laying out of a public highway or the location of a private way. See the authorities cited in 1 Freeman on Judgments, § 251, note 4; Elliott on Roads & Streets (2d Ed.) § 346, note 3, and note 1, page 358.

When the inferior court had jurisdiction of roads, it was held, in Nichols v. Sutton, 22 Ga. 371, "The inferior courts have power to make and alter roads, and when a road is once made or altered agreeably to law, * * * and the order or judgment of the court in respect thereto is unreversed, or not revoked according to law, the road so made or altered must stand established." In Sullivan v. Robbins, 109 Iowa, 235, 80 N. W. 340, it was held that the fact that one was induced, through fraud, to sign a petition to the county board for the vacation of a highway, was not cause for a collateral attack upon the action of the board in vacating the highway. We conclude that as the ordinary was clothed with original and exclusive jurisdiction, and exercised judicial powers and duties in relation to the matter of the alteration of the public road in question, his order or judgment making and establishing such alteration must stand until set aside, and that it could not be attacked upon the application for mandamus by showing that the applicant for the alteration had agreed to put the new portion of the road in lawful condition, and had failed to do so. It was not disputed that the condition of that portion of the road was not up to the standard required by the Political Code of 1895, §§ 512, 513, 533, so that ordinary loads, with ordinary ease and facility, could be continuously hauled over it. It follows that, under the provisions of the above-cited act of 1903, and the undisputed facts of the case, the court was bound to grant a mandamus absolute, and hence his refusal to do so was erroneous.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

HARTMAN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

VAGRANCY—EVIDENCE.

1. The evidence for the state was consistent with that for the accused, which made out a good defense, and the verdict finding her guilty should have been set aside on motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Columbus; J. L. Willis, Judge.

Angelina Hartman was convicted of vagrancy, and brings error. Reversed.

J. H. Lewis and A. W. Cozart, for plaintiff in error. Peter Preer, Sol., for the State.

CANDLER, J. Angelina Hartman was convicted in the city court of Columbus under an accusation charging her with vagrancy. The date named in the accusation was September 7, 1903, and three counts were laid, as follows: (1) That she led an idle, immoral, and profligate life, being able to work, and not working, and having no property to support her; (2) that she had no visible and known means of a fair, honest, and reputable livelihood, being able to work, and having no property to support her; and (3) that, having a fixed abode, and no visible property to support her, she lived by stealing, and by trading and bartering stolen property. There was no evidence whatever to sustain the last count, and it will be treated as having been abandoned by the state. Briefly stated, the material evidence introduced on the trial was as follows: The prosecutor testified that he saw the accused several times during every afternoon from the 1st to the 7th of September, 1903, and that whenever he saw her she was doing no work at all. He added, however, that he had no positive recollection of having seen her on the 1st, 2d, or 3d of September. He testified that she was a lewd woman, that she hung around saloons, and that he had seen her drinking beer in grocery stores. Of his own knowledge, he could not say whether the accused had any property to support her or not, but she had no visible and known means of a fair, honest, and reputable livelihood, that he knew of. Another witness testified that the house in which the accused lived had the reputation of being a lewd house, that she had seen men and women going into it at all hours of the day, and that it was the worst house she ever saw. Witness had seen her do some work, but since August 17, 1903 (the date of the approval of the Calvin amendment to the vagrancy law of this state), she had not done enough work to support her. This constituted the state's case. The accused proved by witnesses who were not impeached or contradicted that from July 17, 1903, up to the date of her arrest, she had been employed as a cook, receiving for her services 75 cents per week, and board for herself and her two children, and that between August 17, 1903, and September 7, 1903, she had also worked as a washerwoman.

What is known as the "Calvin Act" (Acts 1903, p. 46) is merely an amendment to the vagrancy laws of this state as they existed at the time of its passage, enlarging the definition of the term "vagrant," and prescribing a new method of apprehending and punishing such persons as come within its provisions. It will be observed that under both the old law and the amendment the gist of the offense of vagrancy is the failure or refusal of the offender to work when work is necessary to support himself or his family. As was said of the old law in Daniel v. State, 86 S. E. 293, 110 Ga. 916, so it may be said of the amendment: "The statute was enacted to prevent men able to work from idling and wandering about the community, and becoming drones or thieves or charges upon the public." Keeping a lewd house, drunkenness, and kindred vices, such as were proved against the accused in the court below, are made penal by other statutes covering each. It must be borne in mind that the accused was not tried under any such law, and that, to authorize her conviction on the charge of vagrancy, proof of immoral conduct alone will not suffice. It must appear that, having no visible and known means of a fair, honest, and reputable livelihood, and being able to support herself by means of her own labor, she failed to work, lived in idleness, and was, or threatened to become, a drone or a charge on the public. The evidence in this case fails to come within this rule. That introduced by the state was entirely consistent with that offered by the accused, which established the fact that the accused worked sufficiently to earn a support, however meager, for herself and her children. The conviction was therefore unwarranted by the evidence, and should have been set aside on motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

JENKINS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—CONFESSION.

1. Where, in the trial of a criminal case, a witness testifies that a confession was freely and voluntarily made to him by the accused, who was at the time under arrest, the evidence of the confession is admissible; and it is not incumbent on the state to show, as a condition precedent to the admission of the evidence, that such confession was not the result either of inducements or threats made by the officer having the accused in custody. Price v. State, 40 S. E. 1015, 114 Ga. 855.

2. The verdict was warranted by the evidence. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Colquitt County; R. G. Mitchell, Judge.

Jim Jenkins was convicted of murder, and brings error. Affirmed.

COBB, J. The accused was convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hanged. He complains of the action of the court in refusing him a new trial. The ruling in the first headnote disposes of the only special assignment of error. The evidence fully warranted the verdict. There is no reason for reversing the judgment.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—SEED COTTON—TRANSPORTATION—POLICE POWER.

1. It was within the province of the General Assembly of this state, in the exercise of its police powers, "to make it unlawful to transport seed-cotton in or from the county of Harris, or from one place to another in said county, between the hours of sunset and sunrise, except when carried from the field where picked to the place of storage on the premises of the owner, and to prescribe a penalty for the violation" of the act of October 24, 1887, wherein the legislative will as to this matter was declared. Acts 1886-87, p. 878. This act is not, as contended by the plaintiff in error, "unconstitutional, in that it was never submitted to a vote of the qualified voters of the county," or because it "is special legislation, and is opposed to and subversive of private rights," or for any other reason assigned in the demurrer to the accusation in this case.

CHASON v. ANDERSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 18, 1904.)

ERROR—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PARTIES—HUSBAND AND WIFE—APPLICATION OF PAYMENTS—NEW TRIAL.

1. The rule that all persons interested in sustaining the judgment complained of must be made parties to the bill of exceptions cannot apply to a person not a party to the case in the trial court.

2. A creditor of a husband and wife, respectively, who is paid money by the husband, with instructions to apply it to his debt, has a right to assume that the money belongs to the husband; and, even though the money in fact belongs to the wife, she cannot recover it, or have it applied to her debt, without showing that the creditor knew at the time of the payment that the money was hers.

3. If the creditor knew that the money was the wife's, it was his duty to apply it to her debt; and evidence that he had such notice is admissible in the trial of a proceeding arising under an affidavit of illegality filed by the wife, the sole ground of which was that the execution had been paid off and discharged.

4. Objections to the form of a judgment cannot properly be made in a ground of a motion for a new trial.

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by D. L. Bryant against Mason Anderson and Feriba Anderson. Judgment for plaintiff. Dio Chason, as transferee of the execution, sought to enforce it, and Feriba Anderson filed affidavit of illegality. Verdict of illegality, and Chason brings error. Reversed.

A. L. Townsend, for plaintiff in error. R. R. Terrell and Z. D. Harrison, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. An execution for $52.95, principal, was issued in favor of D. L. Bryant against the goods and chattels, lands and tenements, of Mason Anderson and Feriba Anderson. Chason, as transferee of the execution, was seeking to enforce it, when Feriba Anderson filed an affidavit of illegality, setting up that the execution had been paid off and discharged. The issue thus raised came on to be tried before a jury in the superior court, and a verdict in favor of the illegality was rendered. Chason filed a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and he excepted.

1. A motion was made to dismiss the writ of error on the ground that Mason Anderson was not made a party defendant in error to the bill of exceptions. Every party to a case in the trial court, who is interested in sustaining the judgment complained of, must be made a party defendant in error to the bill of exceptions, and be served with a copy thereof. Civ. Code 1895, § 5562. And failure to make such a person a party will result in a dismissal of the writ of error. United States Leather Company v. National Bank, 107 Ga. 263, 33 S. E. 31. If Mason Anderson had united with Feriba Anderson in filing the affidavit of illegality, the motion to dismiss would have been meritorious. We know of no law which required him to do this, even though the judgment and execution were issued against him and Feriba Anderson jointly. Not having been a party in the court below, Mason Anderson would not have been a proper party to the bill of exceptions. The motion to dismiss will therefore be overruled.

2. Mason Anderson was the husband of Feriba Anderson. He owed Chason a debt for land. He paid Chason $66.33, which Chason credited on the land debt. According to the testimony for the affiant in the illegality, this money belonged to her, and Mason Anderson requested Chason, at the time the money was paid, to apply it to the execution debt for which he and his wife were liable. Chason testified that he did not know the money belonged to Feriba Anderson, and that Mason Anderson requested that it be applied to his debt for the land. There was a sharp conflict between the parties on these points. The motion for a new trial complains of an extract from the charge of the court in the following language: "I charge you, gentlemen, that if you are satisfied from the evidence in this case that this money, at the time this receipt was given ($66 and something); satisfied that that was funds arising from the sale of Feriba Anderson's cotton; that it belonged to Feriba Anderson; that it was her instruction to her husband (her husband acting as her agent) to pay it on the execution against her in the hands of Mr. Chason, the plaintiff—then she would be entitled to a credit on that execution. Especially would this be true if the plaintiff received this money with the knowledge of the fact that it was money arising from the sale of cotton that belonged to Feriba Anderson. If he knew that it was her money, or had reason to suspect that it was money arising from the sale of her cotton, he would have no right to appropriate it to a debt due by her husband. She would be entitled to recover it back, and in this suit she would be entitled to have it credited on her debt." This charge was susceptible of the construction that if the money paid by Mason Anderson to Chason belonged to Feriba Anderson, and she instructed her husband to apply it to the execution debt, she would be entitled to a credit of the amount on the execution, without more. The use of the word "especially" in the charge indicates that the foregoing proposition would be true, but would simply be given additional weight if it should appear that Chason knew that the money belonged to the plaintiff in the illegality. So construed, the charge was clearly erroneous. Unless Chason knew the money belonged to Feriba Anderson, he had a right to presume that it was Mason Anderson's, and to apply it to his debt, if instructed by him so to do. The burden was on the wife to show that Chason had notice that the money belonged to her. Humphrey v. Copeland, 54 Ga. 543. The error thus committed was on a vital issue in the case, and a new trial should have been granted on account of it.

3. Complaint is also made in the motion for a new trial that the court erred in "submitting" to the jury at all the question as to whether Chason had notice that the money paid by Mason Anderson belonged to his wife, the only issue raised by the illegality being whether the execution had been paid off and discharged. Even if the assignment of error in this ground was sufficiently specific, we do not think it is meritorious. The issue thus submitted was pertinent to the general question whether the execution had been discharged. If Chason knew the money belonged to the wife, he could not apply it to Mason Anderson's debt, even though she consented to it. If he had such notice, he was, in law, bound to apply the money to the execution; and it was competent for the wife to show payment of the execution by showing that it was her money paid to Chason, and that he knew it.

4. Another ground of the motion complains of the form of the judgment entered up on the verdict. Such an objection cannot be made the ground of a motion for a new trial. Berry v. Clark, 117 Ga. 964, 44 S. E. 824 (4). Other than as above indicated, the assignments of error are without merit.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

COBB, J. 1. In three cases it has been held that the landlord's special lien for rent upon the crop raised upon the rented premises was for a debt so in the nature of the purchase money that it would be superior to an exemption set apart in such crop under the provisions of the Constitution of 1868. Davis v. Meyers, 41 Ga. 95; Tallaferro v. Pry, 41 Ga. 622; Harrell v. Fagan, 43 Ga. 339. Under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 2873, which is a codification of an act passed in 1874, property set apart under the statutory or short homestead law is made subject to "sale for the purchase money." The language of the act of 1874 is substantially that of the Constitution of 1868. The principles at the foundation of the decisions above cited would seem to be applicable in cases where the short homestead is involved.

GINN et al. v. CANNON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)
APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF CHANCELLOR —JURISDICTION—RESIDENT OF COUNTY.

1. In view of the language of the deed, it was necessary to resort to parol evidence to determine where the proposed strip was to begin and end, and where the bed of the track was to lie. The evidence on this subject was conflicting, and the case falls within the well-established rule that this court will not interfere with the chancellor's finding on disputed questions of fact.

2. There was sufficient evidence to sustain the finding that one of the defendants was subject to the jurisdiction of the superior court of Rabun county; it appearing that he was unmarried, had no fixed abode, and had been in Rabun county for 18 months. Under the Civil Code of 1895, § 1825, he could, as to third persons, be treated as a resident of the county in which he was temporarily domiciled.

Error from Superior Court, Rabun County; J. J. Kimsey, Judge.

Action by R. E. Cannon against Gus Ginn and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Cannon, in consideration of $1, and the benefits to accrue to him from the construction of the road, granted to the Tallulah Falls Railway, not an easement, but a defeasible fee, to a strip 100 feet wide. He contends that at the time he signed the deed there had been two surveys of the route—one east and the other west of his residence—and that he supposed the road would be over one or the other of these lines. The defendants insisted that at the time of the delivery of the deed the locating pegs had been staked on a line between the house and barn, and that Cannon well knew that such was the proposed line. The instrument itself defined the land conveyed as being "a strip * * * of the width of 100 feet; fifty feet each way from the center of the bed of the track which the said party of the second part is about to build on said land, from the point where said road enters said land to the point where it leaves the same."

J. J. Bowden and H. H. Dean, for plaintiffs in error. J. W. H. Underwood, W. S. Paris, W. A. Charters, and L. E. Bleckley, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. The petition for injunction was brought, not against the company claiming to be the owner of the strip, but against the persons actually engaged in the work of blasting and digging. Its deed, therefore, ought not to be construed in a case to which it is not a party, unless such construction is necessary to determine the question raised on the application for temporary injunction. It is enough to say that an inspection of the deed shows that it was necessary to resort to parol evidence to determine what land was conveyed, by fixing the point where the road was to enter and leave the land of Cannon, and also where the bed of the track was to lie. The evidence on this issue being conflicting, the case comes within the well-settled rule that this court will not interfere with the finding of the chancellor on disputed facts.

The same is true as to the finding that Ginn was a resident of Rabun county. While he claimed to live in Bartow, there was evidence that he was unmarried; that he had no fixed place of abode, and was engaged in a business which caused a frequent change of residence. It appeared that the partnership property had been returned for taxation in Rabun, and that Ginn for some reason was there charged on the books with a poll tax. This was sufficient to support a finding that he was a transient person, within the meaning of Civ. Code 1895, § 1825, and might, as to third persons, be deemed temporarily domiciled in Rabun county. Watson v. R. & D. R. Co., 91 Ga. 223, 18 S. E. 306.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

ROOKS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. It is error to give to the jury a charge not authorized by the evidence; and where, in a criminal case, the evidence introduced by the accused would, if believed by the jury, have warranted his acquittal, and the effect of such a charge was necessarily to give to the state the benefit of a theory to which it was not entitled, a new trial should result.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Jasper County; H. G. Lewis, Judge.

J. B. Rooks was convicted of homicide, and brings error. Reversed.

Greene F. Johnson, for plaintiff in error. J. E. Pottle, Sol. Gen., and Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. With one exception, we find no error in any of the rulings of the trial court of which complaint is made. The judgment overruling the motion for a new trial is reversed solely because of a charge of the court which is in the abstract perfectly sound, but which, in our opinion, was not adjusted to the evidence, and the tendency of which, under all the circumstances, was necessarily prejudicial to the accused.

The evidence in the record as to the immediate circumstances of the tragedy under investigation is very confused, and leaves much to conjecture. It appears that on the night of the homicide a party of negroes, including the accused, the deceased, and Mary Standifer, a woman who was described by some of the witnesses as the sister of the deceased, but by herself and others as his cousin, had been to church. Presumably their way home led along a railroad track in the vicinity. The accused and the deceased left the church in different groups of negroes, and proceeded up the railroad track, but whether the deceased preceded the accused, or vice versa, and what distance separated them in their walk, are matters which it is almost, if not quite, impossible to determine from the record. The accused became involved in a quarrel with Mary Standifer, and fired two shots at her without effect. Naturally, Mary ran. Shortly thereafter (how long, the record does not disclose) the accused shot and killed the deceased. The state introduced only one eyewitness to the homicide, who testified that at the time he was shot the deceased was running, but whether he was running towards or from the accused the witness did not state. There was not a line of evidence to show any connection, except in point of time, between the killing of the deceased and the firing of the shots at Mary Standifer, or to indicate that the deceased was killed while attempting to protect his sister, or cousin (whichever she was), from bodily harm. We therefore conclude that it was error for the court to give to the jury the following charge: "I charge you, under the law as applicable to the evidence in the case, that a prother has the right to protect his sister, and may justify any defense made by him for the purpose of protecting her life. In order to justify himself for a homicide in defense of his sister, it must not be for the purpose of avenging any wrong that had been perpetrated upon his sister. Apply this principle of law to the case. If you conclude from the evidence that the deceased made an assault upon the defendant for the purpose of protecting the life of this sister, and it was necessary for him to do so to save the life of his sister, he would be justified under the law; and what was justifiable on the part of the deceased in defending his sister cannot be legal provocation to the defendant, and would not justify him in taking the life of the deceased." Clearly, this charge gave to the state the benefit of a theory which was not authorized by the evidence, and the evidence of the guilt of the accused was not so convincing as that it can be said that the charge set out was harmless. While the state made out its case, the accused on his part introduced evidence which, if believed by the jury, would have authorized his acquittal. This being true, the error pointed out in the charge which has been quoted will require a reversal of the judgment overruling the motion for a new trial.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

Error from Superior Court, Lee County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by Meta Castellow against S. B. Brown and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. R. Williams and Shipp & Sheppard, for plaintiff in error. D. H. Pope & Son, for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. This was an action of complaint for land, a general demurrer to which was sustained in the court below. The plaintiff, besides excepting to the sustaining of the demurrer, also assigns error upon the refusal of the court to allow an amendment to her petition; but as the amendment was not set out in the bill of exceptions, and, being no part of the record, could not properly be brought up in the transcript, we cannot consider this assignment of error. Moore v. Guyton, 110 Ga. 330, 35 S. E. 339, and cases cited.

From the petition it appears that the plaintiff's father, Whitsett, at a date not definitely set out, made a deed to the land in dispute to his brother-in-law, Clegg, the sole purpose of the conveyance being to keep the land from being subjected to a judgment for alimony in an action then pending against Whitsett by his wife. The deed was entirely without consideration, and Whitsett remained in possession of the land until his death, at which time the plaintiff was a child. Clegg knew that the deed was fraudulent and void, and was a party to the fraud. Subsequently to the death of Whitsett, Clegg died, and his executrix sold the property to one of the defendants. An amendment to the petition, which was allowed, set up that Clegg took advantage of his relationship to Whitsett, and the very great influence which he exercised over him, and persuaded him to separate from his wife, "and immediately upon the separation he began to work upon the fears of the said John T. Whitsett, and, as said John T. Whitsett was young and inexperienced, and had no one else to advise with him, the said V. A. Clegg finally accomplished his desire, and upon his assurance that everything would be all right, and that as soon as any trouble that might arise on account of the contemplated divorce proceedings was ended the property would be reconveyed to him," said John T. Whitsett, being entirely under the influence of said V. A. Clegg, deeded the property [in dispute] to said V. A. Clegg."

We are clear that the petition set out no cause of action, and was properly dismissed on demurrer. The plaintiff sues as the heir of her father, and to sustain her action she must make such a case as would entitle him to recover the land if he were in life. The petition itself shows that the deed from Whitsett to Clegg was a fraudulent transaction, the purpose of which was to defeat a possible judgment against Whitsett. It is not made to appear that Whitsett was of unsound mind, or that such duress or influence was exerted upon him as to render the deed not his voluntary act. It is a fundamental principle of law that courts will not lend their aid to relieve a man from the consequences of his own fraudulent act. In a suit involving fraud, where the parties are in pari delicto, the policy of the law is to keep hands off and leave the litigants where it finds them. This subject was treated fully in the case of Parrott v. Baker, 82 Ga. 365, 9 S. E. 1068, which has been cited approvingly many times, and which is closely analogous to the case under consideration. Counsel for the plaintiff, however, seek to differentiate the present case from the line of authorities announcing the principle to which we have referred, on the idea that, under the allegations of the petition in this case, there was not only an entire lack of consideration for the deed, but the grantor remained in possession of the land up to the time of his death; and several Georgia cases are cited in support of the contention that, for the reason stated, this case does not come within the rule. The cases cited, in our opinion, do not sustain this view. We are at a loss to understand how, as a matter of reason, the fact that an executed contract, admittedly fraudulent, was without consideration can affect the rule that, the parties being in pari delicto, the law will not relieve against its operation. The same may be said of the possession of the grantor, except that, as was held in Harrison v. Hatcher, 44 Ga. 638, if he had been sued in ejectment by the grantee, he might have defended by showing that the deed was fraudulent. This is in entire harmony with the rule laid down in Parrott v. Baker, supra, and with the general scheme of the law that the machinery of the courts will not be used to aid in the consummation of a fraudulent design. In this case, after the death of Whitsett, possession of the land went into other hands, and his heir and privy in estate cannot now come into court and obtain relief against his fraud.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

KING v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—NEW TRIAL—APPEAL.

1. This court will not control the discretion of the trial judge in overruling a ground of a motion for a new trial, alleging that one of the jurors who tried the case was a resident of a county other than the one in which the trial was had, when the affidavits offered in support of the motion were contradicted by affidavits offered by the state, averring distinctly that the juror was, at the time of the trial, a resident of the county in which the trial was had.

2. The evidence was amply sufficient to warrant the verdict.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Madison County; H. M. Holden, Judge.

Cap King was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. F. L. Bond, for plaintiff in error. D. W. Meadow, Sol. Gen., for the State.

COBB, J. King was tried and convicted, in Madison county, for the offense of pointing a pistol at another. The only special ground of his motion for a new trial set up that Pittman, one of the jurors, was a resident of Jackson county at the time of the trial. Several affidavits were offered in support of the averment made in this ground. The state offered, by way of counter showing, two affidavits of the juror, in which he averred distinctly and unequivocally that he resided in Madison county at the time the trial was had. Under these circumstances this court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in overruling this ground of the motion. The rule is similar to that followed by this court in cases where the verdict is sought to be set aside on account of the disqualification of a juror for any other reason. See Jones v. State, 117 Ga. 710, 44 S. E. 877 (4); Perry v. State, 117 Ga. 719, 45 S. E. 77 (2). There was ample evidence to warrant the verdict, and the general grounds of the motion are therefore without merit.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

JOHNSON v. STATE.(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)
CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—REVIEW—NEW TRIAL.

1. The circumstantial evidence having been sufficient to justify the judgment of conviction, and the trial judge, after a re-examination of the evidence, having declined to grant the motion for a new trial, this court will not control his discretion.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Moultrie; W. A. Covington, Judge.

Luke Johnson was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. A. Wilkes, for plaintiff in error. T. W. Mattox, for the State.

COBB, J. The accused was convicted of the offense of adultery and fornication. His motion for a new trial is based upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence; the special assignment under this general complaint being that, while the evidence may have justified a finding that the accused and the woman were living in a state of adultery and fornication, it did not show that any specific carnal act had been committed between them. A witness for the state testified that the accused was married and the woman was unmarried; that on three different occasions within the year in which the accusation was brought the witness went to the house where the accused was living, knocked at the door, when the accused came to the door in his night clothes, opened it, and went back to bed; that the woman was in bed with the accused, both being covered up; that the last time when this occurred was early in the morning; that there was only one bed in the room; that no carnal act was committed in the presence of the witness. The witness admitted that he was at enmity with the accused, and was anxious for him to be convicted.

Notwithstanding this admission, the credibility of this witness' testimony was for the trial judge, who presided without a jury. Specific acts of sexual intercourse may be proved by circumstantial evidence. If direct evidence was required, it would be almost impossible to make out the offense. All that the law requires is that the evidence be such as to justify the inference, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the carnal act has been committed. If the testimony above abstracted was true, it came within this rule, and authorized the judgment of conviction. See State v. Austin (N. C.) 13 S. E. 219; State v. Ean (Iowa) 58 N. W. 898; Com. v. Mosler (Pa.) 19 Atl. 943 (4); Com. v. Clifford (Mass.) 13 N. E. 345 (1); Blackman v. State, 36 Ala. 295. The facts above set forth are stronger than those in Elridge v. State, 97 Ga. 192, 23 S. E. 832, and Starke v. State, 97 Ga. 193, 23

S. E. 832, in which cases a majority of the court upheld the conviction. The circumstances proved in Weaver v. State, 74 Ga. 376, and in Weems v. State, 84 Ga. 461, 11 S. E. 501, and especially in the former, did not afford such strong evidence of guilt as those in the present case. In both of those cases the conviction was set aside. In Lawson v. State, 116 Ga. 571, 42 S. E. 752, it was held that, under an accusation charging the offense of living in a state of adultery, mere proof of a single act of adultery would not be sufficient to convict. Counsel for the plaintiff in error in the present case draws from this decision the conclusion that, under an accusation for the specific act, proof of living together in a state of unlawful sexual intercourse would be insufficient. This reasoning is not sound. The greater includes the less, but the less does not include the greater. It is also argued that the testimony for the accused was sufficient to rebut the presumption of guilt arising from the evidence for the state. A physician testified that the accused was and had been for some time afflicted with tertiary syphilis, and that sexual intercourse by a man afflicted as the accused was would be very painful. He testified, however, that he would not say a man in this condition was unable to have sexual intercourse. The judge, who tried the case without a jury, was of opinion that the case was made out by the evidence for the state, and that the evidence for the accused was not sufficient to overcome the presumption arising therefrom. All these were questions for his determination, and, if he made an error in reaching this conclusion, he had an opportunity to correct it when the motion for a new trial was heard. Having, upon a re-examination of the evidence, approved the judgment of conviction, we cannot say that he has abused his discretion.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

ARMITAGE-HERSCHELL CO. v. MUSCOGEE REAL ESTATE CO.(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1904.)
CHattel MORTGAGE—FAILURE TO RECORD—PRIORITIES.

1. A mortgage executed in another state on personality subsequently brought into this state, but not recorded, in the county where the property is brought, within the six months provided by Civ. Code 1895, § 2728, is postponed to a purchase of the same property made in good faith, and without notice, under the foreclosure of a duly recorded junior mortgage, although the purchase was made before the expiration of the six months allowed by law for the senior mortgagee to record his incumbrance. Hubbard v. Andrews, 76 Ga. 177, and Peterson v. Kaigler, 3 S. E. 655, 78 Ga. 464, distinguished.

Error from Superior Court, Muscogee County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Action by the Armitage-Herschell Company against the Muscogee Real Estate Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and both parties bring error. Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed, and on cross-bill dismissed.

Charlton E. Battle, for plaintiff in error.
L. F. Garrard, Frank Garrard, and Cecil Neill, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. The plaintiff below was the holder of a mortgage executed in New York on personalty which was subsequently removed to Georgia, where it was again mortgaged. The Georgia mortgage was promptly recorded. The New York mortgage was not recorded within the six months allowed by Civ. Code 1895, § 2726, for the record of mortgages on personalty outside this state which is afterwards brought in the state. Before the expiration of six months after the property was brought into Georgia, the Georgia mortgage was foreclosed, and the property was bought at the execution sale by the defendant without notice of the existence of the New York mortgage. The New York law provides that a mortgage shall convey title, and the plaintiff accordingly brought trover to recover the property. The trial judge directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff excepted. The defendant filed a cross-bill of exceptions, complaining of certain rulings on the admission of evidence.

The effect of the statute prescribing a time limit for the recording of instruments is that, if the instrument is recorded within that time, the record, and consequently the notice imported thereby, relates back to the time of the execution of the instrument. Record after the expiration of that time will not be invalid, but it is only notice from the time when the record is made, and does not relate back to the time of execution. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 96, 97; Anderson v. Dugas, 29 Ga. 442. Civ. Code 1895, § 2727, provides that mortgages not recorded within the time required remain valid as against the mortgagor, but are postponed to all other liens, created or obtained, or purchases made prior to the actual record of the mortgage. See, also, Toomer v. Dickerson, 37 Ga. 437; Wise v. Mitchell, 100 Ga. 614, 28 S. E. 382; Lytle v. Black, 107 Ga. 388, 33 S. E. 414; White v. Interstate B. & L. Ass'n, 106 Ga. 146, 32 S. E. 26. It would seem, therefore, that the failure of the plaintiff to record its mortgage in Georgia within six months after the time it was brought within the state was fatal to its claim against the defendant, which, while it bought within the six months period referred to, bought in good faith, and without any notice of a prior incumbrance on the property. Had the plaintiff recorded its mortgage within the six-month period, the notice implied by the record would have related back to the execution of the instrument, antedating the purchase by the defendant, and it would have of necessity pre-valled in the present action. This, however, was not done; record notice was not given until long after the six-month period had elapsed; and the defendant is therefore protected as an innocent purchaser without notice.

The two cases of Hubbard v. Andrews, 76 Ga. 177, and Peterson v. Kaigler, 78 Ga. 464, 3 S. E. 655, cited and confidently relied on by counsel for the plaintiff in error, seem at first blush to hold contrary to what is laid down in the foregoing, but a closer examination of them discloses that the conflict is more apparent than real. In Hubbard v. Andrews it was held that "where a mortgage on personal property was regularly made and recorded in another state, and, the property having been brought into this state, the mortgagee followed it and foreclosed his mortgage in the county where the property was found, and caused it to be levied, which was done before the expiration of the time allowed for the registry of such a mortgage in this state, the foreclosure was valid as against a bona fide purchaser of the property without notice of the incumbrance, although the mortgage was not recorded in this state until after its foreclosure." It appeared, however, that the foreign mortgage was foreclosed in this state within less than 10 days after the property was brought in the state; and the effect of the decision rendered is nothing more or less than that such an assertion of the creditor's rights within the six-month period dispensed with the necessity of giving record notice of the existence of his mortgage. Such a state of facts is not presented by the record now before us. Peterson v. Kaigler is very similar in its facts to Hubbard v. Andrews, and rests squarely upon the decision in that case; but, even if that were not so, it was decided by only two justices, and of itself is not binding in this court. It will thus be seen that the peculiar circumstances of those cases take them out of the rule of law applicable to the case now under consideration. Under the facts as presented by the record, no other verdict than one for the defendant would have been authorized by law, and it was accordingly not error for the court to so direct.

As the judgment on the main bill of exceptions is affirmed, the cross-bill will, in accordance with the usual practice, be dismissed.

Judgment on main bill of exceptions affirmed; cross-bill dismissed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

COLUMBUS R. CO. v. DORSEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. 13, 1904.)

NEGLIGENCE—ELECTRIC LIGHT WIRE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. Where a lineman of a telephone company, of experience, aged 19 years, was killed by contact with a wire of an electric lighting company, which had been strung on the poles of the telephone company, and from which wire the insulation had worn off near the pole which he had climbed, and for several feet on each side of the pole—he knowing, or being able to know by ordinary diligence, that the wire was so exposed—his mother cannot recover from the electric lighting company the value of his life.

Error from City Court of Columbus; J. L. Willis, Judge.

Action by Susie Dorsey against the Columbus Railroad Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

L. F. & Frank Garrard, J. H. Martin, and Cecil Neill, for plaintiff in error. W. R. Hammond and John D. Little, for defendant in error.

TURNER, J. Mrs. Dorsey brought a suit against the Columbus Railroad Company, a corporation having its principal office in the city of Columbus, alleging that the defendant had injured and damaged her in a large sum. Her petition, as amended at the trial, set forth averments to the following effect: The defendant was the owner of an electric lighting system in the city of Columbus, and was operating an electric lighting plant. In the operation of its business, on a day named, the defendant was engaged in manufacturing and generating currents of electricity, and transmitting them along wires strung upon poles in that city, which currents were of sufficient strength to be dangerous to human life. On said day a son of the plaintiff was in the employ of the Southern Bell Telephone & Telegraph Company, and was performing the duties of a lineman for said last-named company. As such lineman, he ascended one of the poles of the telephone company for the purpose of performing some duty in connection with the stringing of the wires of that company on said pole, or fastening a crossbeam for said purposes; and while in the performance of his duty he came in contact with one of the wires of the defendant, which was charged with electricity, and, by reason of said contact, received a heavy and dangerous charge of electricity through his body, by means of which he was instantly killed. Plaintiff's son was acting with proper prudence and precaution, and was without fault on his part in coming in contact with said wire. This wire which was charged with the current of electricity which caused his death was the property of the said defendant, and was in use by said defendant at the time in the transmission of one of its currents of electricity in the transaction of its business; and the same was, or should have been, an insulated wire, but the insulation of the wire had become worn off at a point near the pole, and for several feet on either side of the same, so as to leave said wire exposed, and making it dangerous at that point. The defendant was negligent in allowing the insulation of said wire to be worn off, and said wire to remain exposed, so that a person climbing said pole would be in danger of coming in contact with an exposed wire heavily charged with a dangerous current of electricity. Said wire of the defendant was strung upon the pole of said telephone company with the consent of said telephone company, and it was the duty of the defendant to protect said wire so that the operatives of the telephone company, whose duties it was to ascend the poles of said company in and about their duties in connection with their work for it, would not be exposed to the danger of coming in contact with a wire heavily and dangerously charged with electricity, and the defendant was negligent in not doing so. The plaintiff further alleged in her petition that she had been dependent upon her son for a support, and that he had, at and before the time of his death, contributed to her support; that he left neither wife nor children, never having been married; and that at and before his death he was able to earn, and did earn, the sum of $2 per day.

To this petition the defendant demurred generally, on the ground that no cause of action was therein set forth, and also demurred specially because (1) the plaintiff did not allege that the defendant company strung its wire upon the pole of the telephone company, or that it was strung on its pole, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant company; and (2) because the plaintiff did not aver that her son did not know of the fact that said wire was attached to the pole of the telephone company, and had become defective by reason of the insulation being worn off.

The court below overruled these several demurrers, and the defendant excepted. In the argument upon these demurrers before this court, it was conceded by counsel for the defendant in error that it was to be presumed that this unfortunate lineman did know that the wire of the plaintiff in error was strung upon the pole of the telephone company, and that he also knew that at or near this pole, and for several feet on each side of it, the wire was naked or without necessary insulation. It seems, also, that he was a young man of experience in his business, earning $2 a day. Under these circumstances, if there was a safe way to pass this dangerous wire, it was incumbent on the lineman to avoid the danger, and his failure to do so would demonstrate negligence on his part. On the other hand, if it was unsafe to undertake to pass this dangerous wire, the lineman should not have attempted it. In either view, he did not observe ordinary care, and his mother is not entitled to recover. Civ. Code 1896, § 3530. The general allegation in her petition that he was acting with proper prudence and precaution, and was without fault on his part, seems to be rebutted by the facts and circumstances recited in the petition. We therefore think the demurrers should have been sustained.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

SCOTT v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

LARCENY—EVIDENCE.

1. The recent possession of the stolen property, coupled with the false statement as to the person from whom the defendant had obtained the same, was sufficient to make out a prima facie case of larceny; and there being no contradictory evidence, and no error of law assigned, the judgment refusing a new trial is affirmed.

Major Scott was convicted of larceny, and brings error. Affirmed.

E. T. Moon, for plaintiff in error. Henry Reeves, for the State.

LAMAR, J. Personal property was stolen, and found in the possession of a witness, who testified that he had obtained it from the defendant shortly after it was missed by the owner. The defendant claimed that he purchased it from one S., which the latter on oath denied. Another witness testified that he saw the defendant with the same soon after the loss, endeavoring to sell it for very much less than the real value. The recent possession of the stolen property, coupled with the false statement of the accused as to the person from whom he had obtained it, and the absence of any testimony contradicting that offered by the state, was sufficient to sustain the verdict; and, there being no error of law assigned, no reason is presented why a new trial should be granted.

SOUTHERN RY. CO. v. HARRELL.

RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—EVIDENCE.

1. On the trial of an action in a justice's court, against a railway company, for damages for the killing of an animal by the running of its train, when there was no evidence tending to contradict, in any material particular, the positive testimony that the company's employes could not, by the exercise of all ordinary care and diligence, have prevented the casualty, a verdict against the company was without evidence to support it, and should for that reason have been set aside on certiorari.

Error from Superior Court, Dodge County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by W. W. Harrell against the Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

De Lacy & Bishop, for plaintiff in error. J. E. Wooten, for defendant in error.

FISH, P. J. W. W. Harrell sued the Southern Railway Company, in a justice's court, for damages for the killing of his cow by the running of defendant's train of cars. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. The defendant's certiorari having been overruled, it excepted. One of the assignments of error made in the petition for certiorari was that the verdict was without evidence to support it. The evidence showed that the cow was killed by the running of the defendant's train, and that she was worth $50, the amount of the verdict. Several witnesses testified in behalf of the plaintiff, but none of them saw the train kill the cow. Three of them testified that they were familiar with the track where the cow was killed. One of them swore that the cow "could be seen by the engineer in his cab anywhere in the cut at least seventy-five yards; possibly more." The other two testified that in their opinion the engineer could have seen a cow for at least 75 yards on the track at the point where the animal in question was killed. It was shown that the fireman who was on the engine which killed the cow was inaccessible, and that his testimony could not be procured by the defendant. The engineer who was on the engine at the time the cow was killed testified that he and the fireman were properly looking ahead at the time; that when he first saw the animal it was on his side, to the right of the track, about 15 feet from it, on the edge of a cut, and about 75 feet ahead of the engine; that from the top of the cut to the track the distance was about 15 feet; that the cow ran very rapidly down the side of the cut directly toward the track, and that she and the engine reached the point on the track where she was struck at the same time; that there was a curve in the track where the casualty occurred, and it was impossible for him to have seen the cow on the edge of the cut, where she was when he first saw her, a greater distance than 75 feet; that as soon as he discovered her the brakes were "jammed down," but she was struck before they could have any effect on the speed of the train, which consisted of six loaded passenger cars, and was running down grade at about 35 miles an hour; that it was absolutely impossible to prevent the train running over the cow. He further testified that had the cow been on the track he could have seen her for a distance of about 150 feet. As the cow was not standing on the track, but was killed as soon as she reached the track from the top of the cut, the evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses, that she could have been seen on the track or in the cut at that point, by the engineer, for at least 75 yards, though in conflict with the engineer's testimony, that he could not have seen her on the track at that point for more than 150 feet, was not material; and as the engineer's uncontradicted testimony showed that it was impossible, in the exercise of all ordinary care and diligence, to have prevented the train from running over the cow, the presumption arising against the defendant, upon proof of the killing of the animal by the running of the train, was successfully rebutted. It follows that it was erroneous to overrule the certiorari, as there was no evidence to support the verdict.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

CITIZENS' BANKING CO. et al. v. PARIS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)

CERTIORARI—PETITION—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

Error from Superior Court, Dodge County; T. A. Parker, Judge.

Money rule by B. S. Paris, administrator, against Rogers, sheriff. The Citizens' Banking Company intervened. Judgment for Paris and Rogers, and the banking company brought certiorari. Writ dismissed, and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

J. E. Wooten and W. M. Clements, for plaintiffs in error. J. P. Highsmith, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Paris, administrator, was plaintiff, and Rogers, sheriff, defendant, and the Citizens' Banking Company, intervener, in a money rule brought in the city court of Eastman. The judgment was in favor of Paris. Rogers and the banking company sued out a petition for certiorari. At the hearing in the superior court this petition was dismissed "because insufficient in law, there being no proper assignment of error." Within less than six months after the dismissal the plaintiffs in certiorari undertook to renew under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 3786. When the second petition came on for a hearing, a motion was made to dismiss it upon various grounds; one among them being, in substance, that the first petition was not such a one as that a renewal thereof could be had under the statute. The court dismissed the petition "upon the general grounds that plaintiffs did not make out a case entitling them to certiorari," and to this judgment exception has been taken.

Civ. Code 1895, § 3786, provides that "if a plaintiff shall be nonsuited, or shall discontinue or dismiss his case, and shall recommence within six months, such renewed case shall stand upon the same footing, as to limitation, with the original case." This section has been held to apply to certiorari cases, and has been uniformly treated as being applicable to dismissals other than those which are voluntary. See the cases cited infra. It is settled that, if the first petition be void for any reason, no renewal can be had under the statute. Southern Railway Co. v. Goodrum, 115 Ga. 689, 42 S. E. 49; Hill v. State, 115 Ga. 833, 42 S. E. 286. This, of course, results from the fact that, if the first petition is an absolute nullity, there is no suit, and nothing to be renewed. The question, therefore, to be determined, is whether a petition for certiorari which contains no assignment of error, or, what is the same thing, no proper assignment of error, is absolutely void. The statute relating to bills of exceptions in the Supreme Court provides that the "bill of exceptions shall specify plainly the decision complained of, and the alleged error." Civ. Code 1895, § 5527. It has been held that a bill of exceptions which contains no assignment of error, or an insufficient assignment of error, presents nothing for decision by the Supreme Court, and must be dismissed. Sewell v. Conkle, 64 Ga. 436; Smith v. Frost, 74 Ga. 842; Williams v. Railroad Company, 98 Ga. 392, 25 S. E. 557; Dismukes v. Bainbridge State Bank, 99 Ga. 179, 25 S. E. 181; Wheeler v. Worley, 110 Ga. 513, 25 S. E. 639; Jackson v. Fitzpatrick, 114 Ga. 364, 40 S. E. 234; Neal Loan & Banking Company v. Wright, 116 Ga. 895, 42 S. E. 715. The certiorari statute provides that the petition "shall plainly and distinctly set forth the errors complained of." Civ. Code 1895, § 4637. The requirement of this statute is very similar to that for bills of exceptions, and the principle of the decisions above cited would apply to petitions for certiorari. A petition for certiorari which contains no assignment of error with which the court can deal is an absolute nullity. It is so much waste paper, and the court has no authority to decide any question which is sought to be raised therein, and can only strike the petition from its files. Being void as a suit, no renewal of it can be had under the two decisions first above cited. Inasmuch as the plaintiffs in certiorari acquiesced in the dismissal of their first petition on the ground above stated, we are bound to assume that the superior court was right in adjudging that such petition contained no sufficient assignment of error on any ruling or judgment of the city court.

STINCHCOMB v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW—INDICTMENT—ALIAS—MISNOMER—PLEA.

1. Where an accused person is indicted, with an alias, under more than one name, a special plea of misnomer, to be good, must aver unequivocally that the accused has never been known by either of the names set out in the indictment, and that neither is his true name.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Walton County; R. B. Russell, Judge.

William Stinchcomb was convicted of crime, and brings error. Affirmed.

Hal. G. Nowell, for plaintiff in error. C. H. Brand, Sol. Gen., for the State.

CANDLER, J. The sole object of description of the person of an alleged offender in an indictment is to identify the person to be tried as the one indicted, and usually one may be indicted by any name which will serve the purpose of identification. 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 505. If the offender is known by more than one name, or if the grand jury is uncertain which of the several names is the real name of the person, he may be indicted under an alias dictus; and a plea of misnomer to such an indictment must, to prevail, set out clearly that the accused has never been known by any of the names therein set out. These are familiar principles of criminal procedure, and need no elaboration.

Hence, when one is indicted as Gus Stinchcomb, alias Bud Stinchcomb, and his real name is William Stinchcomb, in order to take advantage of the alleged misnomer he must, in his special plea, aver unequivocally that he has never been known as either Gus Stinchcomb or Bud Stinchcomb. This is not done when he pleads "that he has never been known and called by the name of Gus Stinchcomb, alias Bud Stinchcomb; that his name is not Gus Stinchcomb, alias Bud Stinchcomb, as alleged in the bill of indictment, * * * but his true name is, and ever has been, William Stinchcomb." Such a plea is not sufficient in law, and a demurrer thereto on the ground that it failed to aver that the accused was not known by the name of Bud Stinchcomb, and that he was never known by any other name than William Stinchcomb, was properly sustained.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

ANDERSON et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE.

1. There was no error of law requiring the granting of a new trial. The evidence as to one of the accused was sufficient to warrant the verdict, but as to the other it was not.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Harris County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Jerry Anderson and one Walker were convicted of murder, and bring error. Reversed as to Anderson, and affirmed as to Walker.

J. R. Terrell and R. A. Russell, for plaintiffs in error. S. P. Gilbert, Sol. Gen., and Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the state.

COBB, J. Walker and Anderson were convicted of murder in taking the life of Hudson. The evidence is voluminous and conflicting, and of such a character that it is difficult to determine what is the truth of the case. There is evidence, however, which supports the verdict so far as Walker is concerned; it being shown that he fired a pistol at the deceased under circumstances which did not afford sufficient justification, that the ball struck the deceased, and that his death resulted from the wound thus inflicted. The case is different as to Anderson. While there is evidence that he fired at the deceased, there is no evidence that the shot struck the deceased. Anderson, therefore, could not have been legally convicted, unless there was evidence to show a conspiracy between him and Walker to take the life of the deceased. The evidence is not sufficient for this purpose. The special grounds of the motion for a new trial disclose no reason which required the granting of a new trial. The court erred in overrul-ing the general grounds of the motion so far as they related to Anderson, but committed no error in so far as Walker was concerned.

Judgment reversed as to Anderson, and affirmed as to Walker. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

PHILLIPS v. SMITH et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1904.)

DIRECTING VERDICT—ASSENT TO DEVISE.

1. The assent of an executor to a devise will be presumed after the lapse of more than 30 years; and where a finding that such assent was given will necessarily constrain a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff fails to rebut the presumption of assent, it is not error to direct a verdict for the defendant.

Error from Superior Court, Montgomery County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by W. M. Phillips, administrator, against J. F. Smith and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. B. Geiger and Jas. K. Hines, for plaintiff in error. F. H. Saffold, A. C. Wright, and R. J. Williams, for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. This was an action of ejectment, originally instituted by Salter, as executor of Micajah Phillips, against Smith, to recover land in Montgomery county. Salter died pendente lite, and William Phillips was appointed administrator with the will annexed and made a party plaintiff. On the trial the plaintiff introduced a grant from the state to Micajah Phillips conveying the land in dispute, and proved the value of the land and his right to sue as administrator. The defendant relied on three defenses: (1) Title under a sheriff's sale of the premises as the property of Micajah Phillips; (2) that the title to the land had been adjudicated against the plaintiff in a former litigation between Phillips and others, suing as heirs at law, and Rentz Bros. & Roberts, under whom the defendant claimed; and (3) title out of the plaintiff by reason of the fact that with the assent of the executor the land had passed from him to the legatees under the will of Micajah Phillips. In the view we take of the case it is only necessary to pass upon the questions presented by the last of these defenses, the judge having directed a verdict for the defendants, and it not being material to the decision now made to pass upon the complaints as to the admission of evidence arising under the other defenses set up.

When the litigation touching this case was before us on a former occasion (Phillips v. Rentz, 106 Ga. 249, 32 S. E. 107, wherein W.

M. Phillips and others, as heirs at law of Micajah Phillips, were suing Rentz Bros. & Roberts to recover damages in trespass), it was held that "where the plaintiff in a suit to recover for damages to realty relies upon his right as an heir at law, and upon the trial it appears from the evidence of the defendant that the ancestor of the plaintiff died testate, and that the land which is claimed to have been damaged was devised, but the record does not disclose who was the devisee, it is not error to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant." It is clear that if title passed out of the executor by reason of his assent to the vesting of the legacy in the will of his testator, his successor, the administrator with the will annexed, cannot recover the land in an action of ejectment. Under Civ. Code 1895, §§ 3319, 3320, no devise or legacy passes title until the assent of the executor is given to such devise or legacy; but the assent of the executor may be presumed from his conduct as well as his expressed consent. We think the evidence in this case conclusively shows that Salter, the executor, assented to the devise of the land in dispute to the persons named in the will of Micajah Phillips, and that, taking the testimony all together, there is really no conflict on this point. A casual reading of the evidence might give rise to the impression that there was some evidence which, if believed, would tend to disprove this assent; but, taking the testimony of the different witnesses all together, in no case is the contention that assent was given really disputed. Even in the absence of a showing that the executor expressly consented to the devise, however, it is clear that his assent will be presumed from the length of time—more than 30 years—which elapsed after the death of the testator before the suit was brought. Flemister v. Flemister, 83 Ga. 79, 9 S. E. 724. This presumption may be rebutted, it is true; but the burden is on the party denying assent to overcome the presumption arising from the lapse of time, and in this case the burden was not sustained. See, on this subject, Coleman v. Lane, 26 Ga. 515; Jourdan v. Miller, 41 Ga. 51; Thursby v. Myers, 57 Ga. 155; Vanzant v. Bigham, 76 Ga. 759.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

inal intent of its perpetrator, is not guilty as a principal in the second degree.

Error from Superior Court, Chattahoochee County; W. B. Butt, Judge.

Wilborn Thornton was convicted of murder, and brings error. Reversed.

J. B. Hudson, C. C. Minter, Graham Forrester, and Hatcher & Carson, for plaintiff in error. S. P. Gilbert, Sol. Gen., and Jno. C. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the State.

FISH, P. J. Dan Amos and Wilborn Thornton were indicted for the murder of Sam Gordon. In one count they were both charged as principals, and in another count Thornton was charged as principal in the second degree. Upon the trial of Thornton, it appeared that Amos, Thornton, Gordon, and others attended a dance at the house of one Wilson, in Chattahoochee county, and that, some time between 10 and 1 o'clock of the night of the dance, Thornton loaned Amos a pistol. Ben Gordon, a witness for the state, testified: "I saw the defendant [Thornton] give Amos something. Amos came up to him and told him he wanted to get his riprap, meaning his pistol. Said Sam Gordon had been taking money away from him when they met, and if he took any more he was going to kill him. Thornton told him to take it and kill him if he took any more. He gave him his pistol." It appeared that Dan Amos shot Sam Gordon next morning about 7 o'clock, in an old field, about 100 yards from Wilson's house. Ben Gordon further testified: "When shooting took place, Thornton and Amos were pretty close together—about five feet—talking. Dan told Sam he owed him a dime. He was standing, talking, and Sam was sitting down. Sam told him he didn't owe him any dime. He said, 'Yes, you do.' Sam says, 'If I owe you a dime, I will pay your dime; and I am going to make some of you boys shoot me with these little guns you are carrying around here.' Sam had no weapon in his hand, and done nothing to Amos when he shot him. Amos was standing up. Thornton gave Amos the pistol before day; can't say exactly what time; the morning before day he was shot. It was about a hundred yards from the place he gave him the pistol to where killing took place. * * * I do not say now that they played cards that night before they went out in the field, and Sam won their money. They didn't do it, and they didn't play cards out in the field next morning. They had just got out there, and they were not playing at night. * * * They were sitting down, talking; did not have anything with them; had no cards, no dice; just sitting around. I was not sitting down. Johnnie Gordon and Wilborn Thornton were there. The fuss started between my brother and Dan, about a dime Dan said he owed him; didn't say about what. * * * Wasn't any row going on there at all; everybody seemed to be in good humor until Dan told my brother that; and the first I knew of it was the shooting. * * * I told him [Sam Gordon] about Dan borrowing the pistol from Wilborn." Arthur Denson, a witness for the state, testified: "Was at Wilson's house where he [Amos] got the pistol. Was out doors, and Dan Luther [Amos] came out, and Wilborn he came out, too, and Dan Luther says, 'Wilborn, lend me your riprap;' he says, 'Sam Gordon has been robbing me in every game I get into with him, and, if he robs me to-night, I will kill him.' So he let him have it. Wilborn says, 'Take it and kill the damn son of a bitch if he robs you.' Wilborn was present, standing out there, when this fellow shot him. I don't know how close he was standing to him. I was not close up myself. * * * I was not there when the difficulty occurred. I was going out there, but hadn't got there, good, before the pistol fired. I don't know how the difficulty started. * * * Couldn't say what the trouble was about. I was not there, and didn't see it. All I saw taking a hand in it was Dan shooting, and the other man fell, and then Dan run. Dan held pistol on him until Sam fell. I didn't see anybody else do anything, except scatter. * * * I could not say what they were doing; did not see them. Some were standing up, and some sitting down. * * * I believe I saw one card. After the difficulty I saw one, but what they were doing I don't know. I saw the trey of clubs where they had been sitting around, but what they were doing I could not say. * * * Did not see Dan Amos playing cards." Thornton was found guilty, and sentenced to the penitentiary for life. He moved for a new trial upon various grounds, one of which was that the verdict was contrary to the evidence, and without evidence to support it. A new trial was refused, and he excepted.

"A person may be principal in an offense in two degrees. A principal in the first degree is the actor or absolute perpetrator of the crime. A principal in the second degree is he who is present, aiding and abetting the act to be done, which presence need not always be an actual, immediate standing by, within sight or hearing of the act; but there may be also a constructive presence, as when one commits a robbery or murder, or other crime, and another keeps watch or guard at some convenient distance." Pen. Code 1895, § 42. Thornton was not a principal in the first degree, as he was not the actor or absolute perpetrator of the crime. Was he, under the evidence, guilty as principal in the second degree? Under the evidence for the state, he was present at the commission of the crime, but mere presence is not sufficient to render one an aider and abettor (Lowery v. State, 72 Ga. 649), though it has been held that, if special circumstances or relations create a duty to interfere, mere inactive presence may amount to a criminal participation (2 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. 83). And it has also been held that presence, companionship, and conduct before and after the offense are circumstances from which one's participation in the criminal intent may be inferred. Id. For one to be guilty as principal in the second degree, it is essential that he share in the criminal intent of the principal in the first degree. The same criminal intent must exist in the minds of both. Thus, where A. told B., who was going to a house 50 yards distant, to get a pistol in a certain place in the house and shoot C., who was in the house, and promised B. a reward for so doing, and B. did as A. directed, while A. remained at the place where these instructions were given, A. was a principal in the second degree. Collins v. State, 88 Ga. 347, 14 S. E. 474. And where A., B., and C. were in a room together, and A., having furnished B. with a knife, told him to stab C., and B. then and there did so, A. was principal in the second degree to the crime thus committed. Washington v. State, 68 Ga. 570. In these cases the aider and abettor had the same criminal intent as the actual perpetrator of the crime. In Brown v. State, 28 Ga. 200, it was held: "Presence and participation in the act of killing a human being is not evidence of consent and concurrence in the perpetration of the act by a defendant charged with aiding and abetting in the killing, unless he had a felonious design, or participated in the felonious design of the person killing. If the person charged with murder in the first degree commit the assault on the deceased with a deadly weapon, but his intention to assault him with a deadly weapon was unknown to the person charged in the same indictment as principal in the second degree, and he intended to participate in an assault and battery only, and in no design to kill, he is guilty of manslaughter only." If Thornton had given his pistol to Amos, with instructions or advice to kill Sam Gordon with it, and Amos had done so when Thornton was present, and nothing more had appeared, then Thornton would have been guilty as principal in the second degree. The evidence for the state shows, however, that when Thornton loaned his pistol to Amos he told or advised him to kill Gordon with it, if he should again rob Amos at cards. His advice or instruction to kill Gordon was therefore conditional or dependent upon the event that Gordon should again rob Amos at cards. Even granting that there was enough in the evidence to authorize the jury to infer that Amos and Gordon had, subsequently to the loan of the pistol, engaged in playing cards, we think there is nothing in the evidence from which the jury could fairly infer that Gordon had robbed Amos in such a game, or that the killing was in consequence of such robbery. Of course, we do not use the words "robbed" and "robbery" here in their limited legal sense, but as including cheating in a game of cards played for money. The evidence shows that Amos stated to Gordon that he owed him a dime. This Gordon denied, but paid it, saying at the time that he would make some of them shoot him, whereupon Amos immediately shot and killed him. From these facts we do not think it can be successfully contended that the evidence shows that at the time of the homicide there was in the mind of Thornton the same criminal intent and felonious design that was in the mind of Amos. The common intent and purpose in the minds of both at the time that Thornton furnished Amos with the pistol was that Amos should kill Gordon if the latter should again rob him at cards. There is nothing in the evidence to show, or to authorize the jury in finding, that Thornton ever had any other criminal intent. If Amos, after procuring the pistol from Thornton, had casually met Gordon, and immediately shot him, without any provocation whatever, certainly Thornton would not have been guilty of murder as a principal in the second degree, although he had been present on the occasion of the homicide, if he did nothing then to aid or abet the commission of the crime. It follows from what we have said that the court should have granted a new trial upon the ground that there was no evidence to support the verdict.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

BELL v. FELT.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)
ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL—POSSESSORY WARRANT.

1. The rule requiring the assignment of error to show what answer was expected, the materiality of the excluded evidence, and that the judge was informed thereof at the time of the ruling, does not apply to the examination of hostile witnesses, or to pertinent questions on cross-examination, where the party making the inquiry cannot be expected to know what the witness would testify.

2. The judge rightly sustained the certiorari, and properly granted a new trial generally; nor was the same restricted to a grant on special grounds by subsequent recitals in the bill of exceptions.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Worth County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by H. F. Bell against C. H. Felt. Verdict for defendant. From an order granting certiorari to the justice court, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The evidence is conflicting, but, taking that excluded and admitted most favorably for the prevailing party, it appears that Felt was agent for the Indiana Fruit Company, and as such sold a pair of mules to Bell; that some time afterwards Bell desired to exchange the same for a pair of gray mules belonging to the company; that Felt expressed himself as willing to make the exchange if the bay mules were in as good condition as when they were sold, and, having to be absent, notified Arnold, overseer and agent of the company, to examine the bay mules, and, if they were as when sold, receive them in exchange for the grays; that a day or two later Bell brought the bays to the company's farm, when the agent declined to receive them, because one was badly injured; that thereupon Bell urged the agent to let him have the grays, as he was greatly in need of them, promising to see Felt on his return, and, if he did not make it all right, Arnold could come and get the grays. The agent complied with this request, and on Felt's return he disapproved of what had been done, and told Arnold to go and get the mules. On the same day, and shortly thereafter, Arnold, the agent of the company, took the bay mule to the wagon of Bell in which the grays were hitched, and told the driver that he had come after the mules. The driver said nothing. The mules were unhitched and carried off, the bays being tied to a tree near the wagon. During the same day Bell sued out a possessory warrant. On the trial the judge refused to allow any question to be asked of Bell as to the circumstances under which he obtained the mules from the agent of the company, or as to the terms of the exchange, or as to whether it would not be subject to Felt's approval, or, if Felt did not approve the exchange, Arnold might come and get them. He also excluded questions addressed to Arnold of the same character. It does not appear what the answer of either witness would have been to the questions asked, though the counsel stated that the purpose of the questions addressed to Bell was to show substantially what is above indicated, that Arnold had notified Bell of Felt's dissatisfaction with the exchange, and he had got possession of the mules after this conversation, in pursuance of the agreement, and without fraud or violence, and that Arnold had the consent of the plaintiff to take the mules as he did. The sheriff testified that he seized the mules at the Indiana Fruit Company's farm under the possessory warrant; that the defendant was manager for the company, and that Arnold, the overseer was in charge at the time the warrant was served. One witness testified that he had heard the defendant say that he had the mules. The defendant testified that he never owned or claimed the mules; that whatever possession he had before or since the issuance of the warrant was for the company; that he had instructed Arnold not to exchange them unless the bays were all right; that Arnold was overseer, and had no authority, so far as selling or swapping was concerned; and when he learned of the exchange he immediately instructed Arnold to go and get the gray mules back. Arnold was not allowed to testify as to the circumstances under which the exchange was made, but did swear that he used no fraud or violence. The justice found in favor of the plaintiff. Felt's certiorari was sustained, and a new trial awarded generally, on July 22, 1903. In the bill of exceptions, dated August 20, 1903, and served on August 24, 1903, it was recited that the order granting a new trial was based solely on the justice's refusing to allow Bell and Arnold to answer questions relating to the terms and conditions on which the exchange was made; and the plaintiff in error contends that, as it does not appear what would have been the answers to these questions, no error was shown in the petition for certiorari, and the grant of a new trial was error, and should be reversed, even though this was the first grant of a new trial.

Claude Payton and Sam. S. Bennet, for plaintiff in error. Perry & Tipton, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. The assignment of error on the judge's refusal to permit Arnold, a witness for the applicant, to answer the questions propounded, cannot be considered, because it nowhere appears what his testimony would have been, nor whether the same would have been material or helpful. But this objection does not cover the assignment of error on the court's refusal to permit Felt's counsel to propound certain appropriate questions to Bell, the opposite party. The rule requiring a statement as to what the answer would have been does not apply to those asked of a hostile witness, or to inquiries on cross-examination where counsel is sifting a witness, laying the foundation for other evidence, or seeking to discover material facts indicated by the question, and where the attorney does not know, or cannot be expected to know, what the witness would testify. The assignment of error, therefore, in the present case, is well within the exception stated in Griffin v. Henderson, 117 Ga. 383, 43 S. E. 712. In fact, the petition for certiorari complies fully with the spirit of the rule, and states not only the purpose of the question, but what plaintiff in error expected to prove by his adversary. The evidence thus sought was material, tending, as it did, to show that Bell had agreed that if Felt did not approve of the exchange Arnold might come and get the mules, thus establishing as a fact that they had been taken in pursuance of a condition which made the subsequent act of Arnold lawful instead of unlawful, there being in fact no force or violence by Arnold in taking the mules. He made a claim—hardly a demand—for their possession, and that was immediately acceded to by the driver. Indeed, it appears that Bell in the first instance got possession of the mules by reason of the fact that the Indiana Fruit Company's agent exceeded his authority in making the exchange. According to Bell's contention, Arnold in like manner, without force or violence, got possession, because the driver voluntarily acceded to Arnold's request.

The judge of the superior court rightly granted a new trial generally. The statement in the bill of exceptions that he did so because of the exclusion of certain testimony does not modify the unrestricted terms of the order. Bell had no cause to complain of the judgment as entered. He did not know of the recital in the bill of exceptions for the 30 days in which he was allowed to except, nor, indeed, until after the time within which he could have presented a bill of exceptions. The case is not, therefore, as argued by the plaintiff in error, similar to the grant of a new trial on one ground, which is in legal effect a denial of all others. Long v. Bullard, 69 Ga. 678; Singleton v. S. W. R. R., 70 Ga. 465, 48 Am. Rep. 574. In those cases the order on its face showed the single ground on which the new trial was granted. Here the judgment is general. It is claimed that it was restricted by the subsequent recital in the bill of exceptions. This could not be done. The case, therefore, is within the well-established rule that this court will not interfere with the first grant of a new trial in a justice's court, where it does not appear that the law and facts required a judgment in favor of the plaintiff below. Civ. Code 1895, § 5585.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

BARNARD v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)
CRIMINAL LAW—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

1. It is not ground for a new trial that the judge charged the jury as follows: "By a reasonable doubt is not meant some vague or fanciful doubt, but such a doubt as arises from the testimony in the mind of a reasonable man, and leaves it hesitating, unsettled, and undecided." Such a charge does not imply that a reasonable doubt may not arise as well from a lack of evidence as from facts brought to light which are consistent with the innocence of the accused, but is in accord with the law as heretofore laid down by this court. See Jesse v. State, 20 Ga. 156 (10), 168; John v. State, 33 Ga. 257; Long v. State, 33 Ga. 492 (8); Peterson v. State, 47 Ga. 525 (5); Malone v. State, 49 Ga. 211 (8); Tarver v. State, 21 S. E. 381, 95 Ga. 223 (2).

2. It was not error to charge the jury as follows: "You have heard the testimony, and it is for you to say whether this testimony connects the defendant with the commission of this crime; whether he is guilty or not; whether there is any rational theory upon which you can base your verdict other than that of his guilt. If there is any rational theory upon which you can base a verdict and acquit this defendant, it is your duty to do so; if not, then it is your duty to convict." This charge did not, in effect, "put the burden on the defendant to show his innocence"; nor is it open to the criticism that it "made the jury hunt some rational theory upon which a jury could base a verdict of acquittal, when they do not hunt the innocent in the trial of a case, but the guilty."

3. "Where evidence, partly competent and partly incompetent, was offered and objected to as a whole, the illegal portion not being specified nor objected to separately, admitting all of such evidence affords no legal cause of complaint to the objecting party." Smalls v. State, 25 S. E. 614, 89 Ga. 26 (2). See, also, Maynard v. Association, 37 S. E. 741, 112 Ga. 443; Southern Ry. Co. v. Gilmore, 42 S. E. 220, 115 Ga. 890; Gully v. State, 42 S. GEORGIA SOUTHERN & F. RY. CO. v. YOUNG INV. CO.

RAILROADS—KILLING STOCK—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE—CERTIORARI.

1. On the trial of an action for damages against a railroad company for the killing of live stock, it is not error for the court to charge that, the killing being admitted, the defendant must, to escape liability, show "by a preponderance of evidence" that at the time of the killing it was in the exercise of all ordinary and reasonable care and diligence.

2. In the absence of a request for specific instructions on the subject, it is not error in such a case to fail to explain to the jury the meaning of the expressions "ordinary care" and "preponderance of evidence."

3. While the evidence for the defendant made out a good defense, that for the plaintiff, including the testimony of an eyewitness to the occurrence under investigation, contradicted that defense, and tended to prove that the employees of the railroad company were guilty of negligence at the time the plaintiff's cow was killed. It was therefore not error to rule, adversely to the contention of the petition for certiorari, that the verdict of the jury in the city court was contrary to law and the evidence.

sary to add that this case does not come within the rules laid down in the cases cited in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error, which hold, in effect, that where there is no contradiction to the evidence of the employes of the railroad company that at the time of the occurrence under investigation they were in the exercise of all ordinary care and diligence, and that everything possible was done to stop the train in time to avoid an accident, but without avail, a verdict in favor of the plaintiff cannot stand. In the present case an eyewitness testified that the plaintiff's cow got on the track at least 100 yards in front of the train which struck her; that the track was straight at this point, and on a grade which the train was ascending; that the employes of the train knew of the presence of the cow on the track, as was evidenced by their giving the usual alarm to frighten stock off the track; and that the train did not slow up at all from the time the cow first got on the track, as it would have been impossible for it to have gone over the grade if it had done so. This was in direct conflict with the evidence of the engineer, to the effect that the cow came on the track about 30 or 40 feet in front of the engine, and that he made every effort possible to stop the train before striking her, but could not do so. The evidence for the plaintiff clearly established its right to recover. A jury of 12 men, under a fair charge from an able judge, weighed all the testimony, and resolved the conflict in favor of the plaintiff; their verdict and the rulings of the city court judge on the trial were reviewed and approved by the judge of the superior court; and we cannot say, as matter of law, that there was any error in refusing the certiorari.

BENTLEY et al. v. McCALL.

DEED—EVIDENCE—FORGERY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. When a certified copy of a recorded deed is offered in evidence, and is met by the affidavit of forgery provided for in Civ. Code 1895, § 3623, the burden is upon the party offering the deed to show the existence and genuineness of the original, without reference to the fact that it appears to have been recorded. And this is true notwithstanding it appears from the certified copy that the original was more than 30 years old.

2. In such a case the existence and genuineness of the deed may be proven by circumstantial evidence.

3. The circumstances proven in the present case were not sufficient to establish the existence and genuineness of the original deed, and the court erred in admitting in evidence the certified copy.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by W. H. Bentley and others against J. A. McCall. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

The certified copy deed referred to in the opinion was of a deed which purported to have been executed by M. A. Bentley to George K. Hamilton, dated May 23, 1846. The evidence offered in connection with this certified copy was in substance as follows: A chain of title to the land in dispute, beginning with a deed from Hamilton to Rowe, dated December 9, 1856, and ending with a deed from Conner to defendant, dated June 16, 1891. Certificate from the Secretary of State that David G. Saulsbury, who purported to have signed the original deed as a justice of the peace, was a justice of the peace from January 24, 1845, to January 1, 1849. Testimony of Allen W. Smith that he had seen the chain of titles to the land in dispute; that one Middlebrooks, the then owner of the land, was at witness' house with the titles in the month of January, though witness could not say in what year; that witness examined the deeds very closely, and there was no missing deed in them. Witness could not say whether any of them were certified copies or not, and did not recollect seeing the particular deed from Bentley to Hamilton, but supposed it was among the deeds, as he would probably have noticed its absence if it had been missing, witness having had a good deal of experience in examining titles. Affidavit from defendant that she did not have the original deed from Bentley to Hamilton, and believed it to have been lost or destroyed. J. M. McCall, defendant's husband, testified: "I believe I saw this line of deeds in Rochelle in Mr. Vaughn's possession before my wife bought it. There was an original deed out of M. A. Bentley in the bunch of papers. I do not know where it is, though I made efforts to get it. I acted as agent for my wife in buying the land, and saw this deed a short time before I bought the land. The deed has never come into my possession, power, or control. My recollection is that the deed purported to be properly recorded. I think there were two witnesses to it. My recollection is that one was David G. Saulsbury, who was the official witness. I could not detect any defects in it. The deed has been in Mr. Conner's hands and in Mr. Mitchell's hands. I told them to search for it. I have never been able to find it." On cross-examination the witness testified, among other things: "I never saw M. A. Bentley write. I never saw David G. Saulsbury write. It appears to be properly signed up; that is all I know about it being a genuine deed. I never knew Saulsbury or Bentley. I did not know whether it was the genuine signature of M. A. Bentley or not, or of Riley Monger, or of David G. Saulsbury. I took it to be a genuine deed." J. M. Mixon testified that he made the copy deed offered in evidence, and that it was a true and correct copy from the records. The witness also testified that the original book of records was lost, and that he could not find it. He then added: "I did not see anything irregular appearing on the face of that paper or the book when I copied it." Counsel for plaintiffs admitted that the certified copy deed offered in evidence was a correct copy from the record book.

J. W. Haygood and Eldridge Cutts, for plaintiffs in error. J. L. Bankston and J. H. Martin, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. This was an equitable action brought for the recovery of land. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs complain that the court erred in overruling their motion for a new trial.

The case as presented in this court depends upon the determination of one question, and that is whether the court erred in admitting in evidence a certified copy of a deed under which the defendant claimed. When the certified copy was offered in evidence, one of the plaintiffs filed the affidavit of forgery authorized by Civ. Code 1895, § 3623. The effect of filing this affidavit is to place upon the party offering the copy deed the burden of proving the execution of the original. McCall v. Bentley, 114 Ga. 752 (2), 40 S. E. 768. The subscribing witnesses were not produced, nor was there any evidence as to the handwriting of the alleged grantor or of either of the witnesses. The defendant sought to prove the execution of the original deed by circumstantial evidence. This was permissible. Payne v. Ormond, 44 Ga. 514 (2); Terry v. Rodahan, 79 Ga. 294, 5 S. E. 38, 11 Am. St. Rep. 420. See, also, De Vaughn v. McLeroy, 82 Ga. 703, 10 S. E. 211. An abstract of the evidence which was introduced for the purpose of proving the execution of the original deed appears in the official report of the case. The general rule is that the existence, genuineness, and contents of a deed shown to be lost or destroyed may be proved by a certified copy of the record, if it has been properly and legally probated for record. Eady v. Shivey, 40 Ga. 684; Hayden v. Mitchell, 103 Ga. 431, 30 S. E. 287; Crummey v. Bentley, 114 Ga. 750, 40 S. E. 765; Griffin v. Wise, 115 Ga. 614, 41 S. E. 1008. As was pointed out, though, by Judge McCay, in Eady v. Shivey, 40 Ga. 687, this rule is not applicable in a case where an affidavit of forgery is filed. In such a case it makes no difference whether it is an original or a certified copy which is offered. The fact that the paper has been recorded goes for naught, and the actual proof of the genuineness of the original, as well as of its existence, if a certified copy is offered, must be made. When the certified copy is eliminated from the case, we do not think the other circumstances proven are sufficient to authorize a finding in favor either of the existence or of the genuineness of the alleged original deed. The fact that the original appeared from the certified copy to be more than 30 years old would not affect the matter, as the rule in reference to ancient documents applies only to original papers, and not to copies. See Patterson v. Collier, 75 Ga. 419, 427, 58 Am. Rep. 472, and cases cited; McCall v. Bentley, supra. The defendant did not carry the burden imposed upon her by the filing of the affidavit of forgery, and the court erred in admitting in evidence the certified copy. There is nothing in this ruling to conflict with the decision in Payne v. Ormond, supra. There was no affidavit of forgery in that case, and it was simply held that the circumstances detailed were admissible, and that a jury could consider them under proper instructions from the court. It was not held that these circumstances alone were sufficient to establish the existence and genuineness of the lost deed. In addition to this, upon an examination of that case it will be seen that the decision really turned on the question of prescription.

STEPHENSON v. WARREN.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)

CITY COURT—JURISDICTION—DISPOSSESSION OF TENANTS—ISSUE OF WARRANT.

1. The city court of Moultrie has no authority to hear and determine an issue formed by a counter affidavit to a warrant issued against one as a tenant holding over. Acts 1901, p. 136, § 2. Exclusive jurisdiction over such a proceeding is by statute conferred upon the superior courts. Civ. Code, § 4816.

2. The judge of that city court has, however, under the express terms of section 12 of the act creating it, authority to administer oaths and take the necessary affidavits from persons entitled to apply for warrants to dispossess tenants holding over, as well as authority to issue such warrants.

3. It follows that, where a warrant issued by the judge of that court against one in possession of land is met by a counter affidavit, it is the duty of the officer serving the warrant to "return the proceedings to the next superior court of the county where the land lies," agreeably to the provisions of the section of the Code above cited, in order that "the fact in issue [may] be there tried by a special jury, as in case of appeal."

Error from Superior Court, Dooly County: Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by Henry Levis & Co. against the Parrott Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

J. L. Bankston and Hal Lawson, for plaintiffs in error. Whipple & McKenzie, for defendant in error.

TURNER, J. Henry Levis & Co. sued the Parrott Lumber Company, making the following case: On February 29, 1892, the Americus Investment Company conveyed to the plaintiffs certain tracts of land, including lot No. 166 in the Fifth district of Wilcox county. Previously, on June 30, 1890, the Americus Investment Company executed and delivered to J. C. Ausley and G. W. Parrott, as trustees for Ausley and McCaskill & Parrott Lumber Company, a certain writing, which will be hereinafter described. Under this last-mentioned writing, all right of said trustees expired on June 30, 1898. Said conveyance to the plaintiffs and said writing were attached as exhibits to the plaintiffs' petition. From these exhibits it appears that the deed to the plaintiffs conveyed certain lots of land, among them the lot already mentioned, in fee simple; the description of the lands conveyed being followed by these words: "All timber on above lots sold prior to this day reserved." The writing made by the Americus Investment Company to Ausley and Parrott, trustees, after stating the consideration, recited that "the above is consideration given by J. C. Ausley and G. W. Parrott, trustees, for sawmill and turpentine privileges for the space of (8) eight years from date on lots" described, including lot No. 166 "in the fifth district, Wilcox county. The said trustees are hereby given, free of charge, permission to run tramroads through above-named lots, all timber remaining on above lots to revert back to this company at eight years; the title to above premises being hereby warranted." The plaintiffs further averred that, after the expiration of the period of eight years mentioned in the deed made to Ausley and Parrott as trustees, the Parrott Lumber Company "cut out and removed the pine trees suitable for sawmill purposes from said lot of land," the value of the timber so cut and removed being $800; that said pine trees were manufactured into lumber by the defendant company, the value of this lumber being $2,500; and that "said cutting and removal of said timber by defendant was without the consent of plaintiffs." The plaintiffs prayed judgment against the defendant for the value of the lumber so manufactured. To this petition the Parrott Lumber Company filed a demurrer based on the grounds (1) that the facts set forth in the petition did not authorize a recovery for the value of the manufactured lumber; (2) that the petition disclosed that the timber on lot No. 166 "was never sold to Henry Levis & Co., but was reserved by the Americus Investment Co., the petition also showing that the same had been sold by the Americus Investment Co. prior to the date of [its] deed to" plaintiffs, and could not possibly revert to them under the deeds attached to their petition; and (3) that said petition "does not set out who Levis & Co. is." By consent of the parties, the judge of the lower court considered the demurrer in vacation. After hearing argument thereon, he passed an order sustaining the first and second grounds of the demurrer, and to this order the plaintiffs excepted.

It may be assumed from the pleadings that the plaintiffs acquired their title to the land in question with notice of whatever rights the defendant company had under the writing exhibited and alleged to have been made by the Americus Investment Company to Ausley and Parrott as trustees. It may also be assumed that the plaintiffs' title to the lot was subject to whatever interest therein the defendant company claimed under that writing. The decision of the case therefore depends upon the construction to be given to those clauses of the papers attached to the petition which we have hereinbefore quoted. According to the great weight of authority, the defendant, under any transfer to it of the interest conveyed by the writing made to Ausley and Parrott as trustees, had no title to the timber which was removed from the lot after the expiration of the time mentioned in that writing within which the timber should be taken, if at all, from the land; that is to say, after June 30, 1898. See the authorities cited in Morgan v. Perkins, 94 Ga. 353, 355, 21 S. E. 574; McRae v. Stillwell, Millen & Co., 111 Ga. 65, 36 S. E. 604, 55 L. R. A. 528, note 2. And it necessarily follows, we think, that all the timber remaining on the lot after that date reverted to and became the property of the grantor, the Americus Investment Company. At the date of the deed from that company to the plaintiffs, only two years of the period limited for the removal of the timber had, according to the terms of the grant previously made to Ausley and Parrott, trustees, elapsed, and on that date the Americus Investment Company did not own this timber. Six years remained in which it could be cut and removed by them. It is true that the right to this timber was limited as to time, but this limitation, by the terms of the writing in which it was stated, only had the effect to revert in the Americus Investment Company the title to such timber as remained on the land at the expiration of the term. This reversionary interest in the Americus Investment Company did not, under the conveyance made to the plaintiffs, pass into them, but was expressly excepted or reserved. According to the best definitions which we can find, the clause in that deed which recited that all timber on the land which had been previously sold was thereby "reserved" amounted to a technical "exception." See 2 Devlin on Deeds (2d Ed.) §§ 979, 980, 989, and authorities cited. It is to be noted in this connection that, in conveying to the plaintiffs the property described in the instrument under which they claim, the Americus Investment Company did not in its deed merely recite that the property was sold subject to the rights of others to whom the timber privileges had previously been conveyed, but used apt language indicating a purpose on its part to except from the operation of its grant all timber which it had theretofore sold on conditions which gave it a reversionary interest in the same. We have accordingly reached the conclusion that, under the averments made in the petition, the plaintiffs did not show a right to hold the defendant to account for its alleged trespass. This being so, it is not necessary for us to undertake to pass on the merits of the first ground of the defendant's demurrer.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

SAYER, Tax Collector, v. BROWN et al.,
County Com'rs.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1904.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—RECORD—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE—COUNTY COMMISSIONERS—TITLE OF ACT—STATUTES—REPEAL—AMENDMENT—TAX COLLECTOR—INJUNCTION.

1. The disputed questions of fact in this case cannot be considered by this court, as the evidence submitted upon the trial in the court below is neither incorporated in the bill of exceptions, nor sent up, as a part of the record, in a brief of evidence approved and made a part of the record by the trial judge.

2. Affidavits and documents offered in evidence and ruled out, and amendments to pleadings offered and disallowed, form no part of the record of a case, and cannot be sent up to this court as such.

3. A mere general allegation that an act of the Legislature is unconstitutional because of the presence therein of a designated provision, without calling attention in any way to the particular provision of the Constitution with which it is claimed that it conflicts, is too vague and indefinite to invoke a decision upon the validity of the statute.

4. The act of July 30, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 332), amendatory of the act of December 20, 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 168), creating a board of commissioners for the county of Douglas, does not violate that provision of the Constitution which prohibits the passage of any statute containing matter different from that which is expressed in the title thereof.

5. An allegation that a given statute is unconstitutional, in that it violates the constitutional provision which prohibits the passage of a special law in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law, which fails to point out the general law which is claimed to cover the same subject as such statute, presents no question for decision by a court.

6. The above-mentioned act of July 30, 1903, did not repeal the act which it purported to amend.

7. An act creating an office may be amended by completely changing the powers and duties appertaining thereto, without destroying the office or removing therefrom the person who is lawfully filling the same.

8. The act of July 30, 1903, in question, went into effect upon its passage, except in so far as it provided for a change in the number of members of which the board of county commissioners should consist.

9. Under the powers conferred upon them by the act of July 30, 1903, the county commissioners of Douglas county have authority to bring the tax collector of that county to a settlement of his accounts with the county.

10. This authority is not confined to matters in the tax collector's office which have arisen since that act was passed, but embraces any accounts of such officer which have not been lawfully settled.

11. Whether or not the board of county commissioners have the power to punish the tax collector for contempt for a failure or refusal on his part to appear before the board with the books, receipts, etc., appertaining to his office, after being notified to do so, the fact that the commissioners threatened to impose such fine upon him affords no reason for enjoining them from so doing. If they have no such power, and should impose a fine upon him and attempt to collect it, his remedy at law is ample.

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by W. A. Sayer, tax collector, against J. W. Brown and others, county commissioners. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. S. James and Roberts & Hutcheson, for plaintiff in error. W. A. James and J. D. Kilpatrick, for defendants in error.

FISH, P. J. In considering this case we are necessarily confined to the pleadings and such facts as the allegations on the one side and the admissions on the other establish, as there is not a particle of the evidence which was introduced in the trial court, nor of that which it is alleged was offered and erroneously ruled out, properly before us.

1. An attempt has been made to send up, as parts of the record, both the evidence introduced and the evidence alleged to have been erroneously rejected. There is nothing to identify any of it as evidence which was introduced or offered upon the trial of the case. The trial judge simply certifies that the bill of exceptions "is true, and contains and specifies all of the evidence, and specifies all of the record material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of." No evidence whatever is contained in the bill of exceptions, and not an affidavit or document sent up as a part of the record is identified by the judge as evidence introduced, or evidence offered, at the hearing. Civ. Code, § 5528, provides: "If the case is not one in which a judgment on a motion for new trial is to be reviewed, the plaintiff in error * * * shall incorporate in the bill of exceptions a brief of so much of the written and oral evidence as is material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, and shall specify therein such portions of the record as are material to such understanding." Section 5529 provides: "If the plaintiff in error shall so elect, he may have such brief of so much of the evidence as is necessary to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, approved by the judge, and made a part of the record and sent up by the clerk as a part thereof, rather than have the same incorporated in the bill of exceptions." Neither of these methods of having the evidence which was introduced upon the hearing of the case sent up to this court was adopted by the plaintiff in error. No brief of the evidence was incorporated in the bill of exceptions, nor was any brief thereof approved by the trial judge and made a part of the record. Instead of pursuing either of these methods, the plaintiff in error simply specifies, as parts of the record necessary to a clear understanding of the case, various affidavits, and the clerk sends up what purport to be copies of such affidavits. As these affidavits were no part of the record originally, and were not made such by the judge in the way provided by law, the clerk could not send them up as such. There is nothing whatever which legally informs this court that they were ever used upon the hearing of the case. Indeed, we may add that the plaintiff in error does not, in his bill of exceptions, allege that they were so used, but contents himself with simply specifying them as parts of the record to be sent up by the clerk. Hancock v. McNatt, 116 Ga. 297, 42 S. E. 525, and cit.

2. Affidavits and documents offered in evidence and ruled out by the judge form no part of the record, nor could they form any part of a brief of the evidence upon which the case was tried. They should have been incorporated in the bill of exceptions. Besides, assignments of error upon the rejection or admission of evidence cannot be considered when they do not set out the evidence rejected or admitted. As this has been often decided, we simply cite the following cases: Benton v. Baxley, 90 Ga. 297, 15 S. E. 820; W. U. Telegraph Co. v. Michelson, 94 Ga. 436, 21 S. E. 169. If it was the intention of the plaintiff in error to assign error upon the ruling of the court in reference to the amendment referred to in the bill of exceptions as having been offered and disallowed, he failed to do so; and, even if he had assigned error upon such ruling, the assignment could not have been considered, because the proposed amendment is neither set out in the bill of exceptions nor attached thereto as an exhibit, but is sought to be brought up in the record, of which it formed no part. Sibley v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, 87 Ga. 738, 13 S. E. 838; Barnett v. Railway Co., 87 Ga. 767, 13 S. E. 904; Moore v. Guyton, 110 Ga. 330, 35 S. E. 339.

3. The main contention of the plaintiff in error is that the persons claiming to be the county commissioners of Douglas county and acting as such are doing so without any authority of law; that the offices which they claim to fill have no legal existence in Douglas county. This contention is based upon the alleged unconstitutionality of the statute under which they were elected and the statute from which they claim to derive the power and authority which they seek to exercise. These statutes are the act of December 20, 1900 (Acts 1900, p. 168), creating a board of county commissioners for the county of Douglas, and the act of July 30, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 332), amendatory thereof; the commissioners having been elected under the provisions of the original act, and claiming the powers conferred by the amendatory act. In the petition filed by the plaintiff each of these acts was alleged to be unconstitutional and void, but in the brief of his counsel filed in this court no allusion is made to the alleged unconstitutionality of the original act, the whole argument upon the constitutional question being directed against the amendatory act. We might, therefore, treat the allegation as to the invalidity of the act of 1900 as having been abandoned. It might well have been abandoned, as it was not made in such a way as to present any question for determination by the court. The petition alleged that this act was unconstitutional because of the presence therein of certain provisions, but failed to allege or indicate wherein the presence of such provisions renders the statute unconstitutional. A mere general allegation that an act of the Legislature is unconstitutional, without calling attention in any way to the particular provisions of the Constitution with which it is claimed it conflicts, is too vague and indefinite to invoke a decision of the court upon the validity of the statute. Jones v. Oemler, 110 Ga. 202, 35 S. E. 375; Savannah Railway Co. v. Hardin, 110 Ga. 437, 438, 35 S. E. 681; Laffitte v. Burke, 113 Ga. 1000, 39 S. E. 433.

4. One ground upon which the constitutionality of the act of July 30, 1903, is attacked is that "it sets out matter in the body of the bill that is not referred to in the title to the act nor in any way covered thereby." The title of this act is as follows: "An act to amend an act creating a board of county commissioners for the county of Douglas, defining their duties, etc., approved December 20, 1900, by providing for the monthly meetings of said board of commissioners for the transaction of county business, by reducing the number of said board from five to three, and by more particularly describing the power, jurisdiction, duty, authority of said board of commissioners, and for other purposes." In support of the contention that the body of the act contains matter different from that which is expressed in its title, it is contended that the title of the act is to amend the act of December 20, 1900, while the body of the act repeals "all the essential parts" of that act, and substitutes therefor "other legislation, not referred to anywhere in the title of the amending act." In other words, the gist of the contention, as we understand it, is that the change wrought in the original act by the amendatory act is so great as to practically destroy the original act, and substitute entirely new and different legislation for it, and that this cannot be done by an act the title of which declares it is an act to amend the existing act. We need not stop to inquire whether the act of 1903, with its present title, would be constitutional if the effect of its provisions was to wholly repeal the act of 1900 which it purports to amend, for it is very clear that it did not repeal the act of 1900, even by implication. It did not abolish the board of county commissioners created by the act of 1900, nor interfere with the tenure of office of the commissioners elected under that act, nor change the terms of office of the county commissioners, or the times when or the manner in which they should be elected. All these matters, and others which need not be mentioned, were left as in the original act; and we shall presently see that the contention that the original act was repealed because the amendatory act declared that section 1 of the original act, which section provided for the creation of the board of commissioners, and section 10 thereof, which defined their duties, should be stricken, is without merit. It is true that the amendatory act does work a radical and sweeping change in the original act. By the original act the board of county commissioners was merely an advisory body to the ordinary as to designated county matters, and had no original jurisdiction whatever, while by the amendatory act the board is given exclusive jurisdiction as to these and as to other matters not covered by the original act. But though an amendatory act may radically change the provisions of the act which it amends, this does not render it obnoxious to that constitutional provision which prohibits the passage of an act which contains matter different from that which is expressed in its title. Whether it does or does not violate this provision of the Constitution must be determined, not by the extent to which it changes the original act, but by a comparison of its statutory contents with the scope of its title. If its provisions are fairly covered by its title, it is not unconstitutional because those provisions may radically change the statute which it amends.

In determining whether an amendatory statute contains matter different from that which is expressed in its title, the title of the original statute may be considered when, as in the present instance, it is recited, or substantially set forth, in the title of the later act, as it thereby becomes a part of the title of the latter; and whatever is within the scope of the title of the original act is within the scope of the title of the amendatory act, unless the title of the latter is otherwise so limited and restricted as to forbid such a construction. Newman v. State, 101 Ga. 534, 28 S. E. 1005, and citations; Dallis v. Griffin, 117 Ga. 408, 43 S. E. 758. Indeed, this court decided in Alberson v. Hamilton, 82 Ga. 30, 8 S. E. 869, that "where the title of a third statute is to amend a second, and the object of the second was to amend the first, the title of the third is broad enough to comprehend the whole subject-matter of the first and second." The original act was entitled "An act to provide for the creation of a board of county commissioners for the county of Douglas, and to define their duties, and for the purposes therein stated." There is nothing in the amendatory act which is not germane to the creation of a board of county commissioners for the county of Douglas and the definition of their duties. The conferring upon the commissioners exclusive jurisdiction and control over specified county matters devolves upon them the duty of exercising such jurisdiction and control; and a definition of their powers and jurisdiction is a definition of their duties. "As the duties may be defined without limit, any duty defined is necessarily within the scope of the title and embraced in the subject-matter." Churchill v. Walker, 68 Ga. 686. When to this it is added that the title of the amendatory act declares its purpose to be, not only to amend an act with the title which we have been considering, but to more particularly describe "the power, jurisdiction, duty, and authority of said board of commissioners," it seems superfluous to say that the title of the amendatory act carried full notice of a purpose to deal with the power, jurisdiction, and authority of the county commissioners, and that any provision with reference thereto would be covered by the title.

5. Another ground upon which the act of 1903 is alleged to be unconstitutional is that it is a "violation of that clause in the state Constitution which is set forth in section 5732, Civ. Code Ga. 1895, * * * which provides, 'No special law shall be enacted in any case for which provision has been made by an existing general law,' etc.; for petitioner says there were existing general laws of this state covering the subject of said act, especially section 10, and for all the subject covered by said section 10 provisions had been made * * * by existing general laws in this state." The question here sought to be made was not properly presented to the court below, and hence is not properly before this court; for the petition fails to state or indicate what general laws are claimed to cover the subjects dealt with by section 10 of the act in question. If the question had been properly presented, we apprehend the contention of the petitioner could not have been sustained. Const. art. 6, § 19, par. 1 (Civ. Code 1895, § 5879), provides: "The General Assembly shall have power to provide for the creation of county commissioners in such counties as may require them, and to define their duties." There is no general law upon the subject of the powers, duties, and jurisdiction of county commissioners, and, as was said by the present Chief Justice in County of Pulaski v. Thompson, 83 Ga. 274, 9 S. E. 1065, the Constitution does not require the Legislature to pass a general law defining the duties and powers of county commissioners. It was held in that case that "the Legislature has the power to pass separate and distinct acts for any counties which require county commissioners; and it is not necessary that these acts shall be uniform in their operation in all such counties." Id., 83 Ga. 270, 9 S. E. 1065.

The petition further alleged that the act of 1903 "is void wherein it provides for the cancellation of tax fi. fas." because "there is a general law of this state making provisions in such cases and fully covering the subject therein stated, and that provision is unconstitutional for the reason above stated." It also alleged that the part of this act which provides that the board of commissioners shall have the power to declare the office of county treasurer or the office of tax collector vacant, "under the conditions therein named, is void and violates the Constitution of Georgia, because the provision in relation to the removal of such officers * * * was, at the time of the passage of the act, covered by provisions in the laws of this state in the General Statutes thereof." Neither of these allegations presented any question for determination by the court, as they each failed to point out what general law was claimed to cover the subject dealt with in the portion of the act alleged to be unconstitutional. Even if both of these provisions of the act were unconstitutional, the validity of the whole act would not be affected, but these particular provisions thereof would simply be nugatory.

6. Another allegation of the petition is that the act of 1903 really repealed the act of 1900, which it purported to amend, and therefore the defendants, who were elected as county commissioners under the provisions of the act of 1900, went out of office upon the passage of the act of 1903. From the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error it appears that this contention is based upon the fact that the act of 1903 provides that section 1 of the original act shall be stricken out and certain matter enacted in lieu thereof, and that a similar provision is made in reference to section 10 of the original act; section 1 providing for the creation of a board of county commissioners, and section 10 defining their duties. Even if section 1 of the act of 1900 were stricken therefrom and nothing substituted in its stead, it would seem that section 2 of that act would be sufficient to create a board of county commissioners for the county of Douglas; but, aside from this, a sufficient reply to the above contention, so far as it is based upon the alleged repeal of section 1 of the original act, is that the section substituted therefor expressly provided that the commissioners in office when the amendatory act was passed should remain in office until the expiration of their terms, so that whatever powers were conferred upon the board of commissioners by the amendatory act were conferred upon the board as it was then constituted. Another complete reply is that abrogation and substitution were simultaneous, the section creating the board of commissioners being simultaneously stricken and re-enacted. No conceivable interval of time elapsed between the repeal and the substitution; hence the board of commissioners never, for a single instant, ceased to exist. It has been often held that where one statute expressly declares that an existing statute is repealed, and at the same time re-enacts its provisions, or declares that a portion of another statute is repealed and re-enacts such portion thereof, the re-enactment neutralizes the repeal, so far as the old law is continued in force. The old law operates without interruption, where the re-enactment takes effect at the same time as the repeal. Suth. St. Const. § 134; Fullerton v. Spring, 3 Wis. 667; Laude v. Chicago Ry. Co., 33 Wis. 640; Glantz v. State, 38 Wis. 549; Scheffels v. Tabert, 46 Wis. 439, 1 N. W. 156; Middleton v. New Jersey R. Co., 26 N. J. Eq. 269; Merkle v. Bennington, 68 Mich. 133, 35 N. W. 846; Alexander v. Big Rapids, 70 Mich. 224, 38 N. W. 227; Moore v. Kenockee, 75 Mich. 332, 42 N. W. 944, 4 L. R. A. 555; Wright v. Oakley, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 400, 406; United Hebrew Ass'n v. Benshimol, 130 Mass. 325; Skyrme v. Occidental Mill Co., 8 Nev. 219; Capron v. Strout, 11 Nev. 304; State ex rel. Birdsey v. Baldwin, 45 Conn. 135. It is true that the new section substituted for the old changed the number of members of the board of commissioners from five to three; but, as it declared that the change was not to "go into effect until after the expiration of the term of office of each of the present members of the board as now constituted," the same board of five members, composed of the same persons, continued to exist.

7. Putting the contention of counsel for the plaintiff in error, in reference to the effect of the repeal of section 10 of the original act, in its strongest light, it is this: that inasmuch as that section alone defined the duties of the commissioners, when it was repealed the whole of the act of which it formed a part went with it. What the effect upon the original act would have been if the amendatory act had left the commissioners with no public duties to perform we need not inquire, for it did not do so. In this instance, as in the other, abolition and substitution were simultaneous, so that there was never a moment when the duties of the commissioners were not defined. An act creating an office may be amended by completely changing the powers and duties appertaining thereto, without destroying the office, or removing therefrom the person who is filling it.

8. The contention that the act of 1903 does not go into effect until January 1, 1905, is so obviously without merit as hardly to require discussion. The contention is based upon the provision therein that the change made in section 1 of the original act "shall not go into effect until after the expiration of the term of office of each of the present members of the board as now constituted." The change referred to was in the number of members of which the board should consist, section 1 of the original act providing for a board of five members, and section 1 of the act as amended providing for a board of three members. It was this change, and this change alone, which was not to go into effect until the time stipulated.

9. As the act of July 30, 1903, is not unconstitutional, it follows that the commissioners of Douglas county have lawful authority to call upon the tax collector of that county for a settlement of his accounts with the county. Section 10 of the act declares that the board of commissioners shall have exclusive jurisdiction and control "in supervising the tax collector's and receiver's books, and allowing the insolvent lists for said county; in settling all claims against the county, examining and auditing all claims or accounts of officers having the care, management, keeping, collecting, or disbursements of money belonging to the county or appropriated for its use and benefit, and bringing such officers to a settlement."

10. The contention that the act of 1903 is not retroactive is sound, but the contention that, because it is not retroactive, the county commissioners have no authority to call upon the tax collector for a settlement of his accounts for the year 1902, is unsound. It may be admitted that before the passage of this act the ordinary of the county alone had authority to bring the tax collector to a settlement of his accounts for the year 1902; but it does not follow from this that the ordinary, after the passage of that act, had such authority. His authority in the matter was taken away by the act and conferred upon the county commissioners. It does not make the act retroactive to hold that it gives the county commissioners authority to bring the tax collector to a settlement of accounts which came into existence before such authority was conferred upon them, and when it existed in the ordinary. The power of the county commissioners to bring the collector to a settlement with the county depends, not upon whether the acts of the collector to be brought under review were performed before such power was conferred upon the commissioners, but upon the question whether or not the collector had lawfully settled the accounts involved with the ordinary before jurisdiction of the matter was conferred upon the board of commissioners. The tax collector does not allege that prior to the passage of the act of 1903 he settled his accounts for the year 1902 with the ordinary, but he alleges that the ordinary alone now has authority to call upon him to do so, and avers his willingness to submit to such officer "his books, receipts, and other vouchers or papers pertaining to his office, for inspection, and to fully settle and account for every dollar and cent that may have come into his hands as tax collector." If, as his petition clearly indicates, he has not settled his accounts for the year 1902 with the proper county official, then the county commissioners have the authority to require him to come to such a settlement with them. The ordinary now has no such authority, for his jurisdiction in the matter terminated upon the passage of the act of 1903, which gave exclusive jurisdiction in all such matters to the board of county commissioners.

11. Undoubtedly, the board of commissioners, when sitting as a court, has the power to punish for contempt. The act itself provides "that said board of commissioners shall have the same power and authority to punish for contempt of their court as other courts of said county." Whether or not the board of commissioners has the power to punish the tax collector for contempt because of a failure on his part to comply with a notice to appear before the board with the books and papers appertaining to his office, it is not necessary to determine. It does not appear, either from the notice served upon him or from any allegation in his petition, that the commissioners contemplate punishing him for the alleged contempt otherwise than by a fine of $25. If they have such power, then of course he is not entitled to an injunction to prevent their exercising it. If they have no such power, then, if they do impose a fine upon him, he can refuse to pay it, and, if an attempt is made to collect it by the issuance and levy of an execution upon his property, he can interpose an affidavit of illegality and prevent the collection of the fine. So in neither event would he be entitled to an injunction. For remedies which the law clearly provides for a case in which a tax collector or county treasurer fails or refuses "to render an account of [his] official actings and doings respecting the county tax and funds," etc., "after being notified so to do by the proper officer or officers," see Pol. Code 1895, § 419. Whether these remedies are exclusive or not need not now be decided.

It is very clear that, under the case presented by this record, the plaintiff was not entitled to the extraordinary relief for which he prayed.

DOUGLAS COUNTY v. SAYER, Tax Collector.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1904.)

APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. Irrespective of the question whether the petitioner in the court below would have been entitled to an injunction upon proof of the facts alleged in its petition, the judgment must be affirmed, for the simple reason that the evidence upon which the case was tried is not before this court. No evidence is incorporated in the bill of exceptions, nor is there before us any brief of evidence, approved by the trial judge and made a part of the record.

FISH, P. J. Irrespective of the question whether the petitioner in the court below would have been entitled to an injunction upon proof of the facts alleged in its petition, the judgment must be affirmed, for the simple reason that the evidence upon which the case was tried is not before this court. No evidence is incorporated in the bill of exceptions, nor is there before us any brief of evidence, approved by the trial judge and made a part of the record. The plaintiff in error has specified, as part of the record material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of, "the brief of evidence specified in the cross-bill of exceptions," with the statement that it need not be sent up except in that part of the record; and the clerk has sent up, with the record accompanying the "cross-bill of exceptions," what purport to be copies of certain affidavits and documents, which form no part of a brief of evidence approved by the trial judge, and none of which is even verified by him as having been introduced in evidence at the hearing. We suppose they were sent up by the clerk because they were specified by one of the parties to the case as parts of the record material to a clear understanding of the errors complained of. They could not become parts of the record by being so specified, and hence the clerk had no authority to treat them as such, and to thus transmit them to this court. Sayer v. Brown (Ga.) 46 S. E. 649, and cit.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

SAYER, Tax Collector, v. DOUGLAS COUNTY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1904.)

APPEAL—REVIEW.

1. This case is controlled by the decision this day rendered in Sayer v. Brown, 46 S. E. 649.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Douglas County; A. L. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by W. A. Sayer, tax collector, against Douglas county and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

B. G. Griggs, Roberts & Hutcheson and J. S. James, for plaintiff in error. W. A. James and J. D. Kilpatrick, for defendants in error.

FISH, P. J. The present bill of exceptions assigns error upon the judgment of the court below, in refusing to grant the extraordinary relief prayed for by Sayer, the plaintiff in error, in what is called by the parties a "cross-bill" in the case of Douglas County v. Sayer (Ga.) ubi supra. Upon an examination of the record we find that every material allegation of fact in this cross-bill, relied upon for the relief therein prayed for, except one, was denied in the answer thereto. As the evidence upon which the case was tried, for the reason stated in the case of Douglas County v. Sayer, is not before us, we cannot consider any question which this bill of exceptions seeks to present, which depends upon facts which were in dispute. The allegation admitted by the answer was one in reference to a certain notice which the county commissioners had served upon Sayer as tax collector, requiring him, on a designated date, to appear before them, with the books, receipts, etc., pertaining to his office, and to make a full and complete settlement with the county. In this case the constitutionality of the act of July 30, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 332), conferring exclusive jurisdiction upon the commissioners of Douglas county over certain county matters, including the examination, auditing, and settlement of the accounts of the tax collector of the county, is attacked upon the same grounds as those contained in the petition which was under consideration in Sayer v. Brown (this day decided), 46 S. E. 649, and upon two additional grounds. All of these grounds, which appear in both cases, and which were properly presented, have already been passed upon in the former case, and held to be without merit. One of the additional grounds which appears in this cross-petition has not even been alluded to in the brief of counsel for plaintiff in error, and we therefore treat it as having been abandoned. Jones v. Peterson, 117 Ga. 60, 43 S. E. 417. The allegation in reference to the other additional ground, which has been argued in the brief, is so vague, indefinite, and obscure as not to present any constitutional question for determination. A mere general allegation that a given act of the Legislature is void presents no question for consideration by a court; and an allegation that a designated act is unconstitutional, without indicating the particular constitutional provision which it is claimed the act violates, is equally worthless. Sayer v. Brown, supra, and citations.

There is no merit whatever in the contention that the county commissioners have no authority to meet at any other time than the first Tuesday in each month. Section 11 of the act provides: "That said board of commissioners shall meet on the first Tuesday in each month, and at the call of the chairman when the public business so requires." Under this provision the board is required to meet on the first Tuesday in each month, and can lawfully meet, when the public business so requires, at the call of the chairman, on a day other than the first Tuesday of a month. We do not think that the mere service upon the tax collector of the notice referred to in this opinion would have entitled him to an injunction, even if the act in question had been shown to be unconstitutional, but, in any view of the case, it is controlled by the decision in Sayer v. Brown, above cited.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

ALABAMA MIDLAND RY. CO. v. GUILFORD.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 15, 1904.)

NONSUIT—CARRIERS—INJURY TO PASSENGER—DEGREE OF CARE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where certain allegations in a plaintiff's petition were admitted in the original answer of the defendant, but subsequently the answer was amended by striking therefrom these admissions and denying the truth of the allegations, and on the trial the plaintiff tendered in evidence the admissions contained in the original answer, and the defendant introduced no evidence to explain or controvert them, a motion for a nonsuit, on the ground that these allegations were not supported by the evidence, was properly overruled.

2. In a common-law suit for damages against a railroad company, brought in this state, on account of injuries received in Alabama, the rule of the common law applicable to the case as interpreted by the courts of this state should be given in charge to the jury. It was error, in such a case, to charge that the degree of diligence required of a railroad company as a carrier of passengers is "the highest degree of care and diligence known to skilled persons engaged in that business."

3. It is the duty of a railroad company, in equipping its trains, to use such appliances as are up to the standard of those in general use and reasonably adapted for the purposes for which they were intended; but the law does not require that such appliances shall be of "the most approved pattern in use."

4. It is error requiring the grant of a new trial for the court, in a suit for damages growing out of the alleged negligence of the defendant, to charge the jury that certain acts or omissions of the defendant would be negligent, such acts or omissions not being negligence per se,

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Decatur County; W. N. Spence, Judge.

Action by J. S. Guilford against the Alabama Midland Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

T. S. Hawes and D. H. Pope, for plaintiff in error. Toomer & Reynolds and W. M. Harrell, for defendant in error.

CANDLER, J. The plaintiff below sued the defendant railroad company for damages on account of personal injuries, and was awarded a verdict for $5,000. The defendant made a motion for a new trial on various grounds, its motion was overruled, and it excepted.

1. The plaintiff in his petition alleged that, prior to the time his injuries were received, a part of the line of railroad now owned and operated by the defendant company had been owned by an Alabama corporation, and the other part by a Georgia corporation, but that these two corporations had been merged and their property consolidated, and the suit was brought against the corporation as thus constituted. In its original answer the defendant admitted these allegations, but by an amendment it sought to "take back" this admission, and averred that it "is composed of two separate, independent, legal entities, each dependent for its existence upon the separate and independent acts of incorporation by the several states of Georgia and Alabama." At the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence a certified copy of a memorandum and agreement of merger and consolidation of the Alabama Midland Railway Company of Alabama and the Alabama Midland Railway Company of Georgia, "consolidating, uniting, and merging said companies as one, under the name of the 'Alabama Midland Railway Company,' from and after the date of filing the same with the secretaries of state of Alabama and Georgia." This was accompanied by a certificate of the Secretary of State of Georgia, showing that the memorandum of consolidation had been filed in his office. As to whether it was ever filed in the office of the Secretary of State of Alabama the record is silent. The plaintiff also put in evidence the admission, in the defendant's original sworn answer, that his allegations on this subject were true. No evidence was introduced by the defendant to support the averments of its amended plea and contradict the evidence offered by the plaintiff; but at the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence the defendant made a motion for a nonsuit, and the refusal of this motion is assigned as error.

We do not deem it necessary to consider whether the showing that the memorandum of merger above referred to was filed in the office of the Secretary of State of Georgia, in the absence of evidence that a similar memorandum was filed in the office of the Secretary of State of Alabama, would be sufficient to establish the contention of the plaintiff that the two companies had been consolidated. The defendant, by its sworn plea, admitted the allegation of merger contained in the petition; and while, as was held when the case was here before (114 Ga. 627, 40 S.

El. 794), it was not thereby estopped to amend by striking this admission and denying the truth of the allegation, the contents of the original plea were admissible in evidence as an admission in judicio, and, in the absence of some effort to contradict or explain that admission, this evidence is certainly sufficient to withstand a motion for nonsuit. As was said by the Chief Justice when the case was here before, the withdrawal by the defendant of its admissions of the truth of the plaintiff's allegations "would not have prevented the plaintiff from introducing them in evidence as showing prima facie what was admitted, but . . . it would have given the defendant an opportunity to explain and disprove them." The defendant in the present case introduced no evidence whatever to show that its original admissions were incorrect, and therefore they must, for the purposes of this investigation, be taken as true. See, on this subject, Lydia Pinkham Med. Co. v. Gibbs, 108 Ga. 138, 33 S. E. 945.

2. Complaint is also made, in the motion for new trial, of the following charge of the court: "The law requires of persons engaged in the carriage of passengers by railroad the highest degree of care and diligence known to skilled persons engaged in that business." This charge follows almost literally a decision of the Supreme Court of Alabama, in which state the plaintiff's injuries were received. The plaintiff's action was not brought upon any particular statute, but rests upon his common-law right to recover damages. The common law as to the degree of diligence required of the defendant was therefore applicable to this case; and, as has been frequently ruled by this court, in determining what the common law on a given subject is, the decision of the Georgia courts, rather than those of some other jurisdiction, must be followed. Our own Code section on the subject of extraordinary diligence as applied to railroads is merely declaratory and explanatory of the common law. Civ. Code 1895, § 2899, defines extraordinary diligence to be "that extreme care and caution which very prudent and thoughtful persons use in securing and preserving their own property"; and, while this rule applies particularly to diligence in the preservation of property, it has always been recognized as extending with equal force to diligence to prevent injury to the person. Under the uniform decisions of this court, the degree of care required of a carrier of passengers is somewhere between the comparative and the superlative. A distinction is drawn between "very great" and "greatest." Thus, in East Tenn. R. Co. v. Miller, 95 Ga. 738, 22 S. E. 660, it was held error to charge that a railroad company is required to observe the utmost care and diligence for the safe carriage of passengers. See, also, Florida R. Co. v. Lucas, 110 Ga. 123, 35 S. E. 283. Taking the Georgia law, then, as applicable to this case, it follows that the rule of diligence laid down by the trial judge, viz., "the highest degree of care and diligence known to skilled persons engaged in that business," was far too sweeping, and placed upon the defendant company a burden greater than that imposed by the law.

3. Complaint is also made of the following charge: "You will then determine whether the evidence shows that the defendant company did have and was maintaining a good headlight on that night; one that was up to date; the most improved pattern in use up to that time. If you find that they have shown that, then you would not be authorized to find a verdict for the plaintiff on that ground." In its answer the defendant averred, in reply to the allegation of the petition that the headlight on the engine when the plaintiff's injuries were received was dim and otherwise defective, that on the occasion in question it "had a splendid headlight of the latest improved style." In view of this averment of the plea, we are not prepared to hold that the charge complained of is error of such a character as to require the grant of a new trial, especially since the court elsewhere in the charge correctly instructed the jury on this subject, so that it is by no means likely that they were misled. But the charge complained of was inaccurate, and, as the case is to be tried again, we call attention to it in order that it may not be repeated at the next trial. The defendant was required to use a headlight that was up to the standard of those in general use and well suited for the purposes for which it was intended; and it was not necessary, in order to relieve it, that it should show that the headlight used on the occasion of the plaintiff's injuries was of "the most approved pattern in use up to that time."

4. The plaintiff's injuries were occasioned by the train on which he was riding running into a tree which had been blown across the track in a windstorm that took place some time prior to the passage of the train. Whether the tree was on the defendant's right of way, and whether, previously to the time it was blown down, it was so visibly unsound as to make it incumbent on the railroad company, in the exercise of the diligence required of it by law, to remove the tree, were sharply contested questions. The court charged the jury: "If you should find that although the tree in question stood outside of the right of way of the railroad track, just in the edge of it, just outside of it, if you should find that it was an unsound tree, and that there was evidence of its unsoundness that was or could have been visible to the employees of the company, and that it was in reach of the railroad track, and that it was a tree that any ordinarily prudent man, in the exercise of ordinary care and skill, could have discovered was dangerous to passengers—liable to be blown down by an ordinary windstorm—then I charge you that the company would be guilty of negligence in not removing such a tree as that, if the evidence shows that it was such a tree; and, if you believe that that negligence contributed to the injury of the plaintiff, you should find in favor of the plaintiff." Clearly, this was error requiring the grant of a new trial. It is never permissible for the trial judge to instruct the jury that given acts are negligence, unless the acts are such as to constitute them negligence per se. This is so well settled by the decisions of this court that we deem it necessary to cite only one recent case on the subject, in which this principle of law is fully discussed and the authorities bearing thereon set out. See Central R. Co. v. McKenney, 116 Ga. 13, 42 S. E. 229, and citations; a. c. 118 Ga. 535, 45 S. E. 430. The motion for a new trial contained numerous grounds, but only those which have been noticed in the foregoing require discussion here. The charge of the court, with the exceptions heretofore pointed out, was free from any material error, and any minor inaccuracies which it may have contained will, we are sure, in the light of what is here laid down, be remedied when the case is tried again.

AMERICUS GROCERY CO. v. BRACKETT & CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)

SALE—WARRANTY—DESCRIPTION—NONSUIT—DAMAGES—DEMURRER—WAIVER.

1. A sale of a chattel by a particular description imports a warranty that the article sold is of the kind specified.
2. Whether, in a sale of "Texas red rust-proof seed oats," a particular variety of oats, regardless of where they were produced, was intended, or whether, because of special value derived from peculiarities of soil and climate, the term included only those raised in the state of Texas, was a question of fact for the jury.
3. A conflict in the plaintiff's evidence as to the trade meaning of the term did not of itself authorize the grant of a nonsuit.
4. Where there is a breach of warranty in the sale of chattels, the buyer can resell on the same day or retain the goods at the market price, thereby fixing the exact amount of the damages to which he is entitled for the breach.
5. Where goods inferior to those ordered are delivered, the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price of those ordered and the market price of those delivered, at the time and place of delivery.
6. The fact that the inferior goods delivered subsequently increase in value, and are resold by the plaintiff at a price above that paid, does not deprive him of the cause of action which accrued, and became fixed as to the measure of damages, on the day of the breach.
7. Where a defendant files a special demurrer, and without insisting on a ruling thereon goes to trial on the issue raised by the petition and answer, he thereby waives any rights under the demurrer.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

46 S.E.—42

Action by the Americus Grocery Company against Brackett & Co. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The plaintiff ordered from the defendant 10,000 bushels of "Texas red rust-proof seed oats." It alleges that the defendant delivered Indian Territory and Oklahoma raised oats; that the plaintiff did not know, and by the exercise of ordinary care could not have discovered, the difference when it received and paid for the same; that those delivered were worth from 10 to 15 cents a bushel less than those ordered at the time and place of delivery; and that it was entitled to recover $1,200 overpaid. One witness for the plaintiff testified that the oats, though raised in Indian Territory and Oklahoma, answered the trade meaning of "Texas red rust-proof seed oats." Other witnesses testified that the term included only those raised in Texas; that Texas grown oats had a special value for seed, derived from the peculiar climate and soil of that state; that Oklahoma and Indian Territory oats were used only as feed oats, and sold at a lower price. The market price of all oats advanced after the sale, and the plaintiff subsequently sold the oats bought at a price above that paid. At the conclusion of the evidence the defendant moved to dismiss the case on the grounds stated in the special demurrer, and because the plaintiff was not entitled to recover under the evidence. The case was dismissed, and the plaintiff excepted.

Shipp & Sheppard, for plaintiff in error.
Allen Fort & Son and E. A. Hawkins, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. Bargain and sale of a chattel of a particular description imports a warranty that the article sold is of that description. Miller v. Moore, 83 Ga. 684, 10 S. E. 360, 6 L. R. A. 374, 20 Am. St. Rep. 329; Civ. Code 1895, § 3558. It was for the jury to decide whether "Texas red rust-proof seed oats" described a specific variety, regardless of where they were raised, as "Irish" potatoes includes those raised outside of Ireland; or whether the trade meaning included those grown in the state of Texas, deriving their special value from the character of the soil and climate. One witness testified that oats raised in Indian Territory and Oklahoma came within the descriptive words; others that it meant only those raised in Texas. A conflict in the plaintiff's testimony did not of itself authorize the grant of a nonsuit. It proved its case as laid, and by going to trial on the issue raised by petition and answer the defendants waived any advantage which they could have taken by reason of their special demurrer.

Assuming that there was in fact a breach, a recovery would not be defeated because the price advanced, and several weeks later the plaintiff sold these oats raised in Oklahoma at a profit. The law does not allow the rights of the parties to depend upon the subsequent fluctuations of the market. Where there has been a breach, the measure of damages is fixed at the difference between the value of the goods ordered and those delivered at the time and place of the delivery. The amount which the plaintiff would be entitled to recover is not affected by the subsequent rise or decline in prices of those ordered or of those delivered; nor is it changed by the fact that the plaintiff subsequently resold at an increased or decreased price. Compare Berry v. Shannon, 98 Ga. 461, 25 N. E. 514, 58 Am. St. Rep. 313. Often in fact, and always in theory, the party who is damaged by such breach of a warranty of personal property can resell on the same day, or he can retain the goods at that day's market price, and the difference thus calculated represents his actual loss, as well as the measure of legal damage. If the goods thus retained decline in value, the amount he is entitled to recover is not increased; if the goods advance, the defendant's liability is not lessened. The rights and liabilities of each are fixed on that day, and subsequent changes in the value of the goods ordered or delivered are wholly immaterial. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2319, 3551, 3557.

1. 2. TRIAL—DISMISSAL—JUDGMENT ON DEMURRER—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—BREACH OF CONTRACT—INSTRUCTIONS—NEW TRIAL.

1. If the defendant calls in question by demurrer the sufficiency of the petition, and the court renders a decision holding that the petition sets forth a cause of action, so long as this decision stands unreversed the defendant is precluded from calling in question the sufficiency of the petition by oral motion to dismiss.

2. A judgment on demurrer, until reversed, concludes the parties upon all questions necessarily involved in the decision of the points raised in the demurrer.

3. A bill of exceptions specified, as a part of the record to be transmitted, "the motion for new trial." Held, that it was the duty of the clerk to transmit the original motion for a new trial and all amendments thereto.

4. The charges complained of were not erroneous for any of the reasons assigned, and especially is this true as to those which related to the cause of action and the measure of damages, when they are construed in the light of the fact that the defendant was concluded, by the judgment on the demurrer, as to the right of the plaintiff to recover and the character of the damages which should be recovered.

5. Neither a ground of a motion for a new trial assigning error upon the admission of evidence nor a similar assignment of error in a bill of exceptions will be considered, unless the evidence is set forth in such a manner that the question of its admissibility can be decided without reference to other parts of the record.

6. The evidence authorized the verdict. No material error has been made to appear by any sufficient assignment of error, and the discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial will not be controlled.

Error from City Court of Moultrie; W. A. Covington, Judge.

Action by Hutchins & Jenkins against the Georgia Northern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Little & Battle, Wm. Hammond, and W. S. Humphreys, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Mattox and Shipp & Kline, for defendants in error.

COBB, J. Hutchins & Jenkins brought suit in the city court of Moultrie against the Georgia Northern Railway Company, the allegations of their petition being in substance as follows: Defendant has injured and damaged plaintiffs in the sum of $12,500, by reason of the following facts: On January 3, 1900, defendant entered into a contract with the firm of McGehee & Co., whereby it agreed to extend, by January 3, 1901, its railroad to a point below the still of McNeill & Co., in said county, at which point is a sawmill of McGehee & Co. Said contract was, with the approval and consent of the defendant, transferred to plaintiffs by McGehee & Co. on October 1, 1900, a copy of the contract and transfer being attached to the petition as an exhibit. At the date of the contract the defendant had already constructed a tramroad near the location of plaintiffs' mill and within one mile thereof, and had been using and operating such road for the purpose of hauling freight. This road was in use when the contract was made, and the defendant received and accepted all the benefits and rights under the contract. On October 1, 1900, plaintiffs purchased from McGehee & Co. the location, plant, timber, and contract which they had obtained from the defendant, paying for the same the sum of $10,000, which was a fair price. Plaintiffs assumed and carried out all the obligations and duties owed by McGehee & Co. to the defendant. They delivered to the defendant all of the lumber cut by them and by their mill, and defendant accepted the lumber and hauled the same, and received from plaintiffs all freight charges specified in the contract, and plaintiffs continued to deliver lumber, and defendant to accept the freight charges, until it moved its track, as herein stated, and made it impossible to further carry out the contract. Before making the purchase from McGehee & Co., plaintiffs saw in person the president of the defendant company, who assured plaintiffs that the contract would be carried out, and urged plaintiffs to buy the contract and have it transferred to them. At the end of three months after the contract was transferred to plaintiffs, defendant tore up the track or line of road it had built to within half a mile of plaintiffs' mill, and since then have not had a track near them over which they could haul lumber for plaintiffs. On account of defendant's having removed its tramroad, leaving plaintiffs seven miles from the nearest railroad station, plaintiffs were compelled to move their mill to a new location two miles nearer a railroad. This was done at a cost of $1,000, made up as follows: Ten houses for employes at new location, $500; cost of moving mill and putting it down again, $300; cost of house for superintendent, $150; cost of barn and commissary, $50. Since the removal of the tramroad plaintiffs have had to haul with teams the cut of their mill five miles in order to reach a railroad. Plaintiffs hauled in this way 474,000 feet of lumber, at a cost of $1,422. Owing to extra cost of hauling, plaintiffs were forced to abandon 200,000 feet of saw logs, which after being cut down could not profitably be sold. By reason of inaccessibility to railroad these logs were a total loss, and were worth $600. By reason of the extra cost for the long haul to railroad, plaintiffs could cut only the large trees into lumber, the smaller trees being a total loss. On this account they sustained damage in the sum of $500. By reason of the removal of the track and failure of defendant to carry out its contract, plaintiffs' sawmill location was damaged and depreciated in the sum of $7,500, this depreciation resulting from the fact that, on account of the extra cost of hauling to the railroad, the business could not be profitably operated. Plaintiffs still have of the timber leased as above stated 1,400 acres that have not been cut, which will cut 5,600,000 feet, and to haul this timber to the railroad will cost $16,800, this extra cost being occasioned by the failure of the defendant to carry out its contract.

The contract referred to in the petition was attached thereto as an exhibit, and is in substance as follows: "John F. Pidcock, President of the Georgia Northern Railway Co." was "party of the first part," and McGehee & Co. party of the second part. McGehee & Co. obligated themselves to locate their sawmill on the line of the Georgia Northern Railroad at McNeill's still, or somewhere near that point, and to give the "Georgia Northern Railway Company" the hauling of all the lumber made from the McNeill purchase and the timber they may buy adjoining or near by such timber, except certain specified timber. "And the said John F. Pidcock, president of the aforesaid, hereby agrees to build, construct and equip a railroad to McNeill's still as early as practicable for the purpose of hauling said lumber;" also, to extend the railroad one mile beyond the still in a southerly direction, as McGehee & Co. may desire, within 12 months from date, and to give that company freight rates on all lumber shipped from their mill. McGehee & Co. were to pay certain freight rates and $2 per car for each car placed at their sawmill for the purpose of moving the lumber. If McGehee & Co. should fail to pay to McNeill & Co. a certain note for $2,500 due them, the timber was to revert to the "Georgia Northern Railway Company, or its president, John F. Pidcock, who is responsible for the payment of said note." The contract was signed, "John F. Pidcock, Pres. Ga. Northern Railroad Co., E. J. McGehee & Co." Indorsed on the contract was an assignment by McGehee & Co. to Hutchins & Jenkins of all right, title, and interest in the contract.

To this petition the defendant interposed a general demurrer on the grounds that no sufficient facts were alleged to authorize a recovery against defendant; that the petition shows on its face that the defendant neither has nor ever had any contract relations with plaintiffs, nor was ever under any legal duty to plaintiffs to do any of the acts or things, the performance of which makes the pretended cause of action against it; that the damages claimed in the petition are remote and speculative, and incapable of being recovered at law. The defendant also filed a special demurrer to several named paragraphs of the petition, amplifying and emphasizing the points raised in the general demurrer. These demurrers were overruled on July 17, 1902, after the petition had been amended, and exceptions pendente lite to this ruling were filed. The allegations of the defendant's answer were, in substance, as follows: Defendant denies that it has damaged plaintiffs in any sum whatever. Can neither admit nor deny that John F. Pidcock made or entered into the contract attached to the petition, but denies that the defendant ever made any such contract, and denies that the contract was transferred with its knowledge or consent. Avers that it did not remove the line of railway from the sawmill until the mill had ceased to supply sufficient lumber to enable it to retain such railroad. Avers that the damages claimed in the petition are too remote and speculative to be the basis of a recovery, and that defendant is in no way responsible for such damage.

The case came on for trial on June 11, 1903, and resulted in a verdict for the plaintiffs for $7,500. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled. It filed a bill of exceptions, assigning error upon the overruling of the motion for a new trial, and also upon certain rulings made at the trial, the bill of exceptions having been tendered and certified within the time allowed by law for this purpose. On the same day that this bill of exceptions was certified, the judge also certified another paper purporting to be a bill of exceptions, assigning error upon the exceptions pendente lite filed at the time of the judgment overruling the demurrer, but in this paper there was no assignment of error upon any ruling at the trial. Both bills of exceptions were served and filed and transmitted to this court. Before the case made by the bill of exceptions first above referred to was called, the plaintiff in error, by leave of the court, withdrew the bill of exceptions and record in the other case. If this bill of exceptions had not been withdrawn, it would have been dismissed, for the reason that it did not contain an assignment of error on any ruling made at the trial. See Barge v. Robinson, 115 Ga. 41, 41 S. E. 258.

1. In the case now under consideration the bill of exceptions specified, as a part of the record to be transmitted to this court, the general and special demurrers of the defendant, and they were transmitted as a part of the record. It did not appear what disposition had been made of these demurrers, and under the authority conferred upon this court by Civ. Code 1895, § 5536 (4), the clerk of the trial court was required to certify and transmit a copy of any judgment that might appear to have been made on those demurrers; and in response to this order there was transmitted to this court a certified copy of a judgment reciting that, an amendment having been allowed to the plaintiffs' petition, both the general and special demurrers were overruled, this judgment being dated July 17, 1902. This part of the record was necessary to a proper determination of the assignment of error in the bill of exceptions which complained that the court erred in overruling, at the trial, an oral motion to dismiss the case because the petition failed to set forth any cause of action. If the defendant had filed no demurrer to the petition, or had withdrawn the demurrers or failed to press the same, it had the undoubted right at the trial to make an oral motion to dismiss the case upon any ground which would be good in arrest of judgment. Civ. Code 1895, § 5046; McCook v. Crawford, 114 Ga. 339, 40 S. E. 225 and citations. But when the defendant, at the first term, filed demurrers, both general and special, and pressed the same to a decision, and a judgment was rendered overruling the demurrers, the question arises as to how far this judgment is conclusive between the parties as to the right of the plaintiffs to recover upon the facts alleged. It has been held that a judgment sustaining a general demurrer to a petition will bar a second suit for the same cause of action. Greene v. Central of Georgia Railway Company, 112 Ga. 859, 38 S. E. 360, and citations; Satterfield v. Spier, 114 Ga. 127 (3), 39 S. E. 980. If a judgment on a demurrer that a petition sets forth no cause of action will conclude the plaintiff in another suit against the defendant, it would seem that upon similar principles a judgment upon a demurrer that a petition does not set forth a cause of action will conclude the defendant in the same case, so long as such judgment stands unreversed. See, in this connection, Kelly v. Strouse, 116 Ga. 874 (7), 891 (7), 43 S. E. 288. In the case just cited the following language appears: "If the defendant calls in question the sufficiency of the petition by demurrer, as he has a right to do, and the court renders an erroneous decision holding that the petition sets forth a cause of action, when in truth it does not, and the defendant acquiesces in this decision, of course no one will contend that, after the time allowed by law has expired for bringing under review this erroneous decision, the defendant can be heard to say that the petition sets forth no cause of action." There was no error in overruling the motion to dismiss. The judgment on demurrer is conclusive upon the question as to whether the petition sets forth a cause of action.

2. A judgment on demurrer, so long as it stands unreversed, is conclusive on the parties as to all questions which were necessarily involved in the decision of the points raised by the demurrer. The demurrer in the present case not only raised in a general way the question as to the sufficiency of the plaintiffs' allegations to authorize a recovery, but it specifically raised the question that on the face of the petition there did not appear to be any contractual relation between the defendant and the plaintiffs which would authorize the plaintiffs to recover damages for the alleged wrongful acts committed by the defendant. The question was distinctly made by demurrer to the whole petition, as well as by demurrers to different paragraphs, that the damages claimed were too remote and speculative and incapable of computation, and generally of such a character as not to be the basis of a legal recovery. In other words, in passing upon the demurrers the court was compelled to decide two questions: (1) Have the plaintiffs alleged such a state of facts as to show that in law the defendant is liable in damages to it? and (2) are the damages claimed of such a character as to be properly the subject of a legal recovery? The judgment overruling the demurrers decided these questions in favor of the plaintiffs, and this decision is the law of this case, whether right or wrong. A great part of the brief of counsel for the plaintiff in error is devoted to a discussion of the question as to whether the facts alleged are sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and whether the damages sought to be recovered are of such a character as to be the basis of a legal recovery. It is not proper for us to determine either of these questions, nor do we express or intimate any opinion in reference to the same, as they are concluded by the judgment on the demurrers.

3. The bill of exceptions specified as a part of the record "the motion for new trial." The clerk transmitted a motion for a new trial based upon the general grounds only. Before the call of the case, counsel for the plaintiff in error filed a suggestion of a diminution of the record, in which it was set forth that there was in the court below an amendment to the motion for a new trial which had not been transmitted. It may be that under authority of Civ. Code 1895, § 5536 (4), this court would require such an amendment to be transmitted whenever it became apparent that it was necessary to a proper determination of the case, even though the amendment was not in any way specified in the bill of exceptions. But in any event a specification of "the motion for a new trial" includes the original motion and all amendments thereto.

4. There are various assignments upon different parts of the charge. In one, complaint is made that the court charged the law of recoupment; but, as it appears from the motion that this charge was made at the request of the defendant, of course it has no right to complain. Complaint is also made that the court charged the jury that "the jury may also consider the number of witnesses, although not necessarily with the greater number." This charge is unintelligible, but reference to the charge which is contained in the record shows that the judge, in concluding his remarks upon what is meant by a preponderance of the evidence, used this language: "The jury may also consider the number of witnesses, although the preponderance is not necessarily with the greater number." There was evidently a mistake in copying the charge excepted to in the motion for a new trial and bill of exceptions, the words "preponderance is" having been omitted after the word "although." But treating the extract from the charge in the record as the one actually given, when the part of the charge referring to the subject of the preponderance of the evidence is considered as a whole, there was nothing in the charge complained of to require the granting of a new trial. The jury could not have been misled by it if they had been attentive to other parts of the charge. The other portions of the charge which are alleged to be erroneous were not so for any of the reasons assigned, in the light of the fact that the judgment on the demurrers concludes the defendant, not only as to the right of the plaintiffs to recover, but also as to the elements of damage to be considered in determining the amount of the recovery, provided, of course, the allegations in reference to the cause of action and the damages sought to be recovered were established to the satisfaction of the jury by competent evidence.

5. The third ground of the motion for a new trial was as follows: "Because the court erred in submitting in evidence, over defendant's objection, that portion of E. J. McGehee's answer to direct interrogatory No. 5, in which the witness states that 'the president, Mr. John F. Pidcock, was speaking for the company'; defendant's objection being that said answer was irrelevant and the expression of a mere opinion or deduction of the witness." There is an assignment of error in substantially the same language in the bill of exceptions. Neither the assignment in the motion nor that in the bill of exceptions can be considered, for the reason that it does not appear what was the matter about which Pidcock was speaking. Reference is made to direct interrogatory No. 5 for this purpose, but it is well settled that this court will not look beyond the motion for a new trial or the assignment of error in the bill of exceptions, as the case may be, to ascertain the facts necessary to pass intelligently upon the assignment. See Seaboard Air-Line Railway v. Phillips, 117 Ga. 98, 106, 43 S. E. 494, and cases cited. There are numerous other assignments of error upon rulings on evidence, which cannot be considered, for the reason that the evidence objected to is not set forth; others, for the reason that it is not set forth with sufficient certainty; others, for the reason that the objection made to the admission of the evidence is not stated; and still others, for the reason that it does not appear that the objection set forth in the assignment of error was made at the time the evidence was offered.

6. Error is assigned in the motion for a new trial and in the bill of exceptions upon the admission in evidence of a written assignment or transfer signed by "John F. Pidcock, President Georgia Northern Railway Company," of what was described as "the within and foregoing lease," etc. The objection made to this evidence was that it was irrelevant, did not have the corporate seal of the railway company, and there was no evidence that John F. Pidcock had authority from the railway company to execute the assignment. Neither in the bill of exceptions nor in the motion for a new trial is the paper assigned nor the substance of it set forth. It is simply referred to in each instance as "the instrument of bargain and sale, etc., from N. McK. McNeill and T. I. McNeill to John F. Pidcock, President, etc." It is impossible to pass upon the assignment of error without having before us the paper to which the transfer relates; and as this is not embodied, either literally or in substance, either in the motion for a new trial or the bill of exceptions, the assignment of error will not be considered.

After a careful consideration of all the assignments of error relating to the admission of evidence, we find no error which would, in our opinion, require the granting of a new trial. Objection to the evidence introduced to prove the amount of damages was not well taken, for the reason that the plaintiff simply proved the character of damages alleged in the petition, and the judgment on the demurrers concluded the defendant on the question as to whether these were the subject of a lawful recovery. After a careful examination of the entire record, we find no sufficient reason for reversing the judgment. The evidence authorized the verdict, and, no material error having been committed, we will not interfere with the discretion of the trial judge in refusing to grant a new trial.

WILLIAMS v. TOWN OF SYLVESTER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CERTIORARI—ORDINANCES—VIOLATION.

1. Section 765 of the Penal Code, providing that the writ of certiorari shall not be granted from the judgment of a county court in criminal cases, "unless the accused shall file his affidavit stating that he has not had a fair trial and has been wrongfully and illegally convicted," has no application to a writ of certiorari sued out from the judgment of a municipal court.

2. Section 11 of the act approved December 21, 1898 (Acts 1898, p. 273), incorporating the town of Sylvester, empowers the mayor "to see that the laws of said town, the ordinances, the by-laws, the rules and regulations, and orders of the council are duly executed," and to "impose fines, not to exceed the sum of fifty dollars," upon offenders, or sentence them to imprisonment or labor on the public works for a term not to exceed thirty days, "whenever they have violated any of the laws, by-laws, rules, or orders of the council, or the ordinances of said town," but the act nowhere contemplates that he shall have power to impose punishment for a specific offense not made penal by the ordinances or other laws of the town.

3. The allegations of the petition for certiorari were such as to require a consideration of the case on its merits, and the judgment of dismissal on the technical ground that the petition was insufficient in law was erroneous.

SCOTT et al. v. WHIPPLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)

RECEIVERS—DEPOSIT IN BANK—LIABILITY OF SECURITIES.

1. In a suit pending in Dooly superior court, in which a receiver had been appointed, the receiver was, by a special order of court, directed to deposit certain funds in a named bank, "upon said bank giving good and solvent bond and security to the receiver for the forthcoming of said money; said security to be approved by the receiver." The deposit was made, the receiver having first taken a bond with the plaintiffs in error as securities; the condition of the bond being that the depository bank "shall well and truly account for all moneys, funds, and notes which may be deposited with it by said receiver, and shall pay and apply such money and funds as directed by said receiver promptly upon his demands, and do and perform its functions as depository . . . according to the true intent and meaning of" the order directing the receiver to make the deposit. The receiver at first made a demand deposit, but subsequently, at the solicitation of an officer of the bank, and with no consideration moving to him, changed it to a time deposit bearing no interest. Before the time certificate matured, the bank failed, and the receiver made demand upon it and upon the securities on the bond for the amount then on deposit to his credit as receiver, which was refused, and he brought suit for the breach of the bond. The defendants introduced no evidence. Held, it was not error to direct a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount of money shown by the undisputed evidence to have been on deposit to the receiver's credit when the bank failed. In the light of the court's order, which was recited in the bond, and of the express condition of that instrument, the independent transaction between the receiver and the bank, by which a demand deposit was changed to a time deposit, in no way affected the obligation of the securities on the bond, which was that the money on deposit should be forthcoming whenever the receiver should demand it.

HORNE et al. v. MULLIS.

CONSTRUCTIVE TRUST—ENFORCEMENT—PLEADING—DEMURRER.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Pulaski County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by Julia Horne and others against W. J. Mullis. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

W. L. Grice & Sons, for plaintiffs in error. J. H. Martin, for defendant in error.

COBB, J. Julia Horne and others brought an action against Mullis, alleging in their petition: Plaintiffs are the widow and children of Isaac Horne. On January 1, 1890, Isaac Horne executed and delivered to the Guaranty Company of Georgia a mortgage deed to certain described tracts of land to secure the payment of a loan of $600. The land mortgaged was worth $2,500, and is still worth that sum. After executing the mortgage, to wit, on July 24, 1890, Isaac Horne executed to petitioners a warranty deed to the same land described in the mortgage, reserving to himself the use and control of the land during his life. This deed was duly recorded. The mortgage debt not being paid at maturity, the mortgage was duly foreclosed and the property advertised for sale about the year 1896. A few days before the sale was to take place, Isaac Horne entered into an arrangement with the defendant, who was his son-in-law, under which the defendant was to buy the land, and permit Horne to redeem it within two years, by paying the amount of the bid, together with interest and the necessary expenses which had been incurred. At the time this agreement was entered into, the defendant, Mullis, had actual notice of the deed from Horne to petitioners. The purpose of Horne in making the agreement with defendant for a reconveyance of the property was to preserve for himself a home for life, and to secure the land for his wife and children, with the incumbrance of the mortgage removed. The land was sold under the mortgage execution, and bought by the defendant, who had no competitor at the sale, for a sum equal to the amount of the debt and costs and expenses. The land was worth $2,500 at the time of the sale. The defendant received a deed from the sheriff to the land, but Isaac Horne remained in possession thereof until his death, and plaintiffs have been in possession since that time. Isaac Horne paid defendant $90 in 1897, and the same amount in 1898, and petitioner Julia Horne paid him $90 in 1899. While these payments were called "rent," they were really intended as payments on the redemption money agreed to be paid to the defendant, as heretofore stated. A short time before the death of Isaac Horne, which occurred on October 21, 1898, and a few days before the time for redemption under the agreement expired, he made arrangements to get the money and redeem the land before the time for redemption should expire. The defendant, upon hearing of this arrangement, went to Horne, who was then in his last sickness, and told him not to give himself any concern about the redemption of the land; that he (defendant) wanted nothing but the money which he had expended, with interest, and, if the lands were not redeemed, he would sell enough of them to get back his money, and would then turn over to Isaac Horne, if living, the surplus, and, if he was not in life, then to his wife and children; and to this Horne agreed. Relying upon these promises of the defendant, Isaac Horne abandoned his purpose of getting the money and redeeming the land while yet he had time to do so. Within a few days after these promises were made, and after the time for redemption had expired, Isaac Horne died, without having taken any further steps in the matter. Some time in the fall of 1899 the defendant sold a portion of the land for $1,600. He still holds the title to the remainder of the land, 102½ acres, which is worth about $5 or $6 per acre, and refuses to account to petitioners for the surplus of the money received from the sale of a portion of the land, or to make a reconveyance of the balance. Isaac Horne died intestate, and there has been no administration on his estate, nor is there any necessity for any, there being no debts. The petition prays for an accounting, that defendant be required to make a conveyance to petitioners of the portion of the land to which he holds title, and that he be also required to pay to petitioners the balance remaining from the sum received from the sale of a portion of the land, after deducting the amount of his bid at the sale under the mortgage foreclosure, with interest and costs and expenses. To the petition the defendant filed a general demurrer, and also special demurrers to different paragraphs of the same. The court sustained the demurrers and dismissed the petition. The plaintiffs excepted.

As against a general demurrer, the petition set forth a cause of action. See Burnett v. Vandiver, 56 Ga. 302. The distinction between this case and Roughton v. Rawlings, 88 Ga. 819, 16 S. E. 89, is that in the latter case the two persons who made the agreement to divide the land after the sale had no interest whatever in the property which was to be sold. The distinction is manifest when we consider the opening sentences of the opinion by Mr. Chief Justice Bleckley, on pages 821 and 822, 88 Ga., page 89, 16 S. E., where he says: "The plaintiff has parted with nothing which he possessed or owned before. He has the same amount of money and property, and has rendered no service, nor caused any to be rendered. What he has missed by reason of the defendant's refusal to perform the verbal agreement is only the gain which he would have derived from the performance if the defendant had not violated his promise. The mere right to bid for the property at the executor's sale was not itself property, nor the subject-matter of bargain and sale. The nonexercise of that right by forbearing to bid was therefore not a consideration for the agreement which will take the case out of the statute of frauds by reason of part performance." The case should not have been dismissed, and the judgment must therefore be reversed.

A reversal of the judgment on the general demurrer renders it necessary to pass upon the questions made by the special demurrers, as the judge sustained all of the demurrers.

There was no merit in the demurrer which raised the question that copies of certain deeds and other papers were not exhibited to the petition. The allegations in reference to these papers were mere matters of inducement, and did not constitute the cause of action, nor was the relief prayed for based entirely thereon. Under such circumstances, it was not necessary to exhibit copies of such papers to the petition. Harp v. Investment Company, 108 Ga. 179, 33 S. E. 998; Civ. Code, § 4963. Especially would this be the case when the papers referred to were described in the petition in such a way as to render intelligible the allegations referring to them.

There was no merit in that ground of the demurrer which raised the point that Horne and his wife were tenants of defendant, and therefore could not deny his title. The petition alleged that certain amounts had been paid to defendant by Horne and his wife in the name of rent, but it was distinctly averred that these payments were not in fact rent, and were not intended as such. There is nothing in the petition which would preclude the plaintiffs from showing that no relation of landlord and tenant ever existed between Horne and the defendant; or between the widow of Horne and defendant. All of paragraph 6 should have been stricken, except that which alleged that the conveyance referred to conveyed the same land. Paragraphs 12 and 13 should have been stricken. All of paragraph 15 should have been stricken, except that which alleged the value of the land. Paragraph 20 should be stricken, unless the plaintiffs, by amendment, set forth the names of the persons therein referred to. The petition, with these paragraphs stricken, is set forth in substance above. It stated facts sufficient to require the defendant to file an answer.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, O. J., absent on account of sickness.

ATLANTIC & B. R. CO. v. PENNY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)

ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—EXCEPTIONS PENDENTE LITE—CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—RIGHT OF WAY—DISCRETION OF RAILROAD COMPANY.

1. Before this court can consider exceptions pendente lite, an assignment of error thereon must be made in the bill of exceptions, or filed in this court on or before the call of the case. The failure to assign error in one of these methods will result in a dismissal of the writ of error, whether it be sued out upon a main or a cross bill of exceptions.

2. In a proceeding under Civ. Code 1895, § 4657 et seq., for the purpose of acquiring private property for public purposes, the sole question to be passed upon by the assessors or a jury in the superior court on appeal is the amount of compensation to be paid. Whether the quantity of land sought to be taken is necessary and proper for the purpose for which it is sought is a question not involved in this proceeding.

3. Under the general railroad law in the present Code the railroad company is allowed to appropriate for a right of way a strip of land not exceeding in width 200 feet. Whether a less quantity shall be taken for this purpose is left to the discretion of the company.

4. Under the general railroad law referred to in the preceding note, a railroad company is authorized to take, for the purpose of cuttings and embankments and for obtaining gravel and other material, as much land as may be necessary for these purposes, and it is authorized to acquire, for stations, terminal facilities, and the like, such quantity of land as may be necessary and proper for these purposes; the company being vested with a discretion to determine, in the first instance, how much land is necessary. If the company abuses the discretion thus vested in it, a court of equity may by injunction so restrain it as to keep it within the limits of its charter.

Error from Superior Court, Dooly County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Proceedings by the Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company against Z. T. Penny. From the judgment, both parties bring error. Judgment on bill of exceptions of railroad company reversed. Writ of error sued out by defendant dismissed.

D. A. R. Crum, for plaintiff. J. L. Sweat, J. G. Jones, and W. F. George, for defendant.

COBB, J. The Atlantic & Birmingham Railroad Company instituted proceedings to condemn "two hundred and fifty (250) feet right of way, sixty feet on the east, and one hundred and ninety feet on west, side of the center line," through a described tract of land, the property of Z. T. Penny. A majority of the assessors chosen in the manner prescribed by law filed an award fixing the damages to be paid at $400. The third assessor refused to agree to this, and filed with the award a writing stating that in his opinion the amount should have been $500. Penny entered an appeal from the award of the assessors to the superior court. When the case came on for a hearing in the superior court Penny filed a written motion to dismiss the entire proceeding, upon the ground that the amount of land sought to be taken was not necessary for the right of way, stations, terminal facilities, cuttings, embankments, and other purposes for which the railroad company could lawfully take private property; that under its charter 100 feet was all that could be condemned for a right of way, and that 50 feet on each side of the track would be ample for all of the legitimate purposes of the company; and that the real purpose of the condemnation was to secure property to be leased for factories, plants, business houses, etc. The plaintiff then amended its proceedings by alleging that the land sought to be condemned was necessary and required, not only as a right of way, but for a freight and passenger depot and purposes therewith connected, including station grounds, yards, tracks, warehouses, etc. The court allowed the amendment, and then overruled the motion to dismiss. Penny filed exceptions pendente lite to these rulings. The case proceeded to trial, and resulted in a finding by the jury that the company was entitled to condemn only 200 feet, and fixing the value of the land embraced within these limits at $275 per acre. Judgment was entered on this verdict. The company made a motion for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was contrary to law and the evidence. The court overruled the motion, and the company excepted. Penny filed a paper which recited the demurrer to the proceedings, the trial of the case, the motion to dismiss, the amendment by the railroad company, and the rulings of the court on the questions thus raised. The paper also recited that exceptions pendente lite had been filed to these rulings, and specified, as parts of the record to be transmitted, the motion to dismiss, the amendment, order of the judge thereon, and exceptions pendente lite. This paper was certified by the judge as a bill of exceptions, but it did not contain any assignment of error on any ruling or decision of the court or on the exceptions pendente lite, nor was error assigned on these exceptions in this court after the case reached here.

1. Whether the paper filed by Penny be considered as a cross-bill of exceptions, or as an independent bill, it will have to be dismissed for want of any assignment of error. Jackson v. Fitzpatrick, 114 Ga. 364, 40 S. E. 234. Even if it had contained an assignment of error upon the exceptions pendente lite, it would have been defective as an independent bill, because in such bill of exceptions "there must be some legal assignment of error on what transpired at the trial term, in order to bring up an assignment of error upon exceptions pendente lite filed at the appearance term." Barge v. Robinson, 115 Ga. 41, 41 S. E. 258, and cit. The exceptions pendente lite not being before us, it cannot be determined in the present case whether proceedings instituted under Civ. Code 1895, § 4657 et seq., for the purpose of condemning private property for a public use, are amendable at all, or whether in the present case they were amendable in the particular indicated in the foregoing statement of facts.

2-4. Private property cannot be taken for public use unless there is a necessity for such taking; for the taking of property when not at all necessary for a public purpose, or the taking of more property than is necessary for a given public purpose, is in effect a taking for private use. Randolph on Em. Dom. §§ 185, 186; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 1057; 3 Ell. R. R. § 952; New Central Coal Co. v. Coal & Iron Co., 37 Md. 537, 539; Matter of N. Y. Cen. R. Co., 66 N. Y. 407; Highland Boy Gold Min. Co. v. Strickley, 116 Fed. 852 (5), 54 C. C. A. 186. Under the present Constitution of this state the general rule is, so far as private corporations are concerned, that the General Assembly shall pass upon this question of necessity by general laws providing what classes of corporations shall be authorized to exercise the power of eminent domain. Civ. Code 1895, § 5780. In many instances where it is proper for the power of eminent domain to be conferred upon corporations so as to authorize the taking of land it is impracticable in a general law to prescribe the exact quantity that shall be taken, and this must be determined by some authority to whom the law delegates the power to decide this question. Wherever it is practicable for the quantity of land to be determined, it is best that it should be fixed in the law, and in many instances this can be done. The general railroad law of this state prescribes that the right of way proper of a railroad constructed under the provisions of that law shall not exceed 200 feet in width. The corporation is given a discretion as to the amount to be taken, limited in the manner indicated. The law recognizes, however, that there may be places where the company could not, within those limits, obtain earth and other material for necessary cuttings and embankments; and it is therefore prescribed that for this purpose the company may "take as much land as may be necessary for the proper construction, operation, and security" of the road. Civ. Code 1895, § 2167 (4). See, in this connection, Hopkins v. Railroad, 97 Ga. 107, 25 S. E. 452.

The exact quantity of land that may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of stations, terminal facilities, and the like cannot be definitely fixed, even by prescribing a maximum amount, as in case of the right of way, and therefore the General Assembly has prescribed that the company may acquire as much "as may be necessary" for this purpose. Section 2167 (3). It is provided that, in the event the company cannot procure from the owners title to the right of way or other lands necessary and proper for the construction of stations, terminal facilities, and the like, such property may be acquired in the manner prescribed in the Code. Civ. Code 1895, § 2170. The manner prescribed in the Code is that set forth in section 4657 et seq. The general railroad law does not in terms declare who shall determine the question as to how much land shall be taken for the right of way within the limits prescribed, nor how much land shall be taken for cuttings, embankments, stations, terminal facilities, etc. Nor is there anything in those provisions of the Code relating to the manner in which private property may be taken for a public use which determines who shall pass upon the question of necessity for the taking and of the quantity of land necessary for the public purpose for which condemnation is sought. Such being the case, the only question which can be determined by the assessors or by the jury on appeal is the amount of compensation to be paid. See, in this connection, O'Hare v. Railroad Company (Ill.) 28 N. E. 923 (5). The Code provides that "if the parties cannot agree upon the compensation to be paid, the same shall be assessed and determined" in the manner indicated in the Code. Section 4659. The Code prescribes the form of award to be made, and in this form there is no reference to any matter except the amount of money to be paid as compensation. Section 4676. Under the general railroad law express authority is given to take private property for the purposes indicated in that act. It is therefore necessary that the quantity to be taken shall be fixed by some person, and from the silence of the act with reference to the person who shall determine this question it is to be inferred that the corporation is to have authority, in the first instance, to judge of this matter. Such seems to be the rule laid down in other jurisdictions. See 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. L. (2d Ed.) 1057 (3); 1 Lewis on Em. Dom. (2d Ed.) § 279, p. 675; Eldridge v. Smith, 34 Vt. 485; Smith v. Railroad Co. (Ill.) 14 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 385; Dietrichs v. R. Co. (Neb.) 13 N. W. 624 (3). If the land sought to be taken is to be used for the purpose of a right of way only, the corporation must determine how much it shall take, and in no event can it take more than a strip 200 feet in width. If the land is sought to be taken for the purpose of making necessary cuttings and embankments, or for stations, terminal facilities, and the like, the corporation, after an investigation as to its needs, is authorized, under the act, to determine in the first instance how much is necessary for these purposes. After the corporation has determined this question, if it cannot acquire the title by contract from the owners, it may proceed to condemn the land under the law above referred to. If it does so proceed, and the assessors, or the jury on appeal, fix the amount of compensation to be paid, and the corporation pays this amount after final judgment by the assessors, or by the court if an appeal is taken, it acquires the right to use the property for the purposes and for the time authorized by law. Of course, we are not to be understood as ruling that this discretion of the corporation to determine the quantity of land necessary is not subject to control if abused. An unlimited and unrestrained power of this kind might be subject to great abuse, and the General Assembly did not, of course, intend to make the person seeking to condemn the final judge of necessity and quantity. If the proceeding authorized by law is instituted and the amount is fixed in the proper manner and by the proper authorities, and the company pays this sum, which is accepted by the landowner, the owner is thereafter concluded on the question of the necessity for the taking and the quantity which is necessary for the purposes for which condemnation is sought. While there is no provision in the general railroad law or in the law providing the method of condemnation for raising the question as to the necessity for taking the land sought to be condemned, if an effort should be made to appropriate more land than is necessary for the purpose for which condemnation is sought the landowner may appeal to a court of equity to interfere by injunction, and thus have the question of necessity and quantity determined before an award is made by the assessors. How far the act of the property owner in appointing an assessor and proceeding to a hearing before the assessors may amount to a waiver of his right to question the necessity of taking the quantity of land sought to be condemned will not now be determined. Nor is the question of how far a court of equity would in a given case supervise the action of the Legislature in declaring what amount of land is necessary involved in the present case. It would seem that the question of necessity would be open to investigation by the courts even after the Legislature has passed on it, and it has been so held. See 3 Ell. R. R. § 952, p. 1338. But, as stated above, we make no ruling on this question. We are clear that the jury to whom the case was submitted on appeal had no right to pass on any question save that relating to the amount of compensation to be paid, and that the verdict reducing the quantity of land which the railroad company sought to condemn was unauthorized.

Judgment on the bill of exceptions of the railroad company reversed; writ of error sued out by Penny dismissed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

HOWELL et al. v. PATE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 16, 1904.)

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS.

1. The act of December 12, 1859, to incorporate the town of Warrenton (Acts 1859, p. 210), was, in so far as it limited to white persons the right to vote in municipal elections held in that town, modified by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States (McCrary, Elec. [4th Ed.] 31; 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law [1st Ed.] 260, note 4; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law [2d Ed.] 573), as well as by the provisions of article 2 of the Constitution of this state adopted and ratified in 1868 (Code 1873, § 5027; Civ. Code 1895, § 5737).

2. The exclusion, solely on account of color, of persons qualified and offering to vote at the late municipal election in that town, there being a sufficient number excluded to have altered the result of the election, rendered it void. Spence v. Judge, 13 Ala. 805; Pennington v. Hare, 62 N. W. 116, 60 Minn. 146; Hartt v. Harvey, 19 How. Prac. 245; Id., 32 Barb. 55; Webster v. Byrnes, 34 Cal. 273.

3. This being so, the defeated candidates could not, as such, have gained anything by contesting the election; and it was their right, in their capacity as citizens and taxpayers of the town, to institute quo warranto proceedings against such of their opponents as were illegally installed in office under that election. Davis v. City Council of Dawson, 17 S. E. 110, 90 Ga. 817.

4. The mayor and commissioners of Warrenton, being elected by the same constituency and at the same time, and having joint functions to perform in connection with municipal affairs (Acts 1859, p. 210; Acts 1899, p. 299), could properly be joined as defendants to the petition filed in this case, the right of each to hold office being altogether dependent upon the validity of the election above referred to. State v. Kearns, 22 Atl. 322, 1018, 17 R. I. 391; Reg. v. Whitehorn, 10 Mod. 65; Com. v. Stevens, 32 Atl. 111, 168 Pa. 582.

SOUTHERN BANKING & TRUST CO. v. WILCOX LUMBER CO.(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)
TAXATION—SALE—IMPROVED LANDS—WILD LANDS.

1. Under the act approved February 28, 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 105), the Comptroller General was authorized only to issue a tax fi. fa. against unimproved or wild land. A sale of improved land as wild land under such execution would convey no title.

2. Whether the land was to be taxed as wild or improved depended altogether on the appearance it presented to the eye, it being immaterial by whom the improvement had been made.

3. Wherever there appeared to be such improvements as indicated that there was some one personally responsible for taxes, it was necessary to return and tax the same as improved property, and the Comptroller was not bound to inquire how the improver held the property—whether by title perfect or imperfect, or by no title at all.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Wilcox County; D. M. Roberts, Judge.

Action by the Southern Banking & Trust Company against the Wilcox Lumber Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The plaintiff relied on a deed under a tax sale by virtue of a tax fi. fa. issued by the Comptroller General for taxes in 1875 against the land in controversy as wild land. The defendant attacked the validity of the sale on the ground that the land had been improved prior to 1875. Dowdy, one of the defendant's grantors and warrantors, testified that he made improvements on this lot about 1871, 1872, 1873, 1874, and 1875. "I put a patch on it of about an acre and a half, and put a house on it. I do not recollect the year, but it was about thirty-three years ago, making it about 1870 that I first made improvements. I moved a woman into the house, and she and her children worked. That was just after I built the house. The patch was fenced and a well dug. In the fall of the year I took in about an acre, and fenced it and sowed it. About two years after I put in an acre peach orchard on it, and fenced it. All these improvements on it were prior to 1873. I built another house about sixteen years ago; and I have kept clearing and improving since. Possession has been continuous since." Other witnesses testified to the same facts substantially as to the time when and the character of the improvements made. One of the witnesses for the plaintiff testified that the improvements mentioned by Dowdy had been made before the year 1875.

A. C. Pate, Eldridge Cutts, and Hal Lawson, for plaintiff in error. Whipple & McKenzie, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. In trespass to try title the validity of an essential link in plaintiff's chain depended upon the question as to whether the Comptroller General, under the act of 1874 (Acts 1874, p. 105), had the right to sell the property as wild land. There was evidence that there had been some improvements placed on the property prior to 1875. The plaintiff insisted that this work had been done by a mere trespasser, and that in legal effect the land remained wild, and could be sold as such by the comptroller. He excepts to the contrary ruling.

Under the act the Comptroller was authorized only to issue tax fi. fas. against unimproved or wild lands. If the property was in fact improved he had no right to issue execution against it, and a sale thereunder would convey no title. Hutchins v. Tenant, 73 Ga. 96. In that case about six acres had been cleared and fenced in 1874. The fi. fa. was for taxes alleged to be due on a land lot for 1874 and 1875, and there, as here, an effort was made to show that, as the person in possession was a trespasser, his wrongful act could not make domestic the wild land. The court, however, refused to permit such testimony, holding that the sale was void, and conveyed no title to the purchaser. The decision is in accord with the ruling in other states under statutes in reference to the sale of unoccupied or unseated lands. In Biddle v. Noble, 68 Pa. 289, it was held that an entry upon an unseated tract of land by any one, whether as an intruder or under the title of the owner, either for purchase or residence or for cultivation, makes the tract seated. The cultivation of several acres fixes the denomination of the whole, and charges the person of the cultivator so as to render a sale for taxes illegal. And again, in Stoetzel v. Jackson, 105 Pa. 562, 567, it was held that "land may be seated as well by an intruder as by an owner, and whether it is to be taxed as seated or unseated depends altogether on the appearance it presents to the eye of the assessor. Where there appears to be such a permanent improvement as indicates a personal responsibility for taxes, the land should be returned and taxed as seated. It is not the business of the assessor to inquire how the improver holds the property, whether by title perfect or imperfect, or by no title at all; for the question is but how the taxes shall be collected; if seated, then from some person; but if unseated, from the land itself."

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

McRAE OIL & FERTILIZER CO. v. STONE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)

SALE—OVERPAYMENT—ACTION TO RECOVER—VOLUNTARY PAYMENT—EVIDENCE.

1. On the trial of an action brought by a vendee against his vendor for the recovery of an alleged overpayment for cotton seed purchased at a given price per ton, alleged to have been made by reason of a mistake in the weight of such seed, neither the law of voluntary payment as embodied in Civ. Code 1895, § 3782, nor the law of caveat emptor, was applicable, and the court erred in giving the same in charge to the jury.

2. Evidence that the vendor did not consent that the cotton seed should be reweighed was irrelevant, and should have been rejected.

3. There was no error in rejecting as hearsay the testimony referred to in the fourth ground of the motion for a new trial.

WINGO, ELLETT & CRUMP SHOE CO. v. JOHNSON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)

GARNISHMENT—PROCEDURE—CLAIMANT—JUDGMENT.

1. Where garnishment proceedings were instituted in Sumter superior court, based upon a suit pending in the city court of Macon, and a claim, pursuant to Civ. Code 1895, § 4720, was filed in the city court of Macon, the claimant did not thereby become a party to the proceedings in Sumter county; it not appearing that there was a compliance by the plaintiff with the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, §§ 4715-4717. It follows that a judgment rendered against the claimant in Sumter superior court, based on a verdict rendered in that court, finding in favor of a traverse to the garnishee's answer, was void, and was properly set aside on motion.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Sumter County; Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

Action by the Wingo, Ellett & Crump Shoe Company against C. H. Weeks. Summons of garnishment served on Elmore & Daniel. Judgment for plaintiffs, and W. M. Johnson and R. W. Johnson move to set it aside, and plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

H. B. Simmons and F. Chambers & Son, for plaintiffs in error. Hardeman, Davis, Turner & Jones, for defendants in error.

CANDLER, J. The plaintiffs in error, by their attorney, made an affidavit before a notary public and ex officio justice of the peace in Bibb county for the purpose of suing out summons of garnishment in an action which they had instituted in the city court of Macon against C. H. Weeks. The usual garnishment bond was given. The summons of garnishment does not appear in the record, but immediately following the affidavit and bond is this entry: "Georgia, Sumter county. I have this day served summons of garnishment issued on within affidavit and bond personally on Olin Daniel, of the firm of Elmore & Daniel, at 9:20 a. m. This 12th day of December, 1901. W. P. McArthur, L. C." Following this entry is another, which is unsigned, as follows: "Filed in office December 12th, 1901." In what office or in what county the filing was had does not appear. Elmore & Daniel answered the garnishment, denying that they were indebted to Weeks, or that they had in their possession any property, money, or effects belonging to him. The answer was sworn to in Sumter county, and appears to have been "filed in office May the 26th, 1902"; but this entry of filing is also silent as to the office and county in which, and the officer with whom, the answer was filed. The plaintiffs traversed the garnishees' answer, and service of the traverse was acknowledged by the attorney for the garnishees in Sumter county. The entry of filing on this paper was in like vague and general terms as on the papers previously mentioned. The traverse is headed: "Georgia, Sumter county. To the Superior Court of Said County." The record next shows a verdict "in favor of the traverse, except as to the note claimed by C. G. Johnson. We find title to this note of C. G. Johnson to be in claimant, C. G. Johnson." On this verdict, which appears to have been rendered by a jury in Sumter superior court, a judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiffs, Wingo, Ellett & Crump Shoe Company, against the garnishees, Elmore & Daniel, and against W. M. Johnson as principal and R. W. Johnson as security, the said judgment reciting, "upon a claim bond given in the city court of Macon to dissolve the garnishment before mentioned." The record fails to show how this case ever got into Sumter superior court, or how W. M. Johnson and R. W. Johnson ever got into the case. There is nothing to indicate how it ever happened that a bailiff in Sumter county served a summons of garnishment in that county issued upon an affidavit and bond made in Bibb county and returnable to the city court of Macon. There is nothing in the record other than the recital in the judgment before mentioned to show the making of any bond by the Johnsons in any court for any purpose.

At the same term of court at which the verdict and judgment before referred to were rendered, W. M. Johnson and R. W. Johnson moved to set aside the judgment, on the grounds that they were not proper parties to the case; that there were no pleadings in the case which made them parties thereto in any sense upon which a judgment might be rendered against them; and that the superior court of Sumter county had no jurisdiction over them, and for that reason no legal judgment could be rendered against them in that court. By amendment they alleged "that they, nor either of them, had filed in Sumter superior court any claim bond to dissolve said garnishment, nor had any copy of any such bond alleged in said judgment to have been filed in the city court of Macon been filed in the superior court of Sumter county, nor had movants, or either of them, been made parties to the garnishment proceedings pending in Sumter superior court by any order of court, all of which will appear by an inspection of the records of said court, nor did said movants, or either of them, appear in person or by attorney in Sumter superior court at any stage of said garnishment proceedings, or take any part in the trial thereof, or in any manner submit themselves to the jurisdiction of said court"; that the verdict rendered did not authorize the judgment entered in said cause; and that neither before nor after the rendition of the judgment did the plaintiffs produce in evidence any judgment or exemplification from the city court of Macon of any judgment in the suit brought against Weeks, nor was the production of such evidence waived. On the hearing of the motion as amended the judge set aside the judgment as against the Johnsons. The plaintiffs excepted.

Taking the record as a whole, we are clear that the court was correct in setting aside the judgment against the defendants in error. As has been seen, the record does not show upon what the judgment against the Johnsons was based. It may be inferable that they filed in the city court of Macon a bond to dissolve the garnishment pending in that court, in accordance with Civ. Code 1895, § 4720, but it nowhere appears, nor is it suggested, that they filed a bond to dissolve a garnishment proceeding pending in Sumter superior court. Indeed, it cannot be said that it appears from the record that there were any garnishment proceedings pending in Sumter superior court. In the motion to set aside it was expressly alleged that the movants were in no way connected with the proceedings in Sumter superior court, that they were never made parties thereto, and that they were never served with any paper to connect them with any proceedings in Sumter county. Assuming that there was a garnishment proceeding pending in Sumter superior court, and that the claim bond was given under the provisions of Civ. Code 1895, § 4720, to dissolve the garnishment, when the garnishees answered they would have been discharged, and any judgment rendered in the case should have been against the claimants and not the garnishees. If the bond was filed in the city court of Macon to dissolve a garnishment pending there, the claimants were in no way connected with any garnishment proceedings in Sumter superior court, and a judgment against them in that court would be illegal and void. If, under the Code section before cited, they had filed their bond in Sumter superior court to dissolve a garnishment pending in that court, the verdict of a jury finding in favor of a traverse to the answer of the garnishees would have required a judgment against the claimants; the garnishees, as we have seen, being discharged, under such circumstances, upon filing their answer.

In view of the past rulings of this court, we think the allegation in the motion to set aside the judgment, to the effect that previously to the entering of the judgment against the movants no judgment had been rendered against Weeks in the city court of Macon, was immaterial. If the Johnsons had been parties to the case in Sumter superior court, we would be bound to presume that the court rendering the judgment had before it all the facts necessary to render that judgment valid. Holbrook v. Evansville R. Co., 114 Ga. 1, 39 S. E. 937, where it was held that "a judgment against a garnishee, duly entered, is as to him conclusive of the proposition that the plaintiff had already obtained a valid judgment against the main debtor, whose effects were sought to be reached by the garnishment proceedings." Upon the facts stated, and which are certified as true by the trial judge, we find no error in the ruling complained of in the bill of exceptions.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

FARKAS v. MONK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1904.)

PLEADING—DEMURRER—AMENDMENT—ACTION ON NOTE—ANSWER—FRAUDULENT REPRESENTATIONS—OFFER TO RESCIND.

1. It is too late, at the trial term of a case, for the plaintiff to file an amendment to a demurrer to the defendant's plea, setting up new and distinct grounds of objection thereto. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5045, 5047; City Council v. Lombard, 28 S. E. 994, 101 Ga. 724.

2. The answer of the defendant set forth a good defense, it being alleged that the note sued on was obtained from him by reason of the false and fraudulent representations of the plaintiff that he held a fi. fa. against another, under whom the defendant claimed title to certain land, the lien of which fi. fa. was superior to and antedated a deed upon which the defendant relied as a muniment of title; that, upon defendant's request to see the fi. fa., the plaintiff replied that it would take him some time to find it, but that it was just as he had stated, and he would send it to defendant in a few days if he would purchase it, and give his note for the price agreed on; that, acting on this assurance, defendant did give his note, not knowing or having an opportunity to know the date of the said fi. fa. until the plaintiff subsequently sent it to him; that he then discovered that the fi. fa. was not prior in date to the deed under which he claimed; and that, as soon as he discovered the fraud which had been practiced upon him, he returned the fi. fa. to the plaintiff, but that the plaintiff refused to surrender defendant's note.

3. This plea of fraud and a timely offer to rescind was not open to special demurrer on the ground (1) that the conduct of the plaintiff was such that the defendant could, by the exercise of ordinary prudence, have ascertained the date and legal effect of the fi. fa. and thus have protected himself against the imposition practiced upon him; or (2) because it did not appear that the person against whom the fi. fa. issued was insolvent, or that for any other reason it was "not good"; or (3) because the defendant's answer did not disclose whether it was a common-law fi. fa., or one based upon a mortgage foreclosure on the land claimed by him.

4. While a mere written transfer, indorsed upon a deed, does not have the effect of passing title to the property therein described into the transferee (Henry v. McAllister, 20 S. E. 66, 93 Ga. 688), yet it was proper in the present case to allow the defendant to introduce in evidence a deed having indorsed upon it a transfer to him, signed by the grantee, from whom and the grantor the defendant testified he had purchased the land on which the plaintiff stated the fi. fa. sold to the defendant was a superior lien. Not only did this written transfer afford evidence of the date on which the defendant became the equitable owner of the land, but, in connection with the deed on which it was indorsed, showed color of title, and disclosed the fact that the defendant held under the grantor named in that deed, against whom the fi. fa. was issued after its execution and delivery.

5. The trial judge properly declined to instruct the jury that it was incumbent on the defendant to show that he had "retransferred" to the plaintiff, in writing, the fi. fa. in question; for, though the evidence showed that the plaintiff had, before sending the fi. fa. to the defendant, indorsed upon it a transfer to him, there was also testimony to the effect that the defendant's offer to rescind was declined by the plaintiff on the ground that "he made no children's trade," and not for the reason that the defendant had not, before returning the fi. fa. to the plaintiff, "retransferred" it to him.

6. The charge of the court was as favorable to the losing party as he had any right to demand or expect, and the verdict returned against him was warranted by the evidence.

HOLCOMBE et al. v. CABLE CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

CORPORATIONS—PRESUMPTIONS—SALE—WARRANTY—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION—ACTION ON NOTE—ATTORNEY'S FEES.

1. When the name of a party to a suit is such as to import that the party is a corporation, there is a presumption to this effect, which prevails until the contrary is shown. Mattox v. State, 41 S. E. 709, 115 Ga. 219, and cases cited. The name, "The Cable Company," imports a corporation.

2. When the parties have reduced to writing what appears to be a complete and certain agreement, importing a legal obligation, it will, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, be conclusively presumed that the writing contains the whole of the agreement between them, and, if it contains an express warranty of certain qualities in the article sold, an implied warranty of other qualities is excluded. Malsby v. Young, 80 S. E. 854, 104 Ga. 205 (4); Bulard v. Brewer, 45 S. E. 711, 118 Ga. 918.

3. Where, by the authority of the principal and in his name, an agent to sell gives an express warranty of certain qualities, the principal is not bound by a warranty as to other qualities, specifically reciting that it is given in the agent's individual capacity, unless he subsequently ratifies such act of the agent.

4. When, in the contract of sale, the vendor of a piano expressly stipulates that he will not be responsible for "tuning," he cannot be held liable for a defect of that character in the instrument.

5. There was no evidence to authorize a verdict of a partial failure of consideration.

6. Attorney's fees cannot be recovered in a suit on a note providing for the payment of the same, unless the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, notifies the defendant, in writing, 10 days before suit is brought, of his intention to bring suit, and the term of the court to which the suit will be brought. Acts 1900, p. 53; Van Epps' Code, § 6185.

7. Applying the principles above announced to the evidence in this case, the verdict rendered was demanded, except as to the attorney's fees. It is therefore directed that the judgment be affirmed, provided the defendant in error will, before the judgment of this court is made the judgment of the court below, write off from the judgment the amount recovered for attorney's fees, and, in the event that should not be done, then the judgment of the court shall be reversed.

GORE v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

RAPE—IMBECILE FEMALE—EVIDENCE.

1. A man who has sexual intercourse with an imbecile female, who is mentally incapable of expressing any intelligent assent or dissent, or of exercising any judgment in the matter, is guilty of rape, though no more force be used than is necessary to accomplish the carnal act, and though the woman offer no resistance.

2. The evidence warranted a finding that the woman with whom the intercourse was had was, by reason of mental infirmity, incapable of consenting, and, the conviction having been approved by the trial judge, a new trial will not be ordered.

COBB, J. "Rape is the carnal knowledge of a female forcibly and against her will." Pen. Code 1895, § 93. This is the common-law definition as given by Blackstone. 4 Bl. 210; 2 Bish. New Crim. L. § 113 (2). Rape, as thus defined, was an offense at common law. English statutes were enacted making the offense penal, but these have been treated as simply declaratory of the common law. Various definitions of the offense have been given. A number of these are collected in an article in 13 Criminal Law Magazine, p. 503, the author of which puts into the following definition the various elements of the several definitions: "Rape is the act of having carnal knowledge, by a man, of a woman, forcibly and against her will, or without her conscious permission, or where permission has been extorted by force or fear of immediate bodily harm." This is probably as comprehensive as any definition that could be given. Ordinarily, penal laws are construed strictly, and, strictly speaking, it might be with some force contended that an act cannot be "against the will" of a person when he or she is not in a physical or mental condition to exercise any will on the subject. See, in this connection, Croswell v. People, 13 Mich. 427, 437, 87 Am. Dec. 774; Bloodworth v. State (Tenn.) 32 Am. Rep. 546. The authorities generally, however, construe the words "against her will" to be synonymous with "without her consent," and hold that the act of sexual intercourse is against the woman's will, when, from any cause, she is not in a position to exercise any judgment about the matter. Thus intercourse with a woman whose will is temporarily lost from intoxication, or unconsciousness arising from the use of drugs or other cause, or sleep, etc., is rape. As stated above, there are a few cases opposed to this view, but the great weight of authority is undoubtedly in favor of giving to the statute such a construction as that just indicated. We have to consider in this case, however, only that form of inability to consent which is presumed to arise from idiocy or imbecility. The rule of law applied by the English courts in cases where the female is alleged to have been idiotic or imbecile is the one generally followed in this country. The rule laid down by those courts is that if the female is so idiotic as to be incapable of expressing any intelligent consent or dissent, or of exercising any judgment in the matter, the offense is rape. See Queen v. Ryan, 2 Cox, C. C. 115; Reg. v. Richard Fletcher, 8 Cox, C. C. 131. The case of Reg. v. Charles Fletcher, 10 Cox, C. C. 248, L. R. 1 C. C. 39, has been regarded (and, it would seem, with much reason) as being in conflict with the two decisions above cited, and as laying down the broad rule that in no case could a conviction be had where nothing appears but the connection and the imbecility of the female. But the English Criminal Court of Appeals has not so treated that decision. See Reg. v. Barratt, 12 Cox, C. C. 498. In that case it was held: "Upon the trial of an indictment for rape upon an idiot girl the proper direction to the jury is that, if they are satisfied that the girl was in such a state of idiocy as to be incapable of expressing either consent or dissent, and that the prisoner had connection with her without her consent, it is their duty to find him guilty." And it was said that: "The two cases of Reg. v. Fletcher are not adverse to one another. The principle is properly laid down in the first case, and the second case was only a decision on the facts that there was not that requisite testimony of want of assent to justify leaving the case to the jury." See, also, Regina v. Connolly, 26 U. C. Q. B. 317, where the earlier English decisions are reviewed, and the rule is thus stated: "In the case of rape of an idiot or lunatic, the mere proof of connection will not warrant the case being left to the jury. There must be some evidence that it was without her consent—a. g., that she was incapable from imbecility of expressing assent or dissent; and if she consent from mere animal passion it is not rape." A comprehensive statement of the law of the subject as applied by the American courts is found in Clevenger on Medical Jurisprudence of Insanity, vol. 1, pp. 202, 203. This summary of the law is merely an epitome of the decisions which are cited, and seems to us to be a very fair analysis of those decisions. We quote the following from this author: "Sexual intercourse with a woman who is so destitute of mind as to be incapable of giving consent is rape, though she does not resist. The test of mental capacity under this rule is whether she was capable or incapable of giving consent or of exercising any judgment in the matter. And very slight proof of force is necessary where the woman lacks the intelligence to comprehend the nature and consequences of the act, and to distinguish morally and legally between right and wrong; and when the man does not suppose that he has her consent the force required and which is involved in the carnal act is sufficient. But where the will is active, though perverted, the act is not rape, when all idea of force or unwillingness is distinctly disproved. And the mere fact that a woman is weak-minded does not disable or debar her from giving consent to the act, and intercourse with her when she is capable of exercising her will sufficiently to control her personal actions is not rape; and, if there is reasonable doubt whether force was used, the jury should acquit, though the woman was of weak mind. A woman with less intelligence than is requisite to make a contract may consent to sexual intercourse so that the act will not be rape upon the part of the man. And connection with a woman who is in a state of dementia, and not idiotic, but approaching toward it, having a predisposition to be with men, and a morbid desire for sexual intercourse, is not rape when no circumstances of either force or fraud accompany the act; nor is intercourse without resistance with a woman subject to epileptic fits, where the evidence does not show that she was under the influence of a fit at the time. The burden of proof of insanity at the time of the act, and that the carnal knowledge was obtained by force, and without consent, rests with the prosecution. There must be some evidence that she was incapable, from imbecility, of expressing assent or dissent; and when consent is given from mere animal passion or instinct it is not rape, and a conviction cannot be sustained, in the absence of evidence as to her general character for chastity and decency, or anything else to raise a presumption, that she did not consent. Evidence of the connection and the imbecility alone is insufficient. But evidence of habits of decency raises a presumption that she would not have consented." See, also, the following authorities: 2 Bish. New Crim. L. §§ 1121, 1123; Clark & Mar. Crimes, § 295; 1 Whart. Crim. L. (10th Ed.) § 590; 13 Crim. Law Mag. 510; 2 Russ. Crimes (6th Ed.) 226; 2 Ros. Crim. Ev. (8th Ed.) 1119; May's Crim. Law, § 196. The following is the rule stated in 23 American and English Encyclopædia of Law (2d Ed.) 856: "Sexual intercourse with an insane or idiotic woman, whose mind, to the knowledge of the man, is totally incapable of consenting to the act, is rape, though she submits to the act without resistance, as in such a case the intercourse is without her consent and against her will. If, however, the female, though weak-minded or idiotic, consents to the intercourse from animal instincts, passion, or morbid desires, the act is not rape." See, also, State v. Williams, 149 Mo. 498, 51 S. W. 88; Payne v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 49 S. W. 604, 76 Am. St. Rep. 712; State v. Cunningham, 100 Mo. 383, 12 S. W. 376; State v. Atherton (Iowa) 32 Am. Rep. 134; McQuirk v. State, 84 Ala. 435, 4 South. 775, 5 Am. St. Rep. 381; State v. Tarr, 28 Iowa, 397.

There was evidence to show that the accused was acquainted with the mental condition of the female, and hence the sole question is whether the present case falls within the rule declaring the act to be rape where the woman is so idiotic as to be incapable of exercising any intelligent judgment in the matter; or whether the girl belongs to that class of unfortunate females, who, while weak-minded, yet possess sufficient mental capacity to comprehend the nature and consequences of the act, and are able to bring to bear that judgment which a woman with that knowledge would exercise. We have reached the conclusion that the conviction should be upheld, and in stating the result of our deliberations we do not deem it necessary to discuss at length the evidence in the case. The most important consideration which has led us to this conclusion is the fact that the girl herself was sworn as a witness, and the judge and jury had an opportunity to pass upon her mental condition by inspection, as it were. There was testimony other than that of the girl upon which the jury could base a finding that the act of sexual intercourse had taken place, and hence the state is not in the embarrassing situation in which the prosecution found itself in a Texas case, where it had to rely upon the woman's testimony to show that the carnal act was accomplished, and at the same time contend for a conviction on the ground that the female was an imbecile, and incapable of consenting. See Thompson v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 472, 26 S. W. 987. Apparently the girl could answer only leading questions, generally responding to these by a simple "Yes" or "No." And even these brief answers are contradictory in important respects. She said she consented to the act, and yet, when counsel for the state explained to her what opposing counsel meant by consent, she said she did not agree for the accused to do what he did. Questions asked for the purpose of eliciting any extended information as to what took place she wholly failed to answer. She testified that she was 15 years of age, whereas her mother said she was 19. She said she had been to school, and could read and write, could read in the third and fourth readers. She was not, however, so far as appears, put to the test before the jury, and her father distinctly swore that she could not learn anything at all at school, and that, notwithstanding she had been to several teachers, she did not even know her alphabet. The jury saw the girl, heard her conflicting statements, and witnessed her demeanor and manner of testifying. A great deal would depend on her appearance. The jury are constituted by law the judges of all of these matters. They have, by their verdict, solemnly affirmed that the girl's intellect was so weak that she was incapable of consenting to the act of sexual intercourse, and we do not feel disposed to usurp their functions, and at this distance, upon a printed record, without ever having seen the girl, declare that we are better judges of the girl's mental condition than the members of the jury were. The trial judge also saw the girl, and heard her testimony, and he is satisfied with the verdict. The Supreme Court of Iowa, in a recent case, where the accused was charged with having committed rape on an imbecile woman, said: "Taking the testimony of the witnesses on both sides of the question, without more, we would be strongly inclined to reverse the case. But the record shows that the complainant was examined as a witness, and that her examination was quite lengthy. Her answers to questions show that she is almost an imbecile, unless she was feigning imbecility. The learned judge and the jury who tried the case saw and heard her while she was on the witness stand, and we cannot put ourselves in the place of the judge and jury. Her appearance and demeanor while testifying were most important considerations in determining her mental capacity, and under the circumstances we think it is not proper for this court to interfere with the verdict." Inasmuch as no complaint has been made of any charge or ruling of the trial judge, it is necessarily to be presumed that the law was fully and fairly given in charge, and that the accused was deprived of no right to which he was entitled. Women like the unfortunate girl involved in this case must be protected, not only against the animal lusts of the members of the opposite sex, but against themselves as well; and men who, knowing of their imbecility, take advantage of their helpless condition to gratify their own lustful desires, are guilty of rape, though they use no more force than that involved in the carnal act, and though the woman offers no resistance to the consummation of their purpose. In the language of Lord Chief Justice Campbell in Regina v. Richard Fletcher, supra: "It would be monstrous to say that these poor females are to be subjected to such violence, without the parties inflicting it being liable to be indicted. If so, every drunken woman returning from market, and happening to fall down on the roadside, may be ravished at the will of the passers-by."

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

EVANS v. JOSEPHINE MILLS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

INJURY TO EMPLOYE—PETITION—DISMISSAL—NONSUIT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—NEGLECT OF FELLOW SERVANT—INFANCY.

1. If the petition sets out no cause of action, proof of every fact therein charged is nugatory; but advantage thereof should be taken by motion to dismiss on the ground that the pleadings are fatally defective, and not by motion to nonsuit, which is intended to test the sufficiency of the evidence to support the petition.

2. If the petition sets out a cause of action, and the plaintiff proves every fact charged, but, on cross-examination or otherwise, disproves his right to recover by establishing the existence of other undisputed defensive facts which show that he is not entitled to a verdict, then a nonsuit should be granted.

3. In the present case, even if the plaintiff established the facts contained in her petition as originally filed, she also proved additional facts as to her mental capacity and experience which would have authorized a nonsuit, since the danger of placing her hand between moving rollers was so patent and obvious as of itself to be a warning to one of her age and experience.

4. By amendment, and the evidence in support thereof, it appeared that she was injured by the act of a fellow servant; and, inasmuch as the doctrine of fellow servants does not apply to infants of tender years, it was error to grant a nonsuit, but the case should have been submitted to the jury to determine whether there was any negligence of the co-employee in the act causing the injury.

5. The master is not liable to one servant for injuries inflicted by a fellow servant, because the risk thereof is one of those assumed in the contract of employment.

6. Infants under 14 years of age are chargeable with contributory negligence resulting from a want of such care as their mental and physical capacity fits them for exercising, and assume the risk of those patent, obvious, and known dangers which they are able to appreciate and avoid.

7. But the risk arising from the negligence of fellow servants is not patent, and there is no presumption that the same was assumed by an infant of tender years.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from City Court, Polk County; F. A. Irwin, Judge.

Action by Betty Evans, by her next friend, against the Josephine Mills. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The petition alleged that the plaintiff was between 11 and 12 years of age, and ignorant of the danger of exposed machinery in defendant's mill, and that defendant negligently left the same uncovered, and failed to warn plaintiff of the danger, and was negligent in permitting and not restraining the plaintiff from going about the dangerous machinery, who was injured by placing her hand between the presses. By amendment it was alleged that, if she was out of the line of her work, the defendant was guilty of negligence in not restraining her from going to and remaining about the dangerous machinery; that defendant did not warn plaintiff that she was out of the line of her work, or request or command her to keep away from the same; that the machinery was not in motion when she put her hand therein, but it was set in motion by another youthful, incompetent, and inexperienced employé, though there was no proof of her incompetence and inexperience, further than appeared from the testimony that she was a "little girl." The plaintiff "had worked two months at the Wahneta Mill, and in the Josephine Mill about three weeks." She testified that she was 11 years and 2 months old; had no regular work in the mill, but was employed "to do first one thing, and then another." Sometimes she would take shirts to the folding table of the presser, which is attached to a mangle having rollers heated by steam, and through which the shirts were run and pressed. On the morning of the accident the machine had not been started, and, when she carried the shirts and placed them on the folding table, she put her finger on the presser to see if the machine was in working order, so that she could tell the operator, and let her keep up with the "overseamer." When she put her finger on the presser, a "little girl" (Minnie Sanders, another employé) started the machine. It caught plaintiff's arm, seriously mashing it, and necessitating its amputation. Plaintiff's evidence tended, to show that she had never been warned as to the danger of the machine, and she claimed that she did not know that it was dangerous, or that it was dangerous to touch her finger to the presser. She had frequently carried clothes to the presser previously to this occurrence. One witness testified that the mangle was very dangerous, and not at all safe for children of tender years to be around. The mangle is provided with a cover, and, with the cover on, it is not dangerous, but, with it off, it is very dangerous. At the time the plaintiff was injured the cover was off. The testimony of a number of employes who were in the room at the time of the accident was introduced, with a view of establishing the dangerous character of the machinery, and proving that no warning had been given to plaintiff in reference thereto. Several witnesses testified that plaintiff was a "sweet, bright," and intelligent child. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court directed a nonsuit.

Janes & Hunt, for plaintiff in error. Bunn & Trawick, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. A nonsuit will not be granted where the plaintiff proves his case as laid. Kelly v. Strouse, 118 Ga. 872, 43 S. E. 280 (4b). This ruling does not lead to the result that it is necessary to submit the case to the jury, even though it appears on the plaintiff's evidence that he is not entitled to recover. Nor is it in conflict with Civ. Code 1895, § 5347, since that section evidently contemplates a trial upon a petition which sets out a cause of action. Usually there is such a petition, and the plaintiff, by proving his case as laid, makes out a prima facie right to recover; and it would, of course, be improper to grant a nonsuit. If he fails to prove what he has thus alleged, or if he actually proves every fact charged, but, on cross-examination or otherwise, disproves his case by establishing beyond doubt the existence of other defensive facts which make it manifest that he ought not, on the whole evidence, to recover, then Civ. Code 1895, § 5347, declares that "a nonsuit will be granted." If, for example, he sues on an account, and proves his case as laid, but also proves that the debt has been fully paid, a nonsuit should be awarded. He proves his case, and then he disproves it. There may be a fatal defect, caused by too much evidence, as well as by too little, and a motion for nonsuit is the proper means by which to test the question as to whether the plaintiff's evidence entitles him to go to the jury. But where the defendant has failed to test the sufficiency of the petition by demurrer at the first term, and the petition sets out no cause of action, it does not follow that proof of the idle allegations therein will compel the court to do a useless thing, and refer to the jury that which is so vain and nugatory that a judgment on a verdict in favor of the plaintiff would have to be arrested. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 5362, 5046. In such instances, however, the vice is in the petition, rather than in the proof. The remedy is not by motion to nonsuit, which is intended to test the sufficiency of the evidence, but by motion to dismiss, which is aimed at the fatal defect in the pleading. Compare O'Connor v. Brucker, 117 Ga. 451, 43 S. E. 731. The original petition set out a cause of action, and it may be conceded that the plaintiff proved her case substantially as alleged. But the testimony further established certain additional facts as to her previous employment in another mill, her experience, capacity, "smartness," and "brightness," which were sufficient to take the matter out of the rule that proving the case as laid will prevent a nonsuit, and to call for the determination of the question as to whether she had not disproved her cause of action. The original petition charged that the plaintiff touched with her fingers the moving machine, and that the master was negligent in failing to warn her of the danger. If she had been an adult, or over 14 years of age, clearly she would not have been entitled to a verdict. She was out of the line of her employment. Although she was only 11 or 12 years of age, it appears by the undisputed testimony that she was a "smart, bright child," and had worked in this and another mill long enough to know that it was dangerous to put hand or finger between moving rolls. And even if the master did not give her warning, the danger was so obvious, and the risk so patent, as of itself to amount to a warning to any one with the mental capacity and experience which the plaintiff was shown to have possessed. While the law exacts of the master the duty to warn those, old or young, who are inexperienced and ignorant of latent dangers, still he is not an insurer, even of infants of tender years; nor is he bound to warn them of dangers of which they know, and are able to appreciate. If, without warning, they deliberately walk into a fire, or purposely step from high places, or voluntarily and unnecessarily put their hands between moving rolls, the master is not responsible. Civ. Code 1895, §§ 2610, 2611, 2612.

In employing minors to work, the master is not bound to employ others to restrain them from leaving their places of duty and going into places of danger. If he actually sees infants of tender years doing any act which is manifestly hazardous, he should restrain them from so doing. Angusta Factory v. Barnes, 72 Ga. 217, 58 Am. Rep. 838. But the evidence in this case does not call for the application of any such rule. The plaintiff had been at work in another mill, and for some time had been properly and safely performing the duties for which she was engaged by the defendant. She had frequently been about the presser; was not expected to get on the platform, or to put her hand anywhere near the rollers; nor is there any evidence that the master or superior officers knew she intended so to do, or had any opportunity to restrain her. If, as alleged in the original petition, she placed her hand on the moving rollers, she saw and knew the danger, and the injury was not the result of any negligence on the part of the master. If, as alleged in the amendment, it was not in motion when she mounted the platform and touched the roller, then the machine was not dangerous to the infant or any one else. No warning was needed, and on this theory alone she was not entitled to recover. The amendment, however, further alleged that, though the machine was not in motion when the plaintiff put her hand between the rollers, another "little girl" started it up, with the result that serious personal injuries were inflicted upon the plaintiff. On this theory: (1) If the master, or some one for whose act he was responsible, was not negligent, she cannot recover. (2) This not being a suit against a railroad company, if the master was negligent, the plaintiff's contributory negligence might lessen, though under our statute it does not necessarily defeat, a recovery. Civ. Code 1895, § 3830. (3) If the plaintiff was free from fault, and was injured by a fellow servant, she cannot recover, unless the fact that she was a minor under the age of 14 takes her without the operation of the fellow-servants rule. There are cases which hold that this doctrine is applicable to infants. Shields v. Yonge, 15 Ga. 349, 60 Am. Dec. 698 (18); King v. Boston, etc., Co., 9 Cush. 112 (17); Curran v. Merchants' Mfg. Co., 130 Mass. 374, 39 Am. Rep. 457 (between 14 and 15); Fones v. Phillips, 39 Ark. 23, 43 Am. Rep. 264 (nearly 14); Brown v. Maxwell, 6 Hill, 592, 41 Am. Dec. 771; Greenwald v. Marquette, H. & O. Ry. Co., 49 Mich. 197, 18 N. W. 513 (17); Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Adam, 105 Ind. 153, 5 N. E. 187 (under 21); Gartland v. Toledo Co., 67 Ill. 498 (under 21); Fisk v. Central Pacific R. Co., 72 Cal. 38, 13 Pac. 144, 1 Am. St. Rep. 22 (12); Lovell v. De Bardleben Co., 90 Ala. 15, 7 South. 756 (where the court construed the declaration to mean that plaintiff was over 14); Hefferen v. Northern P. R. Co., 45 Minn. 471, 48 N. W. 1, 526 (17); Smillie v. St. Bernard Dollar Store, 47 Mo. App. 404 (10); Craven v. Smith, 89 Wis. 125, 61 N. W. 317 (11). In other cases it has been held that the doctrine exempting the master from liability to one servant for injuries inflicted by the negligence of a fellow servant is based upon the theory that such risks are among those assumed in the contract of employment, and that, "if the injured employé is a child incapable of comprehending that risk, the rule ought not to apply." Hinckley v. Horazdowsky, 133 Ill. 359, 24 N. E. 421, 8 L. R. A. 490, 23 Am. St. Rep. 618. In Houston & G. N. R. Co. v. Miller, 51 Tex. 270, the court held that, while the fellow-servant rule should apply to one under 21 years of age, it should not be enforced against a child of tender years. See, also, Evans v. American Iron Co. (C. C.) 42 Fed. 519. Compare So. Agricultural Works v. Franklin, 111 Ga. 319, 323, 86 S. E. 698. From the dissenting opinion in Atlanta Co. v. Speer, 69 Ga. 158, 47 Am. Rep. 750, and from the foregoing cases, it will be seen that all the authorities hold that the fellow-servant rule applies to infants over the age of 14. As to those under that age there is a conflict. Some authorities, for cogent reasons, hold that the doctrine is not applicable to infants of tender years. And, without noting the distinction between those over and those under 14, such is the clear intimation in Augusta Factory v. Barnes, 72 Ga. 217, 53 Am. Rep. 838. All children are chargeable with the result of failing to exercise the due care which their physical and mental capacity fits them for exercising. Civ. Code 1895, § 2901. They are dally brought into the presence of known dangers which they may be reasonably expected to avoid. But the risk from the negligence of fellow servants, which, as matter of law, is presumed to be assumed in the contract of employment, is the risk of an unknown, contingent, and legal danger, which would make no impression upon the mind of a child of tender years. It is not like a peril obvious to the senses, the very presence of which awakens apprehension, and, when coupled with the fear of pain, is calculated to make the infant avoid it. Nor is it like the responsibility for the violation of a criminal statute, where the minor is to be punished for what it itself does, and where the implied knowledge of the criminal statute is generally aided by the child's conscience and intuitive knowledge that the act is in itself wrong. Pen. Code 1895, § 33. The line must be drawn somewhere, and, with variation below that age depending on its capacity, the time of responsibility has been absolutely fixed at 14. For some purposes after reaching that age infants are classed as adults. They can then make wills (Civ. Code 1895, § 3265); select their guardians (Civ. Code 1895, § 2516); and females can contract marriage (Civ. Code 1895, § 2412). They then become amenable to the criminal law, and, by analogy, are presumed to assume the risks which the law makes incident to their contract of employment. But under that age, while they may be charged with the duty of avoiding dangers of which they know, there is no presumption that they contract to assume the risks which are not patent, of which they do not know, and which relate to the contingent act of a third person. The plaintiff proved her case substantially as laid in the amended petition, and, under the circumstances, a nonsuit should not have been granted; but the matter should have been referred to the jury, to determine whether the fellow servant, in starting the machine, was guilty of an act of negligence in relation to the plaintiff.

Judgment reversed. All the Justices concurring.

QUATTLEBAUM v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

MURDER—DEFENSE—INSANITY—INSTRUCTIONS —OPINION EVIDENCE—MEDICAL BOOKS—AR-GUMENTS OF COUNSEL—CONTINUANCE.

1. In a prosecution for murder, where the defendant, an epileptic, relied on the defense of insanity at the time of the homicide, he had no cause to complain of a charge that, before the jury could convict, they must find not only that the defendant knew the difference between right and wrong, and was mentally capable to do or not to do the alleged act, but they must also find that he was capable of governing his conduct in accordance with such choice.

2. A party cannot obtain a reversal for an error which he has himself invited.

3. The defendant was found guilty of voluntary manslaughter, and even if, as contended by him, the evidence made out a case of murder or justifiable homicide, he cannot complain because the judge, in compliance with his oral and written requests, charged on the subject of voluntary manslaughter.

4. Under the ruling in Johnston v. R. & D. R. Co., 22 S. E. 694, 95 Ga. 685, books of science and art are not admissible to prove the opinions of experts announced therein; nor can they, without being introduced, be read to the jury in the argument, over the objection of the opposite party.

5. While counsel may quote from memory or even read brief extracts of literary or historical matter to illustrate and make effective a discussion of the facts, nothing which performs the office of evidence, or introduces facts calculated to influence the jury, can first be used in argument.

6. One adjudged insane is responsible for a crime committed during a lucid interval. Pen. Code 1895, § 35.

7. The defendant, an epileptic, was committed to the asylum, there to remain until restored to sound mind and right reason. More than a year thereafter he was openly at large, but there was no evidence as to the reason for his release. The judge charged that the jury must find that he was of sound mind at the time of the homicide before he could be found guilty of any offense. In the absence of a special request so to do, the judge was not bound to charge on any presumption as to the continuance of insanity arising from the judgment on the proceeding de lunatico inquirendo. Lucas v. Parsons, 23 Ga. 279.

8. One who had served as a juror on such inquiry did not impeach such verdict by testifying, on a subsequent trial of the defendant for murder, as to his knowledge of the defendant's mental condition before and after such verdict, and as to the particular character of insanity with which the defendant had been afflicted. Civ. Code 1895, § 3743.

9. Even if the grounds of the motion for a continuance be treated as complete, and evidence in other parts of the record could be considered, no error appears. The judge exercised a humane and legal discretion. There was no plea of present insanity. The defendant's misfortune would not relieve him of liability to be tried. It did not appear that he would be better able to go to trial at a subsequent term, and there was evidence that he might be actually worse as the result of being confined in jail, for an offense not bailable as matter of right. Civ. Code 1895, § 5138.

Error from Superior Court, Dooly County;
Z. A. Littlejohn, Judge.

J. A. Quattlebaum was convicted of manslaughter, and brings error. Affirmed.

J. T. Jeter, Crum & Jones, and Shipp & Sheppard, for plaintiff in error. F. A. Hooper, Sol. Gen., and M. P. Hall, for the State.

LAMAR, J. 1. In this distressing case it appears that the defendant had, from his earliest infancy, been afflicted with epilepsy. He has, however, no cause to complain of the charge on the subject of insanity, for the court fully and fairly submitted to the jury the question whether the homicide was committed during a lucid interval, instructing them that, before they could convict, they must find not only that the defendant knew the difference between right and wrong, and was mentally capable of choosing to do or not to do the alleged act, but that they must also find that he was capable of governing his conduct in accordance with such choice.

2, 3. It appeared that the defendant, with others, had been playing ball, and, while returning home, had an altercation, in which the deceased, who had a bat in his hand, used language which greatly incensed the defendant, and according to the testimony for the state the latter thereupon drew his pistol, fired, and instantly killed his companion. At the time the accused used language indicating a settled purpose to kill, and shortly after the shooting fled to his home, where he was later arrested. The defendant insists that under the evidence he was guilty of murder or of justifiable homicide, and that it was error for the court to charge the law of voluntary manslaughter. Even if the evidence had not warranted a charge on the subject of voluntary manslaughter, the defendant can take no advantage thereof, inasmuch as it appears that the court was requested by his counsel, both orally and in writing, to charge the law on that subject. It is well settled that a party cannot obtain a reversal for errors which he has himself committed, nor for an error which he has himself invited. Compare Howard v. State, 115 Ga. 244, 41 S. E. 654 (4), and cases therein cited.

4, 5. The almanac, or the Northampton Tables of Mortality (Ga. R. Co. v. Oaks, 52 Ga. 410 [4]), and other similar works of exact science, may be introduced as evidence. For the reasons given in Johnston v. Railroad Co., 95 Ga. 685, 22 S. E. 694, books of science and art are not admissible in evidence to prove the opinions of experts announced therein. It was not error, therefore, to refuse to permit counsel for the accused to read from a book of medical jurisprudence an account of a homicide committed by an epileptic, with the opinion of the author as to whether or not he was criminally responsible. Such book could not have been received in evidence when it might have been met by counter extracts; and, if not admissible in evidence, it was doubly inadmissible to read it first in argument, when there might be no opportunity to reply in kind. Of course, this ruling does not lead to the conclusion that counsel may not quote from memory, or even read brief extracts of literary or historical matter to embellish or strengthen the argument, or to illustrate and make effective his discussion of the facts. And, while there is some conflict of authorities on the subject (Lawson's Expert and Opin. Ev. [2d Ed.] 217), the ruling in the Johnston Case, and in Cribb v. State, 118 Ga. 316, 45 S. E. 396, determines that in this state nothing can be first read in argument which performs the office of evidence, or introduces facts calculated to influence the jury.

6-9. The other assignments of error are sufficiently dealt with in the headnotes.

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

(119 Ga. 455)

TRAVELERS' INS. CO. v. THORNTON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

EXPERT EVIDENCE—MEDICAL FACTS—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—NOTICE—ACTION ON ACCIDENT POLICY—PROOFS OF LOSS—EVIDENCE.

1. An expert may aid the jury, but he cannot perform the functions of a juror, and, under the guise of giving testimony, state a legal conclusion.

2. An expert may give his opinion as to medical facts, but he cannot determine the legal classification of such facts, and testify as to what was or was not "a contributing cause" of an injury.

3. Where it is sought to charge a principal with notice, he is only required to offer the agent to whom the opposite party claims he gave the notice. He need not undertake to prove a negative by producing all of his agents, in order to show that each did not receive the notice.

4. Evidence of notice to the company's agent that plaintiff had hernia was admissible, not to establish a waiver of the terms of the policy, but to meet the plea of fraudulent concealment, and thereby prevent the avoidance of the whole contract. The charge on this subject was in conformity to Civ. Code, §§ 2099, 2101.

5. Policies of insurance do not stand on the same footing as contracts of affreightment by common carriers. Civ. Code, § 2276. There is no standard form of policy prescribed by statute, and the courts must enforce the contract as made, and cannot relieve against results of the assured's failure to comply with lawful stipulations in the policy.

6. Under the terms of the policy here the plaintiff forfeited to the company any sum for which proof of loss was not made within the time stipulated, and was not entitled to recover an amount greater than that stated in the proof of loss. The excess should be written off.

7. There were no pleadings to warrant the admission of evidence as to the value of plaintiff's time.

8. From the very definition of the term, irrelevant testimony is ineffective. Ordinarily, its admission is not cause for the grant of a new trial, unless, from its peculiar nature, or from statements in the assignment of error, it is shown to have an effect prejudicial to the complaining party.

9. The defendant's objection to the admission of testimony as to the plaintiff's character as irrelevant should have been sustained. But there was no claim that it was prejudicial, and the answer of the witness that "he did not know, but supposed it was good," itself shows that this testimony as to character was not harmful. This being a second verdict, a new trial will not be granted for the error.

10. The case was tried in accordance with the former ruling, reported in 116 Ga. 121, 42 S. E. 287, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99. The evidence was conflicting, but sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff for eight weeks' disability. None of the assignments of error present grounds requiring the second grant of a new trial.

Error from City Court of Americus; C. R. Crisp, Judge.

Action by W. J. Thornton against the Travelers' Insurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed, with directions.

E. A. Hawkins, for plaintiff in error. J. H. Lumpkin, for defendant in error.

LAMAR, J. 1, 2. Under the decision in Thornton v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 116 Ga. 121, 42 S. E. 287, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99, it was left for the jury to say whether the injury was caused by the fall and aggravated by the hernia, or whether the hernia was a contributing cause to the injury. A physician could give an opinion on hypothetical facts on what he had heard other witnesses testify in the case, or on facts discovered by his own investigation. He could state what, in his opinion, would have been the effect of the blow to the plaintiff without a hernia, and what the effect of the blow with the hernia. An expert can testify as to what was the cause of death, or of an injury, or as to the effect of disease, or as to the effect of a blow upon one sound or upon one unsound. He can give his opinion on physical facts or as to the medical facts, but he cannot determine the legal classification of such facts. It was not proper for him to use the language of the decision and testify that the hernia was a "contributing cause." That was a mixed question of law and fact, to be determined in the light of all the evidence; and it would have been as improper to permit such testimony as it would have been in an ordinary case to allow a witness to say that a particular act amounted to negligence, or to contributory negligence, or that another fact was the proximate or remote cause. The expert may aid the jury, but he cannot act as a member of the jury; nor, while on the stand, can he transcend the functions of a witness, and under the guise of giving testimony state a legal conclusion. Civ. Code, § 5287.

3. Where it is sought to charge a principal having many agents with notice, it is not necessary for him to undertake to prove a negative, and produce all of his agents, in order to show that each did not receive the notice. He is only required to offer that agent to whom the opposite party claimed the notice was given. Civ. Code, §§ 5160, 3027.

4. Several assignments relate to the admission of evidence and to the charge of the court as to notice to the defendant's agent that the plaintiff had hernia at the time of the application. The evidence was admissible, not to establish a waiver of the terms of the policy, but to meet the plea of fraudulent concealment, and thereby prevent the avoidance of the whole contract. The charge was in conformity with Civ. Code, § 2099.

5-10. Defendant's objection to the admission of testimony as to plaintiff's character should have been sustained. It was equally inadmissible for the defendant to prove by the same witness what was the character of the company's agent. But the defendant alone complains, assigning as error that the evidence was irrelevant. From the very definition of the term, irrelevant testimony is ineffective. Ordinarily, its admission is not cause for the grant of a new trial. Marshall v. Morris, 18 Ga. 373 (4); Mayor of Gainesville v. Caldwell, 81 Ga. 76, 7 S. E. 99 (6). And for it to produce such a result it should appear to have had a prejudicial effect on the minds of the jury. If such is the case, good practice would make it proper, if, indeed, it is not necessary, to point out how that which is alleged to have been irrelevant has become so far relevant as to have affected the verdict. The propriety of such a showing is illustrated here, where, from an inspection of the brief of evidence, it appears the witness testified that he did not know the plaintiff intimately, did not know anything against him, and therefore supposed his character was good. In other words, the witness did not progress beyond the point where the law leaves each witness who has not been attacked. No prejudice being alleged, and this being a second verdict, the error in allowing the question answered over the defendant's objection does not demand a reversal. Civ. Code, §§ 5158, 5159.

The policy required the assured to furnish written notice of the injury and duration of the disability within 13 months from the accident, otherwise all claims thereon were forfeited to the company. Within the time stipulated plaintiff made out his proof of loss, claiming damages for a disability of eight weeks. No amendment or additional claim or proof of loss was subsequently filed within the 13 months. He sued, however, for 10 weeks' disability, and recovered a verdict therefor. Contracts of insurance do not stand upon the same footing as those made by common carriers, in which limitations in a bill of lading are disregarded unless expressly assented to by both parties. Civ. Code, § 2276. There is no standard policy fixed by statute, and no room for implication as to what the agreement was or ought to have been. The rights of the parties must therefore be governed by the terms of the contract. Under that sued on here the filing of the claim and the statement of the duration of the disability within the time limited by the policy was a condition precedent to plaintiff's right to recover. By the terms of the policy, and according to decisions construing similar provisions in other policies, the verdict cannot exceed the amount claimed in the proofs of loss. There are some cases which hold that more than one proof and claim can be filed within the time limit (Bickford v. Travelers' Ins. Co. [Vt.] 32 Atl. 232); but under the terms of the policy there cannot be a verdict for a sum exceeding that named in the written proof required by the contract. The excess can be written off.

The case was tried in accordance with the ruling made when it was here before as reported in 116 Ga. 121, 42 S. E. 287, 94 Am. St. Rep. 99. The evidence was conflicting, but sufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff for eight weeks loss of time at $100 a week; the accident having occurred in a railroad train, and he being entitled to double indemnity. None of the assignments of error present grounds sufficient to require the grant of a new trial.

Judgment affirmed, with direction. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

JORDAN v. STATE

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 12, 1904.)

BURGLARY—EVIDENCE—IDENTITY—JUROR—QUALIFICATIONS—NEW TRIAL—CHALLENGE.

1. On a trial in December, 1903, there was testimony that "recently, during the first week in November," the store of the witness was broken and entered and goods stolen. The evidence was sufficient to show that the burglary was committed within the statute of limitations.

2. The goods lost had no earmarks, but the coincidence of their correspondence in quantity, variety, and brand with those found in defendant's recent possession, with other evidence, was sufficient identification.

3. A juror having the general statutory qualifications may be specially incompetent to serve in a particular case because of relationship, expression of opinion, bias, or other defect proper affectum.

4. If the losing party was ignorant of the affection or bias of the otherwise competent juror, he may take advantage thereof by motion for new trial.

5. A juror wanting in the statutory qualifications of age or residence, or having other deficiency proper defectum, may yet be rendered specially competent by the failure of the parties to challenge.

6. Ineligibility because of prior service in the same court during the same year renders a juror incompetent proper defectum, and is ground for challenge, but not cause for the grant of a new trial.

7. The enforcement of the law prohibiting too frequent service on the jury is referred primarily to the judges, and incidentally to such action as may be taken by way of challenge by the parties.

8. The policy of preventing too frequent service is met by the counter policy not lightly to set aside a verdict; and, unless the statute expressly so requires, a new trial cannot be granted because one ineligible under the act approved August 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 83), served on the jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Superior Court, Bibb County; W. H. Felton, Jr., Judge.

George Jordan was convicted of burglary, and brings error. Affirmed.

Glawson & Fowler, for plaintiff in error. Wm. Brunson, Sol. Gen., for the State.

LAMAR, J. 1. The time and place of the commission of a crime must always appear. While it is best to make specific proof of the date, yet that the offense was committed within the statute of limitations may be established by circumstantial or indirect evidence. What is sufficient must be determined by the special facts of each case. In Tipton v. State (Ga.) 46 S. E. 426, it is stated that, where a month is referred to, it will generally be understood to be of the current year, unless from the connection this appears to be impossible. And if this trial had taken place in January, 1904, it is evident that under the language used the jury must have understood that the transaction took place in November, 1903. So, where the trial took place in December, 1903, and the witness testified that "recently, during the first week in November," his store had been broken and entered and the goods stolen, there was proof sufficient to establish that the offense was committed during the year 1903.

2. A number of boxes of White Knight and Capadura cigars, Virginia cheroots, and Violetta soap were stolen. Articles answering the description in kind and quantity of those lost were soon thereafter found in the possession of the defendant. His counsel contends that the merchandise was of a character which could have been obtained at many other stores, that it had no earmarks by which it could be identified, and that the evidence fails to show that it was the same as that lost. And certainly, if the defendant had been found in possession of White Knight cigars alone, without anything further to connect them with those lost, the state's case would not have been made out. But having in possession White Knight and Capadura cigars in quantities corresponding to those stolen, and beyond the amount usually kept by one not a merchant, made the circumstance much more suspicious. The probative value of the coincidence, that the defendant had the quantity and brand of goods lost would increase in geometrical ratio with the finding of each additional article, so that when it was proved that he not only had White Knight and Capadura cigars, but the Virginia cheroots also, the case became far stronger. But having these, with the unusual number of boxes of Violetta soap, was a coincidence so remarkable as to demand an explanation; if, indeed, under the law of probabilities, it might not be taken as proof of the fact that they were the goods recently stolen. Failure to offer any explanation, except the statement made to the officer that they had been given to the defendant by two boys, whose names were not stated, or other fact to establish the time, place, or circumstances under which the gift was made, followed by the positive identification of the soap, authorized the verdict.

3-8. The act of August 15, 1903 (Acts 1903, p. 83), provides that any juror who has served at any session of the court shall be "ineligible for duty as a juror at the succeeding term." The plaintiff in error moved for a new trial on the ground that one of the jurors had served at the preceding session, and that he and his counsel were alike ignorant of this fact until after verdict. Previous service was good ground for challenge. But in classing the juror as ineligible the act does no more, in legal effect, than render him incompetent. It leaves the case to be governed by the rule applied to a juror who serves though ineligible or incompetent because under age, over age, nonresident, or because his name is not on the jury list. These are grounds for challenge propter defectum, but are not good reasons for the grant of a new trial. These and like statutory deficiencies are general in their character, and afford reason why the juror's name ought not to have been put in the venire, but have no necessary bearing on the ability of such jurors to impartially decide between the particular parties litigant. Such deficiencies are negative and passive, affecting neither party, or both parties in exactly the same way, and thereby producing a balance. They stand on an entirely different footing from those grounds of challenge for favor which are positive, and actively disqualifying defects propter affectum, where the affections from relationship or prejudice and bias render an otherwise competent juror specially incompetent to decide between the particular parties. His statutory qualification does not cure his personal bias. And where the parties are ignorant of such defects propter affectum the verdict may be set aside. But a juror incompetent propter defectum is made specially competent by the act of the parties in allowing him to serve without challenge, and the verdict will not be set aside for such cause. And while the act of 1903 was no doubt enacted in pursuance of the same policy as that expressed in Pen. Code 1895, § 866 (Atlanta Co. v. Ray, 70 Ga. 374), and "to be strictly and energetically enforced by the judges, because intended to prevent service by professional jurors," the enforcement of its provisions is referred primarily to the judges, and incidentally to such action as may be taken by the parties by way of challenge before trial. The policy of preventing jurors from serving too frequently is met by the counter policy not lightly to set aside a verdict otherwise correct because of some reason which has in no way vitiated the result. In view of the almost unbroken current of authority in this state and elsewhere, a new trial cannot be granted because a juror incompetent propter defectum assisted in making the verdict. An express legislative command to that effect would be necessary to bring about such a result. Costly v. State, 19 Ga. 614; Brown v. State, 105 Ga. 640, 31 S. E. 557 (1); Meeks v. State, 57 Ga. 329 (1); Hill v. State, 64 Ga. 453 (1).

Judgment affirmed. All the Justices concurring, except SIMMONS, C. J., absent on account of sickness.

FLANARY et al. v. KANE et al.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 10, 1904.)

VENDOR—VENDEE—AFTER-ACQUIRED TITLE—INCUMBRANCE—DEED—CONSTRUCTION.

1. A vendor is estopped from setting up an after-acquired title to the land conveyed by him where the deed of conveyance recites or affirms, expressly or impliedly, that the grantor is seised of a particular estate, which the deed purports to convey, and upon the faith of which the sale was made.

2. A grantor is estopped from acquiring an incumbrance existing upon the land at the time of his conveyance, and asserting it against the land in the hands of his grantee.

3. Where grantors in a deed "give, grant, bargain, and sell and convey" two certain tracts of land, describing them, the deed shows that the grantors intended to convey, and the grantees accepted and received, an estate in fee simple.

On petition for rehearing. Denied.

For former opinion, see 46 S. E. 312.

BUCHANAN, J. John Gilly, one of the appellants in this cause, has filed his petition for rehearing of the decree entered by this court at its January term, 1904, so far as it affects his right to payment out of the Slempp judgments numbered 4, 6, 7, and 8. He attacks the correctness of that decree upon two grounds: "First, because W. N. G. Slempp conveyed to Gilly long before he conveyed to Slempp and Flanary; and, second, because he conveyed to Gilly with general warranty, but did not convey to Flanary and Slempp with general warranty."

The former of these grounds was fully argued when the case was submitted, and carefully considered by the court before making the decree complained of. Upon a reconsideration of that question, we see no reason to change the conclusion then reached.

The second ground relied on was not urged when the case was argued, but the deed to Flanary and Slempp was treated by all parties as a conveyance with a covenant of general warranty; and this court, in passing upon the question involved, so treated it. It now appears that there is no such covenant in the deed. Although this is true, it does not necessarily follow that Flanary is not entitled to the relief granted him by the circuit court, as modified by the decree which it is sought to have reheard.

A vendor is not only estopped from setting up an after-acquired title to the land conveyed where he warranted the title generally, but he is also estopped from asserting such title, although there is no warranty, where the deed of conveyance recites or affirms, expressly or impliedly, that the grantor is seised of a particular estate, which the deed purports to convey, and upon the faith of which the sale was made. Reynolds v. Cook, 83 Va. 817, 3 S. E. 710, 5 Am. St. Rep. 317; Nye v. Lovitt, 92 Va. 710, 24 S. E. 345, and authorities cited; Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How. 297, 13 L. Ed. 703; Rawle on Covenants for Title (5th Ed.) §§ 245, 247. If the grantor is estopped, under such a conveyance from setting up an after-acquired title, he would be equally estopped from acquiring an incumbrance existing upon the land at the time of his conveyance, and asserting it against the land in the hands of his grantee.

The language of the deed from W. N. G. Slempp and wife, under which Flanary holds, shows clearly that it was not intended to pass a limited or qualified interest in the land, but to convey the land itself. They declare that they "give, grant, bargain and sell and convey * * * two certain tracts or parcels of land," describing them, and referring to deeds of record under which they had acquired title to the land. The deed bears upon its face evidence that the grantors intended to convey, and the grantee expected to become invested with, an estate in fee simple in the land. Reynolds v. Cook, supra; Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, supra. See Wynn v. Harman, 5 Grat. 164.

This being so, we are of opinion that Slempp could not acquire said judgments, which were liens upon the land, and assert them against it, to the prejudice of Flanary.

The petition to rehear must therefore be denied.

FLIPPO v. LAMB.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 10, 1904.)

TRUSTS—EVIDENCE TO ESTABLISH.

1. Plaintiff, having entered into a contract for the purchase of land, agreed with defendant that the latter should furnish the purchase price and take the deed in his own name, but that plaintiff was to have a one-half interest in the same, for which he should pay defendant as he became able. Defendant paid the consideration, took the deed, and afterwards sold the timber on the land at a profit above the purchase price. Held, there is a direct trust in favor of plaintiff, who is entitled to one-half the profits arising from the sale of the timber, and the defendant cannot charge plaintiff with the costs of procuring the money necessary to pay the purchase price, as that was the obligation he assumed in his contract.

¶ 1. See Estoppel, vol. 19, Cent. Dig. § 313.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hanover County.

Suit by John A. Lamb, trustee in bankruptcy, against E. J. Filippo. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

George P. Haw, for appellant. Leake & Carter and Wm. A. Moncure, for appellee.

KEITH, P. On the 28th of November, 1899, John T. Terrell was, upon his own petition, adjudicated a bankrupt in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Virginia, and shortly thereafter John A. Lamb was appointed his trustee. On the 23d of October, 1900, the District Court entered an order directing the trustee to institute such suit at law or in equity as to him might seem proper to enforce a contract alleged to have been entered into between the bankrupt, Terrell, and one Filippo, for the purchase of a tract of land, for the collection of any money or the enforcement of any right which may have accrued to Terrell by virtue of said contract. The trustee filed his bill in the circuit court of Hanover county, and with the bill makes the following contract and exhibit:

"Know all men by these presence, that whereas J. T. Terrell has bought a farm in Caroline County, Va., known as Brook's farm, containing 700 acres more or less for five thousand dollars cash, for which E. J. Filippo agrees to pay for and take the deed in said Filippo's name and charge the said Terrell with twenty-five hundred dollars, being one-half of the purchase money for said farm, whereas the said Terrell is at work for the said Filippo by the month, it is agreed that said Filippo shall deduct the interest on the twenty-five hundred dollars every month out of said Terrell's wages, or on what part thereof that may be unpaid, the said Terrell shall have a right to pay as much of the principal as he can at any time, and whereas the said farm contains a large quantity of timber whenever the timber is manufactured or disposed of one-half of the proceeds after paying expenses of manufacturing shall belong to the said Terrell and sufficient amount of it shall be paid to said Filippo to satisfy whatever part of the twenty-five hundred that is unpaid, in case of any accident by death or otherwise that the said Terrell could not pay all of the twenty-five hundred him or his heirs shall have a clear deed to such proportional part of said farm and improvements thereon that said Terrell has paid for.

"Given under our hands and seals this year of our Lord, 1899.

"E. J. Filippo. [Seal.]"

The subject of this contract is a tract of land in the county of Caroline, valuable chiefly for its timber, which was owned by the children of R. T. Brooke. Terrell called the attention of Filippo, who was in the lumber business, to this land, and suggested its purchase, but Filippo was of the opinion that it could not be bought for a reasonable figure. Terrell went to see Brooke upon the subject, and entered into negotiations which resulted in its purchase for the sum of $5,000 in cash, as appears by a letter from Brooke to Terrell, and the indorsement thereon, as follows:

"11th October 1899. Mr. J. T. Terrell, Peaks P. O., Hanover Co. My dear sir: I have communicated with my children and they consent to my selling the place for $5,000.00 (five thousand dollars) cash. I have been paying taxes on 700 acres, and I will sell it as containing 700 acres, more or less. Yours respectfully, R. T. Brooke, P. O. Box 102, Richmond, Va.

"This will be a sale as soon as terms complied with. R. T. Brooke. 14th October, 1899."

Terrell was unable to pay any part of the purchase money, and thereupon the contract above set forth was entered into. There was evidence which tends to show that Filippo was ready to ignore the rights of Terrell, and to deal directly with Brooke for the purchase of this land; but Brooke, having agreed to sell to Terrell, refused to deal with Filippo.

In pursuance of the terms of this contract, Filippo, on the 23d of November, 1899, paid $2,000 to R. T. Brooke by check, and on the 12th of December he borrowed the sum of $3,000, and paid the residue of the purchase money.

On November 15, 1899, a deed was made to E. J. Filippo, which was acknowledged November 18, 1899, and was recorded on the 27th of December of the same year. On December 11, 1899, a deed of trust was given to secure the loan, with which Filippo had paid the balance of the purchase money to Brooke, and this deed of trust was also recorded on the 27th of December.

A short time afterwards—on April 16, 1900—Filippo sold the timber upon this land for $7,000 in cash, and it is to ascertain the interest of John T. Terrell in this sum and in the land, after the timber had been cut from it, that this suit was instituted.

Filippo, in his answer, states that Terrell was in his employment at a salary of $50 per month for the services of himself and his team; that he (the respondent) was endeavoring to purchase the Brooke farm, when to his surprise Terrell showed him a letter from Brooke offering the farm for $5,000 cash, and then the agreement was entered into between Terrell and the respondent that they would buy it together, each furnishing one-half of the money; that this agreement, which was not in writing, continued until after the deed was ready for delivery some time in December, 1899, when, Terrell being unable to furnish his part of the money, the respondent borrowed $3,000, and with $2,000 he had in hand, paid for the land, and with Terrell's approbation took a deed in his own name, and then signed the written agreement which has been heretofore referred to; that after this was done Terrell continued to work with respondent until the 31st of March, 1900, and during that time drew his wages and the hire of his team; that after this state of affairs had continued for some time respondent told him that he had not complied with his agreement, and that he could no longer submit to it; that he would sell the timber on the place, if he could, and give Terrell one-half of the land, to which Terrell consented, and agreed that respondent could have for his trouble what he could get over and above what was necessary to pay what the farm had cost, and in reliance upon this made the sale of the timber, and was then much surprised when Terrell made a demand upon him for one-half of the money.
